PREFACE.

The death of Miss Hemenway has somewhat delayed the appearance of another volume of the VERMONT HISTORICAL GAZETTEER; but it is chiefly her work, and has been edited, and is published according to the original plan. It was due both to the author, and to the subscribers, that this should be done; and it is hoped that the work has not suffered either in accuracy or interest by the change.

In compiling and arranging the great mass of materials furnished by writers the editor has been compelled to omit some things the insertion of which would have swelled the volume to an unwieldy size; but the aim has been to retain that which was of permanent value, and essential to correct presentation of the facts of history. The publisher desires to acknowledge the favors and valuable assistance received, which has greatly lightened the labor of its preparation; and without which hearty co-operation it could not have been made so complete. It is impossible to mention all, but the following persons should not be omitted, whose aid renders it fitting that their names should be associated with the work:

Ex-Gov. J. Gregory Smith, Ex-Lieut.-Gov. Levi K. Fuller, Col. J. J. Estey, Kittredge Haskins, Esq., Hon. Gilbert A. Davis, Judge James Phelps, W. S. Smart, D. D., Prof. Hiram A. Cutting, Geo. L. Clark, Prof. J. S. Lee, Mark and Myron Ward, Dr. J. Draper, F. D. Proctor, F. C. Smith, Hon. R. Roberts, L. D. Wilcox, W. E. I. Robinson, J. H. Merrifield, D. L. Mansfield, S. D. Winslow, L. A. Jackson, N. W. Cook, F. C. Gully, O. A. Marshall, C. A. Cleghorn, A. H. Washburn, H. H. Warner, Mrs. E. D. Greenwood, Sylvia and Isabella Whithed, Eva J. Stickney, Miss Jane Hunt, Mrs. W. S. Balch.

To these, and to all others, who have given valuable aid in ways too numerous to be mentioned, our thanks are due. This volume is offered to the public as another contribution to the history of Vermont, and is a memorial of its editor, who gave to the preservation of its history the indefatigable labors of a life-time.

ABBY MARIA HEMENWAY

was born in Ludlow, Vt., October 7, 1828. She was educated at the Black River Academy at Ludlow. Her classmates and fellow students still remember her as an active, earnest scholar, and was eager to make practical use of knowledge when acquired. She was a great admirer of Margaret Fuller Ossoli, Mrs. Browning, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, and those enthusiastic workers of forty years ago. She taught for three years in Michigan, and soon after returning to Vermont, she began what proved to be her literary career and the work of her life.

She knew of many who had written Poems worth preserving, and the result of her efforts to collect these treasures was "The Poets and Poetry of Vermont," published in 1859. The collecting of materials for that book introduced her to the prominent men and women of that time, interested her in almost every portion of the State and made her many life-long friends. The keepers of local anecdotes and traditions of the early settlements were rapidly passing away; each year death decreased their numbers.

Miss Hemenway had shown such fitness for the particularly difficult task of finding interesting material for literary work where none was expected, that at the earnest request of many eminent men, she began her Vermont Gazetteer, thinking to complete it in a few numbers, published in a magazine form.

The work grew on her hands, and has proved to be the labor of a lifetime, and so valuable to the State and every lover of Vermont, and indeed to every historical student, that we might feel that she earned for herself a fitting monument, if that were all the record she had left of her residence on earth.

At intervals, while waiting for publisher or copy, she has written several volumes of poetry and some books of prose, which prove her an enthusiastic Christian woman, and attest her warm love for the friends she found wherever she resided. Her work as Vermont historian led her to various localities of the State, in order that she might personally superintend the collecting of material for her Gazetteer.

About six years ago, thinking by the report of friends that there was a better opportunity in Chicago for finishing Vol. V., she went there, where she resided until her death. A fire destroyed a large part of what was done on that volume.

A less determined nature than hers would have sunk under the discouragement. But she rose to the emergency and went bravely to work, recovered the lost manuscript and had nearly completed it, when death came swift and silent.

From whichever standpoint we view her life, she was a remarkable woman. In this age, when woman has taken a position in all professions, not one deserves a stronger meed of praise from the present generation, or has bestowed a greater obligation on those that shall come after, than Abby Maria Hemenway.

Miss Hemenway's published works are as follows:

Poets and Poetry of Vermont in 1858.

Revised edition in 1860.

Rosa Mystica in 1865.

Vermont Historical Gazetteer, Vol. I, in 1867.

Vermont Historical Gazetteer, Vol. IV, in 1882.

Vermont Historical Gazetteer, Vol. V, nearly complete, 1890.

Vol. VI was nearly prepared for press, one town printed.

Abby Maria Hemenway died Feb. 24, 1890, aged 61. She earnestly worked for Vermont up to the last day of her life, and died suddenly with apoplexy; she was brought to Ludlow, her old home, for burial.

HISTORY

OF THE COUNTY OF CUMBERLAND.

By Hon. G. A. DAVIS of Windsor, Vt.

CHAPTER I.

The controversy between New Hampshire and New York, in regard to the "N. H. Grants." Establishment of the county.

A brief account of the controversy between the Provincial governors of New Hampshire and New York, concerning their respective right to the jurisdiction over the "N. H. Grants," as the territory now comprised within the State of Vermont, was formerly called, may not be uninteresting or out of place. That controversy for a long time seriously affected the settlement and prosperity of the disputed territory. Zealous partisans were arrayed on either side, the contest was bold and vigorous, and gave an opportunity for the development of the daring qualities of the "Green Mountain Boys."

Charles II granted to the Duke of York, his brother, in 1664 and 1674 a tract of land, which embraced among other parts "all the lands from the west side of Connecticut river to the east side of Delaware Bay." The Province of New York became the occupant of this grant. In 1741, Benning Wentworth was commissioned governor of the Province of New Hampshire. The territory over which he was to act as governor was described in his commission as being "bounded on the south side by a similar curve line pursuing the course of Merimac river, at three miles distance, on the north side thereof, beginning at the Atlantic ocean, and ending at a point due north of a place called Pautucket Falls, and by a straight line drawn from thence due west across the said river till it meets with our other governments." Whether New York or New Hampshire had jurisdiction over the territory immediately west of the Connecticut river depended upon the construction given to the last clause in the commission. Gov. Wentworth contended that New Hampshire extended as far west as Massachusetts or Connecticut, i. e. within 20 miles of the Hudson river, where he contended was the eastern boundary of the Province of New York.

A correspondence was commenced in 1749 between the governors of the respective Provinces in which was urged their respective claims to the jurisdiction over the disputed territory west of the Connecticut. In the first letter of Gov. Wentworth he expressed doubts as to the true boundary between the Provinces; yet he proceeded to have the territory surveyed and chartered west of the Connecticut river.

After some correspondence the two governors mutually agreed to refer the matter in dispute to his majesty, the king of England. This arrangement was entered into in 1750. No action appears to have been taken upon the matter until 1764. In the meantime George II had died, and George III acceded to the British throne; a monarch whose whole policy towards his American Colonies resulted in the most disastrous manner to his possessions and authority in that part of his dominions. His attempt to arrange this controversy between his governors, was so bunglingly executed that it increased rather than allayed the difficulty and ill-feeling.

In December 1763, 122 grants had been made. Gov. Colden, without waiting for the king's decision in view of this unwarranted assumption of power and the consequences that must result therefrom, "to prevent therefore the incautious from becoming purchasers of the lands so granted," issued a proclamation Dec. 28, 1763, warning all persons that the eastern boundary of the Province of New York was the Connecticut river, commanding officers both judicial and executive to exercise jurisdiction to that river, and also commanding the high sheriff to return the names of all persons who held lands under New Hampshire Grants westward of Connecticut river, "that they may be proceeded against according to law." When this reached the public eye, there was no little commotion among those whose interests were affected thereby. Gov. Wentworth, to inspire confidence in the validity of the New Hampshire Grants, and encourage settlements under them, issued a counter proclamation March 13, 1764. The claim of New Hampshire was urged and that of New York deprecated. The late proclamation of Gov. Colden was termed one "of a very extraordinary nature." The settlers were urged not to be "intimidated, or in any way hindered or obstructed in the improvement of the lands" granted them, as their title under New Hampshire charters was perfectly reliable.

But few grants were made after the putting forth of this proclamation. In the meantime the claims of New York had been brought before the King, supported by petitions purporting to be signed by a great number of the settlers on the New Hampshire Grants, representing that it would be for the advantage of the petitioners to be annexed to the colony of New York, and praying that the Connecticut river might be declared the western boundary of the province of New Hampshire. Accordingly the King and council July, 1764, issued an order declaring "the western banks of the River Connecticut to be the boundary line between the said two provinces." This proclamation was published by the governor of New York, April 10, 1765. This order in council which was intended to settle the whole difficulty only added fuel to the flame. It was as ambiguous and uncertain as the answers of the Delphic oracle.

"To be" the boundary line. Did this clause only affect the question of jurisdiction? In the future? Were the titles under New Hampshire grants thereby declared null and void and the people to be obliged to re-purchase from New York? Such and similar questions were asked by the settlers. Different answers were given to these questions, influenced by the situation of the party. Many of the settlers claimed there was no necessity of re-purchasing, while the governor of New York took the opposite ground. Still, Gov. Colden had no desire to oppress the actual settlers. By the payment of a small fee their lands were to be re-chartered to them. Almost the first act of the governor council after publishing in April the order of the King, considering the condition of those who were actual settlers under New Hampshire Grants, and that the disposing of such persons might be ruinous to themselves and families, was to make an order that the surveyor-general should not upon any warrant of survey that should come into his hands, make any return of lands so actually possessed, unless for the persons in actual possession thereof.

And March 4, 1771, that officer returned that he had observed the order in his surveys east of the Green mountains. So far, the conduct of New York towards the "Grants" had not been oppressive or unjust. At this critical period in the history of the towns situated within the "New Hampshire Grants" much depended upon the measures each adopted. Some obstinately refused to purchase charters from New York and trouble ensued; others obtained their charters and remained for a time comparatively quiet.

The people of the "Grants" by this decision were included within the "unlimited" county of Albany, whither they were compelled to go to transact all legal business. As the roads at that time were difficult of passage, if even surveyed, the inconveniences were numerous.

In 1765, attempts were made by Thos. Chandler and Isaac Mann, of New Flamstead, in connection with Daniel Jones and Robert Harper, to induce the Provincial Legislature of New York to form a county east of the Green mountains, with New Flamstead, (Chester,) as the shire town, and Messrs. Chandler and Mann even proceeded to New York city to advocate the measure, but without success. New Flamstead was then included within the limits of Albany county, and the only results of their efforts appears to have been the appointment of 21 additional justices of the peace for that county. At a meeting of the justices at Rockingham, April 27, 1766, Nathan Earle was chosen constable for New Flamstead. Of the proceedings of these men, "In a little brief authority dressed up," no records are known to exist.

Early in the year 1766, Thomas Chandler, at the request of Sir Henry Moore, governor of New York, ascertained the number of men between the Green Mountains and the Connecticut river, who were capable of bearing arms. According to his report in the southern portion of that district there were 600. Military companies were formed in the different towns, and commissions issued, bearing date Jan. 20, 1766. Thomas Chandler was commissioned Colonel. The records of these military organizations are not to be found. Thus New Flamstead was furnished with a full complement of officers, judicial, executive and military, and some good results were seen, yet their efficiency was very much impaired by the want of a jail for the confinement of evil doers, the jail at Albany, which was 150 miles distant, and not easy of access on account of the condition of the roads and the face of the country, being the nearest. The attempts to secure the formation of a county were again renewed by Chandler and others, on the 16th of June, 1766. Governor Moore seconded their efforts, and on the 3d of July a portion of the "Grants" situated between the Connecticut river and the summit of the Green Mountains, comprising the same territory now included within the limits of Windam and Windsor counties, was erected into a county by the name of Cumberland. It probably received its name from Prince William, the duke of Cumberland, who in 1746 had met with distinguished success in opposing the rebels in Scotland.

Provisions were made for the erection of a court house and jail. New Flamstead being the most convenient among the townships, and "Nearest the centre of the county," was selected as the location of these buildings. On the 14th of July, 1766, a new charter was obtained for New Flamstead, by Thomas Chandler and 36 others, in which the town took the name of Chester. It confirmed the settlers in the quiet possession of their farms, and saved Chester from becoming the theatre of contests between the people and civil authority of New York. July 15, 1766 another act was passed relating to courts in Cumberland county. By it the "Judges and justices duly authorized in that behalf" were directed to hold "Yearly and every year," in the township of Chester, a court of common pleas, to hear, and according to the laws of England, and the Province of New York, "To try and determine all suits, quarrels, controversies and differences," which might arise (in the technical language of the ordinance) between "Any of the loving subjects of the county, above the value of forty shillings." A court of general sessions of the peace was also established; two terms of these courts were annually to be held, respectively upon the first Tuesdays of June and November. Four days was the length of time they were authorized to sit at any term, and both courts were to be held at the same time, that the business before them might be "Constantly proceeded in, and all unnecessary attendance avoided." Officers both judicial and executive were appointed, and the foundation laid of a place "Wherein justice is judicially administered." In the distribution of appointments the Chandlers were not overlooked. Thomas Chandler, sen., received the appointment of chief judge of the court of common pleas, surrogate and justice of the peace; John Chandler, clerk of the court, and justice of the peace and quorum; and Thos. Chandler, Jr., justice of the peace and quorum; Nathan Stone, another citizen of Chester, was appointed high sheriff; and Timothy Olcott of Chester, coroner. These commissions bear date July 16, 1766.

The act establishing Cumberland county was transmitted agreeably to the laws and statutes of England, "To his majesty, for his royal approbation, or disallowance." The king, June 26, 1767, declared the act "Void and of none effect." On the reception of the intelligence of this act of his majesty, the governor of New York published the same to the province. Great was the consternation and surprise in Chester, at this unexpected frown of fortune upon their flattering prospects, and numerous petitions were signed there and forwarded to Gov. Tyron, representing the "Distress and great inconvenience under which the inhabitants of that part of the county were laboring through the want of due administration of justice." The Provincial Council of New York took the matter in hand, and in face of the 'veto' of the king, on the 19th of March, 1768, the "Great Seal" of the Province was affixed to an act which had been passed the 18th, re-establishing the county of Cumberland, and re-selecting Chester as the shire, since being nearest the center of the county, it was the most "Convenient for that purpose." Courts were established and the proper officers appointed, and commissions issued on the 7th of April following. Many of the citizens of the county defied the authority of this court presided over by Judge Chandler, insulted him in open court, and finally compelled him, through fear, to leave the court house. A full account of their troubles will be given hereafter, together with a description of the jail and court house, which were erected at Chester.

Prior to 1775, little is known of the records of courts of Cumberland county, which undoubtedly have been destroyed. That such records existed there is no doubt. There is a deed still extant from Thos. Chandler to Ebenezer Holton, on which is the following official endorsement and certificate:

"Received for Record, January ye 8th, 1770, and recorded in the Records of Deeds for the County of Cumberland. Lib. A, Folio, 79, and examined. John Chandler, Clerk."

CHAPTER II.

1770. The establishment of the court at Chester and the men appointed to office did not give universal satisfaction to the citizens of Cumberland county. Charges of corruption and bribery were brought, and resistance to the precepts made on these grounds. The more particular charges were, that the establishment of the county was a sham and not a reality; that the patent or ordinance erecting the county was a libel, as it suggested that its being erected into a county was petitioned for, which was false; that there was no justice to be obtained by reason of the corruption of the judges who were ruled entirely by John Grout, an attorney then resident at Chester.

Col. Nathan Stone, of Windsor, acted a prominent part in this resistance and headed a mob who rescued from the custody of the high sheriff, one Joseph Wait, the particulars of which rescue are given hereafter. Some of the citizens of the county, and especially those of Windsor and vicinity had deliberately determined "that no writs or precepts that issued out of the inferior court or courts of the general sessions of the peace, for the said county, should be served." Perhaps, however, hostility to the government of New York, thus attempted to be extended over the territory immediately west of the Connecticut, may have been the real motive to resistance. John Grout, an attorney at law, settled in Chester a short time previous to February, 1770. He formed one of the posse of some 15 or 16 of the settlers summoned by Daniel Whipple, then high sheriff of Cumberland county, to assist in re-arresting one Joseph Wait and others, who had been rescued from the custody of the sheriff "by a number of armed men." Wait declined to be arrested, and being surrounded and aided by his friends who "were armed with guns, swords, pistols and clubs," resisted the sheriff. The sheriff made proclamation, but it was disregarded. Wait's party charged upon the sheriff and his posse. Wait, himself, aimed two blows at Grout with a club which, to use his own language, he avoided "by suddenly retreating," but the sheriff and his posse were made prisoners and kept seven hours as prisoners at Windsor and then permitted to depart. This was certainly a high handed outrage upon the civil authority of the county. Tuesday, June 5, 1770, was the day appointed by law for holding the regular term of the "Inferior court of common pleas and the court of the general sessions of the peace" for the county of Cumberland, at Chester. On the Sunday preceding the term, a letter written at Windsor was shown to Judge Wells of Brattleboro which gave him reason to "suspect" that an attempt would be made to prevent the sitting of the court. Judge Wells immediately started for Chester and on his route called upon Judge Lord, and together they proceeded. Arriving at Chester on Monday evening, the contents of the letter was communicated to Chief Judge Chandler and some justices of the peace, the letter was, however, couched in such ambiguous and doubtful terms that the extempore council were unable to determine upon any definite measures necessary to be pursued, and separated to await the events and developments of the succeeding day. Tuesday morning came and with it Nathan Stone, Joseph Wait and about 30 confederates, including many who had lately successfully resisted the sheriff and his posse. Flushed with their late success, these rioters appeared at the court house in a noisy and tumultuous manner. Stone being armed with a sword, Wait with a dagger and hanger, and the remainder of the motley crew "with large staves and clubs." Judge Chandler mildly demanded of Stone, who appeared to be the leader, for what reason they had assembled at the court house thus armed, and desired him not to carry his sword into court. The reply of Stone was so low, contemptuously and sullenly so, that it was not heard by the judge. The rioters remained outside and matured their plans, while the judges and officers of the court entered the court house, and the judges soon after took their seats upon the bench. The court was opened in the usual manner by reading the letters patent or ordinance establishing the county, and the commissions of the pleas. In regular order, the rioters then entered the court house, bearing their weapons and with their hats on, formed in a regular body, facing the court. Col. Stone, with drawn sword, and Joseph Wait, with drawn dagger and hanger, advanced to the table in front of the judges' seat. Such a display was well calculated to terrify these functionaries, as the sheriff was powerless before such a resolute and war-like company. Colonel Stone, addressing the judges, demanded "in behalf of the public," what business they had to sit there as a court, and this demand was clamorously seconded by his followers. They were mildly informed by one of the judges that their authority had been read at the opening of the court, and all who wanted satisfaction should have attended to the reading of them.

"By many arguments" Col. Stone denied the authority of the government of New York to erect the county, and establish the court,—an objection the judges did not attempt to answer or refute, deeming it prudent to bear in silence with the insolent bearing of the martial array before them; but the rioters were informed that the business of the term would be proceeded with.

Failing thus to drive the judges from their seats, without a resort to physical force, and being unwilling to attempt that at this stage of proceedings they tried another expedient. Joseph Wait and some others had been indicted for a riot—the attempt to arrest him has before been detailed—and in this manner “surrendered” themselves in open court and demanded an immediate trial. The martial display before them convinced the judges that a trial would be but a mockery of the name of justice, as a jury would not, as they apprehended dare to convict the rioters for fear of the consequences at the hands of their friends; neither did they dare to refuse a trial and order them to enter recognizances for their appearance for trial at another term; therefore they were informed they might depart without entering into any recognizance whatever.

Thus far the court had been completely cowed. The unwhipped rogues next demanded that John Grout should be disabled from practising before that court, “representing him as a bad man.” The court were not disposed to yield to this demand and expressed a contrary opinion of the character of Grout. However, they were informed that the grand jury was the proper tribunal before whom to make their charges and the clerk of the court would assist in drawing any necessary bill; that Mr. Grout had a right to a trial, when accused of any offense; and that the court had no lawful authority to forejudge Mr. Grout upon a mere suggestion that he was a bad man, unsupported by evidence, nor even the particulars of the bad conduct pointed out. In this certainly the judges were correct. Stone and Wait declared they were “not about accusing him in such a way as to give him a trial, neither were they obliged to do it” adding nothing would satisfy the people and himself but Grout’s being immediately expelled from the court in such a manner as never to have the privilege of practising as an attorney. If it is not done (addressing Judge Chandler) “we shall do something which I shall be sorry to be obliged to do which will make your Honor repent not complying with our request.” The court had the firmness and daring to promptly refuse to comply with their demands. In a riotous and tumultuous manner, upon the announcement of the resolution of the court, the crowd closed upon the court with their clubs with the evident intention of carrying their point by force. The greatest excitement was manifest and the “noise and confusion” rendered the transaction of any business impossible, and placed the lives of the court in peril. At this juncture, to prevent any act of violence in open court, the court was immediately adjourned to the following day, and the judges escaped without suffering any personal violence.

The rioters then proceeded to the house of the clerk, John Chandler, Esq., and seized the attorney whom they had in vain attempted to have disbarred by the court.

Grout was seized by John Thurston and David Getchel, and started on the road to Charlestown, N. H. A large mob, armed with sticks, and numbering thirty or more, joined the two former, and as they surrounded and urged forward the frightened attorney, took particular pleasure in pulling, shaking, twitching and otherwise tormenting him.

His position was not very desirable, and the senseless mob, it is not to be presumed, tempered their severity with much moderation. Grout, not being accustomed to such laborious and hurried business, was exhausted and fatigued by his twelve-mile excursion. Then his treatment at their hands was uncivil and cruel, for many were the shakes and twitches he was obliged, volens volens, to endure. He was detained a prisoner by the rioters at Charlestown about 13 hours, when they conducted him to Windsor. His arrival there was not calculated to arouse in his mind very pleasant reminiscences. But a short time since had he escaped the club by a dexterous movement and been detained a prisoner. Still earlier had the town authority taken measures to warn him out of town for fear of his becoming a pauper. His unwilling pilgrimage at this time was not calculated to heighten the pleasures of memory. Fear, forced marches, and the rough usage he had suffered, had, in his own words made him feel “himself much indisposed.” Grout’s guardians and captors kept him under strict surveillance and allowed no communications to be sent or read, the contents of which they did not know.—He complained he was not allowed to write his wife to quiet her mind as to the dreadful apprehensions which she must have entertained as to what had befallen him.

On Sunday the 10th of June, he effected his escape.

The rioters at Charlestown exulted over their success and said “we have now broken up the court,” if we thought we had not effected it we would go back and bring away one of the judges.”

The foregoing account is taken from the affidavit of John Grout, sworn to before Daniel Horsmader at the city of New York, Aug. 7, 1770.

Grout proceeded to New York and swore out process against the rioters including the Stones, David Getchel, 12 in all. We have no knowledge that these were ever served and probably the mattresses stopped there, and Mr. Grout returned to Chester and engaged in the legitimate practice of his profession.

A petition headed by Thos. Chandler, and signed by 467 others, including numerous citizens of Chester "in behalf of themselves and other inhabitants of the counties of Cumberland and Gloucester," dated Nov. 1, 1770, was addressed to the king's most excellent majesty. The grievances under which they lived were briefly recited. The late attempt to obstruct the court at Chester was alluded to, and the facilities of escape afforded criminals by the unfriendly conduct of New Hampshire—and praying for some measures by which the title to their lands might be placed beyond dispute, and they enjoy the benefits of a settled and efficient government. The late riotous proceedings had aroused the whole community, and they felt that no longer could such things be endured. The courts of Chester were not again molested.

CHAPTER III.

JAIL AND COURT HOUSE AT CHESTER.— ATTEMPTS TO REMOVE THE COUNTY SEAT.

One strong reason for the selection of Chester as the county seat—and a reason that had silenced the opposition of many—was the assurance of Judge Chandler that he would "At his own expense, build a good and sufficient court house or jail," at that place. Judge Chandler was a large land owner in Chester, and the pecuniary benefits which he expected to derive from the increase in value of his real estate, induced this offer. Prior to the summer of 1770, the place used as a jail in Chester is thus described: It "Was a place made in the corner of a dwelling-house or hut, the walls of which house were made of small hackmatack poles, locked together at the corners by cutting notches into the poles, and laying them notch into notch, so as to bring the poles as near together as conveniently might be. The cracks or vacancies between pole and pole, were filled with tow, moss or clay. The chamber floor (was) laid with loose single boards. Such was the house, a corner of which then had the name of a jail, which corner may be justly described as followeth, viz: small palisades or poles of the diameter of about six inches each, (were) set up, one end of them on the lower floor, and the other end reaching one of the joists on which rested the upper floor. These poles resting against the joist, hindered them from falling inward to the jail part, and on the other pole at some inches distant, (was) pegged up with wood pegs, which pole was fixed about parallel with the joist, and prevented the palisades from falling outwards from the jail apartment, and as many of the palisades were not fastened at the top or bottom, nor the chamber floor nailed, it was always in the power of any man who might be put into the jail apartment to push away the loose upper floor boards, and move away the palisades, and be at liberty."

In this apology for a jail, however, one prisoner had been confined. In the year 1770, an order was issued for the imprisonment of Atherton Chaffee, and Chaffee was confined in this jail for four months, under the direction of Daniel Whipple, then sheriff of Cumberland county. The disposition of the prisoner had more to do with the imprisonment than the strength of the jail, for it is related that Chaffee remarked to John Grout, Esq., "That he knew it was out of Whipple's power to confine him against his will, but that Whipple had always used him with great tenderness, and that he should not be hurt; for, says Chaffee, I will tarry in the jail be it never so slender, rather than Whipple should be hurt."

In the summer of the same year, the inhabitants of Chester commenced the erection of another jail. A subscription was raised to aid the enterprise, of which the following is a copy from the original:

"June 16th, 1770.—To encourage the finishing of the Goal now begun in Chester, we the subscribers, will pay to such person or persons as Thomas Chandler, Thomas Chandler, Jr., Esqs., and Mr. John Grout, shall employ to labour or provide materials, the sums against our names written, witness our hands.

Joseph Wood, one bushel of corn.

Willard Dean, two bushels of wheat delivered at Rockingham at the last day of August."

Judge Chandler asserted in 1771, that not one farthing of this subscription had ever been paid. This second jail was built of hemlock logs 20 inches in diameter. But nails were necessary for the completion of the roof. As before stated the inhabitants of Chester in town meeting assembled, had resolved to abide by the non-importation agreement, recommended by the Provincial Congress at its session at Philadelphia, and this agreement was very generally adhered to throughout the colonies. Nails were not manufactured in the colonies, and their agreement prevented the importation of any. Accordingly the new jail was left unfinished. In the meantime the old jail had been accepted by the court and sheriff "As a sufficient" building and had "Held prisoners for more than four months at a time who never left jail until delivered by due course of law." At least such was the claim of Judge Chandler. After the failure to obtain nails for the completion of the new jail, Judge Chandler caused the old jail to be repaired. On the sides it was strengthened, and at right angles with the logs which formed the main body of the house, other logs were placed and pinned. Tradition locates this jail as well as the court house which was subsequently erected, near the present residence of Mr. Albert Baldwin.

At this time no court house had been erected at Chester, and at whose house the courts were holden is not known. Early in the year 1771 many of the inhabitants of Cumberland county, and especially those residing in the towns bordering upon the Connecticut river, endeavored to effect the removal of the county seat from Chester. A petition for that purpose was presented to Governor Dunmore, March 11, 1771, and among other arguments used was the fact that no county buildings had been erected at Chester, as Chandler had promised, and that there was not "Any real probability that any would be built," and besides this it was extremely inconvenient for people residing in the river towns to attend court at Chester, for the roads leading thither were bad, the inhabitants residing there few in number and the accommodations poor. By order of the governor and council a copy of this petition was served upon Thomas Chandler, and the hearing of the matter fixed for the first Tuesday of May, following. Service was made on Chandler April 7, and on the 10th his reply was transmitted to New York, addressed to Gov. Dunmore. His reply gave an explicit denial to the charge that no county buildings had been erected, and then proceeded to describe a jail that had been constructed, and one that had been commenced. The jails above described are those referred to. He proceeded to compare the roads leading into Chester with those leading into Brattleboro, and claimed the former as "vastly better," and thus endeavored to show the superiority of Chester over Brattleboro. As to the accommodations for people attending court, he asserted they were as good as those afforded by any town in the county, that the provisions furnished were as good as elsewhere, and as many spare beds in his opinion could be obtained there, as at any other place in the county. It appears that there were but four or five families residing near the county buildings, but others resided within one mile of them. Yet Judge C. represented that many preferred to camp near the county buildings rather than travel a mile for good accommodations. In regard to the roads to Chester, he asserted that a route, within a year, had been traveled from Chester to Albany, and this was the only one either north or south of Chester, for over 100 miles, with the exception of one in Massachusetts which crossed the Hoosic mountains. Persons coming from Albany to attend court would be compelled if the shire town was changed, to first come to C, and then follow the road leading from there to the newly selected place. With the route over the Hoosic mountains, Judge C. seems not to have been pleased, and gave it a shape like this, "It is difficult and dangerous both for man and horse," and then gave a passing remark to his associate on the bench—Judge Wells of Brattleboro, who was a corpulent man, and who favored the removal of the shire town from Chester, "A corpulent person can hardly get up with the hold of his horse's tail to draw him up by, and if the horse should miss his step, as many horses have often done, he would fall, roll or slip many rods before he would recover."

For some reason the hearing in May was suffered to pass unattended to, and nothing more appears upon the records of the New York Legislature, until Jan. 15, 1772. In the meantime, offers of money toward the erection of the county buildings were made by several towns, in case such town might be declared the county seat. Rockingham offered £70. During this summer Judge Chandler was not idle, but seeing the necessity of making further efforts in order to retain the county seat at Chester, proceeded at his own expense to erect a court house. It was "thirty feet long, sixteen feet wide and eleven feet post," but with what material it was covered, and the manner in which he obtained nails therefor, does not appear. Besides the court room, there was a "sufficient lobby, or room fit for a jury, with a fire place in it." This building was leased to the County for 10 years and for as much longer as the County might wish to occupy it. In this court house it is probable that but two terms of the "Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions of the Peace for the County of Cumberland," were held, that of the first Tuesday of November, 1771, and the brief session of the first Tuesday of June, 1772, when according to the provisions the act of the Provincial Council of Mar. 24, 1772, the judges met and opened the court in due form, and adjourned the same with "all presentments, indictments, suits, causes, complaints, writs, processes and proceedings, whether criminal or civil, and all parties charged, prosecuting or defending therein," to the term then next ensuing to be holden at Westminster.

Jan. 12, 1772, the condition of Cumberland County was again under consideration in the Provincial Council. The House went into committee of the whole and spent considerable time in discussing the subject, when the speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee reported that legislation in relation to Cumberland County was necessary, and proposed, among others, that a bill be brought in to enable the freeholders and inhabitants of that County to provide suitable county buildings, and elect the necessary County officers. Accordingly on the 16th, a bill was presented and passed to a second reading, which named Chester as the County seat. This was probably effected by the influence and arguments of Judge Chandler. The bill on the 29th was read a second time and referred to a committee of the whole House. Judge Chandler was in New York City at this time, and on the 25th addressed a petition to Gov. Wm. Tyron, who had succeeded Dunmore as the chief executive of the Province, and reiterated the same arguments and statements which he had addressed to Dunmore in his first petition or replication. The petition is dated at Ft. George in the City of New York, and in this he did not neglect to describe the court house which during the preceding Summer he had built at Chester, and leased to the County. The advantages possessed by Chester in respect to location and accessibility were enlarged upon, and also the effect upon the settlement of that part of the County remote from the river, which the continuance of the shire at Chester would naturally have. And finally undertook, in case the tax which he asked for completing the court house and jail was not granted, that he would at his own expense complete those buildings, rather than the same should be removed "to the damage of the public." Chandler seems to have employed all his arts and arguments to influence the mind of Gov. Tyron, and his conduct at this and other times indicates a man of considerable tact and shrewdness, and one well calculated for occupying the leading position which he held for many years among the early settlers of Eastern Vermont.

When the news of the riot at Putney, which occurred Jan. 27, reached him, accompanied with the reported threat of the rioters to "go to Chester pull down ye jail" and release the prisoners, he seized upon this circumstance as affording an argument in favor of the object of his journey to and sojourn at New York. After giving the Governor a history of the disturbance he adds:

"If the jail had been in any one of the river towns as prayed for by some, the jail had, by said mad rioters, been pulled down. Your Excellency will therefore see that it will on this account be best to continue the jail and courts in ye centre of the county, if no other reasons were given but to prevent such sudden mischiefs being perpetrated as may be done in a sudden heat of passion."

But the opposite party had by no means been regardless of their interests during this time. On the 22d, a petition signed by the inhabitants of Cumberland County, had been presented and was read before the House, in which the arguments of Chandler were attempted to be refuted. This was referred to the committee of the whole House. And not satisfied to let the matter rest thus, Samuel Wells and four others addressed Gov. Tyron in behalf of themselves and of those who were opposed to the location of the shire town at Chester. Their former assertions were repeated. They represented the court house and jail erected by Chandler as unworthy the name; that the road to Chester was only partly opened, little traveled, poorly constructed and in some places, almost impassable, and the houses in town as mean, slight and uncomfortable, and urged the selection of Westminster as the future County seat. This address or statement was read in the House, Jan. 27, and referred to the same committee as the others.

The bill with some alterations and amendments was passed March 24th. After the first Tuesday in June the next following instead of two, four terms of court were to be holden each year, but each session should not continue longer than four days. The matter of the location of the shire town was referred by the bill to a meeting of the supervisors chosen by each town, who were required to assemble at the court house in Chester on the last Tuesday in May the next ensuing, and by a plurality of votes ascertain the place where the court house and jail were to be erected. The 19th of May was the day appointed for the election of the supervisors. On the 26th of May this representative body assembled as provided in the bill. The names of its members, and of its presiding officers, are unknown. This meeting was one of great interest to the people of Chester, as the continuance of the sessions of the courts at that place would greatly promote the settlement of the town, and add to its character and business. Whatever might have been Chandler's influence among the members of the Provincial Legislature, he seems to have met with defeat among the representatives of the people of his own county. Westminster was selected as the shire town, and a spot therein designated for the location of the court house and jail, and the meeting adjourned.

In an old volume of records now in the office of the clerk of Windham County Court, I have found the following records relating to the transfer of the court from Chester to Westminster and the business of the court after its removal to the latter place:

At a Court of Common Pleas and a Court of General Sessions of the peace for the County of Cumberland at the Court House in Chester in the same County on Tuesday, the second day of June, 1772, in the Twelfth Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord, George the Third by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King Defender of the Faith and so forth.

CHAPTER IV.

In 1773 the court house was completed at Westminster. It was situated on an elevation at the northern extremity of the southern plain, called court house hill. In shape it was nearly square, the sides being about 40 feet. It was built of hewn logs and clap-boarded. On the lower floor in the southeast corner was a kitchen occupied by the jailor, and in the southwest corner a bar room. Each of these rooms was furnished with a large fireplace. The jail was on the north side, on the first floor, having two apartments. A flight of stairs near the east entrance led to the court room in the second story. The sessions of the courts at Westminster from the time of the massacre in April, 1775, were interrupted until 1779, and the civil government in the meantime was in the hands of a committee of safety. The courts were then held in Westminster until 1781, when Cumberland county was abolished.

Cumberland county contained on the 16th of January, 1771, 4,009 white inhabitants and 15 blacks. There were 747 heads of families.

The people of the county were desirous of representation in the Provincial Legislature of New York, and to the number of 152 signed a petition dated 7 December, 1772, addressed to Governor Tyron, praying for this privilege, and on the 23d of the same month the council ordered a writ to issue for the election of two representatives in that county. This was brought about largely through the influence of Judge Chandler.

Samuel Wells of Brattleboro and Creon Brush of Westminster, were elected the first representatives, and in the following February took their seats in the Legislature then in session in New York city. Brush was a native of Dublin, Ireland, and removed to Cumberland county in 1771, and settled in Westminster. He was a large owner of and speculator in lands. He was a tory, and his property was confiscated. He was an influential debater in the Legislature.

Samuel Wells, the other representative, was a farmer and a man of wealth. He was a tory during the revolution, and at its close removed to Canada and settled upon a 1,200 acre tract of land that had been granted him by the king for losses which he had suffered by his loyalty.

Isaac Law, a citizen of New York, took an active part in the affairs preceding the revolution. An effort was made in the city of New York to learn the sentiments of the people in reference to the mother country. Mr. Law as chairman of the committee, wrote to the supervisors of Cumberland county, May 21, 1774, for information. The matter was permitted to slumber until the ensuing fall, when the different towns in the county were invited to send delegates to a convention to be held on the 19th of October at Westminster.

The different towns in the county very generally responded to the call by sending delegates to the convention, which assembled at Westminster in the court house, on the 19th of October, 1774, and continued in session during the following day; 18 delegates were present. Col. John Hazeltine of Townshend was chairman.

The letter of Isaac Low, the act of the British Parliament in laying a duty or tax on tea, for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, the Boston Port bill, and several arbitrary declarations of the British government were read to the convention, and a committee to report resolutions expressing the sense of the convention on these then all absorbing topics, was chosen. John Grout of Chester, Joshua Wells of Westminster, Paul Spooner of Hartford, Edward Harris of Halifax, and Major William Williams of Marlborough, constituted the committee.

The report of the committee was presented on the 20th, and with the resolutions reported was unanimously adopted. I quote from the resolutions:

"Resolved: That as true and loyal subjects of our gracious sovereign, King George the third, of Great Britain, etc., we will spend our lives and fortunes in his service, that as we will defend our king while he reigns over us his subjects, and wish his reign may be long and glorious, so we will defend our just rights, as British subjects, while breath is in our nostrils, and blood in our veins; that considering the late Acts of the British Parliament, for blocking up the port of Boston, etc., which we view as arbitrary and unjust, inasmuch as the Parliament have sentenced them unheard, and dispensed with all the modes of law and justice which we think necessary to distinguish between lawfully obtaining right for property injured, and arbitrarily enforcing to comply with their will, be it right or wrong, we resolve to assist the people of Boston in defense of their liberties to the utmost of our abilities."

In the next resolution they announced in the most explicit terms the rules by which their own conduct should be governed in circumstances in which they might be nearly concerned:

"Sensible," said they, "That the strength of our opposition to the late acts consist in uniform, manly, steady, and determined mode of procedure, we will bear testimony against, and discourage all riotous, tumultuous and unnecessary mobs which tend to injure the persons or properties of harmless individuals, but endeavor to treat those persons whose abominable principles and actions show them to be enemies to American liberty, as loathsome animals not fit to be touched or to have any society or connection with."

A committee of correspondence was chosen to communicate with other committees of correspondence. The chairman was directed to forward the resolutions of the convention to Isaac Low, and the convention adjourned.

On the 18th of November, 1774, another county convention was called to assemble at Westminster, November 30th. This convention duly assembled and "All the resolves of the Continental Congress which had been passed a few weeks previous were adopted, and a promise was made by which the delegates bound themselves as representatives of their constituents, religiously to adhere to the non-importation, non-consumption and non-exportation association.

A third convention was holden at Westminster, February 7, 1775, twelve towns were represented. Colonel Hazeltine was chosen chairman, and Dr. Paul Spooner, clerk. Its session continued through three days. A standing committee of correspondence was selected to keep the inhabitants of the county informed as to the doings of the friends of independence in the different Colonies. Its members were Joshua Webb, Nathaniel Robertson, and Abijah Lovejoy of Westminster, Captain Minard of Putney, Solomon Harvey of Fulham, (now Dummerston,) Nathaniel French of Brattleboro, William Bullock and Hezekiah Stowell of Guilford, Lieutenant Patterson of Hinsdale, Edward Harris of Halifax, Charles Phelps and Captain Whitmore of Marlboro, Elijah Olvord of Draper, Samuel Robertson of Newfane, John Hazeltine and Samuel Fletcher of Townsend, James Rogers of Kent, now Londonderry, Moses Guild of Chester, Moses Wright and Jona Burt of Rockingham, Simon Stevens of Springfield, Hilkiah Grout and Oliver Kidder of Weathersfield, Benjamin Wait of Windsor, Paul Spooner of Hertford, now Hartland, Esq. Burch of Hartford, Jacob Haselton of Woodstock, John W. Dana of Pomfret.

Dr. Spooner, Joshua Webb, Abijah Lovejoy, Solomon Harvey, and Capt. Whitmore were chosen "to serve as monitor to the committee of correspondence, to transfer all letters, and all other matters that are of consequence or intelligence to the chairman, Col. Hazeltin." It was voted not to choose field officers, and the proposition to allow an appeal from a justice court was decided in the negative. Provisions were made for the calling together of the convention in case of necessity, and Chas. Phelps and Dr. Harvey were instructed to prepare for publication an account of the doings of the convention, and the convention adjourned without day.

The Continental Congress assembled at Philadelphia, Sept. 5, 1774, to consult upon measures for the common safety. This meeting was followed by the suspension of British authority in nearly all the American Colonies except New York, which refused to assent to the measures recommended by that body, and the courts of justice were either shut up, or adjourned without transacting any business. The first interruption of the courts of New York occurred at Westminster in Cumberland County, Mar. 14, 1775, and is known as the "Westminster massacre." Though the province of New York had rejected these measures proposed by the Continental Congress, the people of the County of Cumberland had heartily accepted them.

The events at Westminster on the 18th of March, aroused the people of the county, and caused a general disposition to resist the administration of the government of New York, and at a meeting of committees appointed by a large body of inhabitants of Cumberland County, holden at Westminster, April 11, 1775, resolutions were adopted, declaring it to be the "duty of the inhabitants to wholly renounce and resist the administration of the government of New York, till such times as the lives and property of these inhabitants may be secured by it, or till such time as they can have opportunity to lay their grievances before his most Gracious Majesty in Council, with an humble petition to be taken out of so oppressive a jurisdiction, and either annexed to some other government, or erected and incorporated into a new one."

Maj. Abijah Lovejoy was moderator, and Dr. Reuben Jones, clerk of this convention, and Col. Haseltine, Chas. Phelps and Col. Ethan Allen were chosen a committee to prepare a remonstrance and petition to King George.

These proceedings indicate loyalty to the British government, but hatred of New York, and had not the events of April 19, at Lexington, Mass., so soon followed, fully arousing and uniting the Colonies, this controversy would have been settled perhaps by the king. No 'humble petition' was presented by Ethan Allen or any other member of this committee to King George, as contemplated by the resolutions—but we soon find Ethan Allen at Ticonderoga demanding its surrender in the name of Almighty God and the Continental Congress. New York wheeled into line for the common defense and left for a time the Grants in open rebellion to her authority.

A provincial convention was organized in New York, May 22d. but Cumberland County was not represented; however, on the 6th of June, a convention, or "County Congress" was holden at Westminster, and Col. John Hazeltine of Townsend, Dr. Paul Spooner of Hartland, and Maj. Wm. Williams of Westminster were chosen delegates to represent the county in the New York Provincial Congress, and on the 21st day of June, these gentlemen took their seats,—and this Congress adjourned July 8th. Col. Hazeltine remained but three days in the convention—but the other delegates continued to the close of the session. These three gentlemen were re-elected as delegates at a convention holden at Westminster, July 26, but only Wm. Williams took his seat in the convention having been empowered to act singly “in as ample and full a manner” as if all were present.

At a County Convention holden at the Court House in Westminster, Messrs. Spooner and Williams were again returned as delegates from Cumberland County and in February, 1776, Col. Joseph March of Hartford, and Wm. Williams were returned as delegates.

The County Committee of Safety assembled at Westminster Court House and continued in session from June 11 to 21st, 1776. Twenty towns were represented by 34 delegates. The affairs of the county were discussed, and civil and criminal justice administered. Joseph Marsh, John Sessions and Simon Stevens were chosen to represent the county in the New York Provincial Congress from the second Monday in July following, and the following instructions for the guidance of these delegates were prepared and adopted. The sentiments of these instructions are so highly patriotic, and embody so many principles that are now engrafted into our system of State laws, that it is deemed proper to insert here the following extracts:

“First—we instruct you to use your influence to establish a government in this Colony agreeable to the maxim, viz: that all civil power (under God) is originally in the people, and that you in no instance, in your public capacity, will do anything to abridge the people of this fundamental right. * * * *

“Second—that you use your best influence in Congress to adopt such a code of laws, whereby the liberty, property and everything dear to the inhabitants of this colony and America in general, shall be founded on a permanent basis, a few of which laws we humbly beg leave to suggest, might be made or enacted, viz: laws for establishing religion and literature, so that ministers of the Gospel may be supported and schools set up, which must have a tendency to promote virtue and good manners.

“Third, we think it would much conduce to the happiness of this county to have a court of justice, so soon as may be properly organized, to take cognizance of all criminal actions. At the same time we desire that men of character, integrity, knowledge and virtue, who belong to our own county, may sustain the offices in such an important department. The ancient trial by jury, we have a great veneration for. In order that our future courts may be supplied with grand jurors, we humbly request that the Honorable Congress would adopt the following method for this county, viz.: That each town through the county, at their annual meetings shall elect their proportion of men, who shall serve as grand jurors, the ensuing year, and that their names shall be properly returned in the clerk's office in order that the jury, when so chosen, may inform the advocates, who shall prosecute criminal actions of all misdemeanors in the county, passing within their knowledge. The petit jurors, in like manner, we would be glad, might be chosen annually, and that their names, being enrolled, may be returned in the clerk's office, and where so returned, may be drawn by lot for the service of the ensuing year; * * * * that all deeds may be recorded by the town clerk in each town. * * *

“Lastly—* * * we desire that each town in this county may nominate their own justices, and that they may not be appointed without such nomination. That justice, religion and virtue may prevail in this colony and that peace and tranquility may be restored through America is the sincere desire of the Committee of Safety for Cumberland county.”

The right of the “Grants” to secede from New York was among the subjects of discussion; some of the members favored a union with Massachusetts. A letter was prepared, addressed to the members of the Provincial Congress, in which was expressly reserved the right of the people of Cumberland county, in the event that the Provincial Congress should fail in establishing a government independent of the Crown, to be governed by the principles embraced in the instructions to their delegates, to disavow “every clause, article and paragraph of such an institution,” and the further right of pursuing “their former petition in behalf of the people, prepared some years ago, and referred to the great and General Assembly of the ancient, ever respectable and most patriotic government of the Massachusetts Bay Province, that the whole district described in said petition may be hereafter re-united to that province.

Another meeting of the committee was commenced July 23d, and ended 26th, and eighteen towns were represented. A quantity of powder, 1,800 pounds, which had been received from the New York authorities, was deposited in one of the jail rooms of the court house, and a sergeant and four privates were detailed to guard it by night, and a sergeant and two privates by day. "Necessary vittling and a half pint of rum to each man, once in 24 hours" were supplied, and measures adopted for the detection of spies and informers.

At the July session of the New York Provincial Congress, Cumberland county was represented by Messrs. Marsh, Stevens and Sessions. The commissary was directed to furnish 4,500 pounds of lead for the use of the county, and Mr. Sessions was deputed to forward the lead to the general committee of the county, and the committee were required "To attend carefully to the disposition" of this supply among the militia. For the protection of the frontier from raids by Indians the convention resolved to raise ranging parties, and 252 men were ordered to be raised by Cumberland and Gloucester counties, and the force to be divided into four companies. The command of this battalion was entrusted to a major, chosen by the convention. Joab Hoisington of Windsor, was unanimously elected "Major of the rangers." On the 6th day of August the committees of safety for Cumberland and Gloucester counties met at Windsor and made nominations for officers of the four companies of the rangers. Commissions were granted to the following, October 10, 1776, under authority of the New York convention:

CAPTAINS.

Benjamin Wait.
John Strong.
Joseph Hatch.
Abner Seeley.

FIRST LIEUTENANTS.

Elisha Hawley.
Eldad Benton.
Simon Stevens.
Benjamin Whitney.

SECOND LIEUTENANTS.

Zebulon Lyon.
John Barnes.
Amos Chamberlain.
Jehiel Robbins.

The militia of Cumberland and Gloucester counties were formed into one brigade and Jacob Bagley of Newbury was appointed brigadier-general and Simon Stevens of Springfield, brigade major. Two paper regiments were formed and officered under the authority of New York.

To the rangers a bounty of $25 was allowed to each non-commissioned officer and private upon his passing muster, and in lieu of rations, a certain sum was promised weekly in the following ratio: To each captain, 16s.; each lieutenant, 14s.; and to each non-commissioned officer and private, 10s.; and each was to equip himself "with a good musket or fire lock, powder horn, bullet-pouch and tomahawk, blanket and knapsack."

Major Hoisington took his position at Newbury that he might be able to watch the movements of the Indians and Tories, and guard the frontier from their incursions, and was able to send to Gens. Gates and Schuyler much valuable information concerning the plans and movements of the enemy, obtained from spies and Tories, but the active services of the rangers were not called for during this year, though the movements of the enemy on the Canadian border and Lake Champlain caused much uneasiness throughout Cumberland county.

A session of the County Committee of Safety assembled at Westminster, November 5th and the friends of the formation of a new State made the session exciting and stormy. Sixteen towns were represented. Charles Phelps of Townsend had written a letter under date of June 21st, to the New York convention, expressive of the sentiments of the committee, as above detailed. The friends of New York wished to withdraw this letter, while the friends of a new State were not disposed to recall it. The motion to withdraw prevailed; but the minority strongly resented this action, and entered their protests against any further action of the Committee as then constituted. A compromise was however effected—by adopting a report withdrawing the letter—but asserting the right of petition, and that "if upon proper deliberation it may be thought proper a separation should be most conducive to the peace and happiness of this county, we do not preclude ourselves from the privilege of presenting our petition to the Honorable Continental Congress." These sentiments were embodied in the form of a letter and sent to the New York convention, and the Committee of Safety adjourned to meet on the first Tuesday of June, 1777, "and not sooner except on emergent call." A session was held at Brattleboro, December 2d, but no business was accomplished.

CHAPTER V.

A convention of delegates from the several towns in the Grants was holden at Dorset, January 16, 1776. This convention adopted a petition and address to the Continental Congress, in which their unflinching attachment to the cause of liberty and independence was avowed, but at the same time they had determined not to submit to the odious and galling jurisdiction of New York. But Congress did not reach any decision upon this petition.

The Declaration of American Independence having been published, it was deemed proper to call another convention to ascertain the state of public feeling on this subject, and accordingly a convention was holden at Dorset, July 24, 1776, at which delegates from 25 towns were present. The convention by adjournment re-assembled at Dorset, September 25th, and at Westminster January 15, 1777. Public feeling had been aroused, and it was ascertained that more than three-fourths of the people of Cumberland county were favorable to an independent State government. At this Westminster convention a declaration expressive of their sentiments was adopted, declaring "That the district of territory comprehending and usually known by the name and description of the New Hampshire Grants, of right ought to be, and is hereby declared forever, hereafter, to be considered as a free and independent jurisdiction or State, by the name, and forever hereafter, to be called, known and distinguished, by the name of New Connecticut, alias Vermont."

The convention after sitting until the 22d, adjourned to meet at Windsor on the first Wednesday in June, following; but first adopted an address to the Continental Congress, setting forth the controversy with New York, and claiming recognition as one of "The free and independent American States," and that delegates therefrom be admitted to seats in the grand Continental Congress.

The convention assembled at Windsor in pursuance of adjournment, on the first Wednesday of June, and a committee appointed to make a draft of a constitution, and each town was recommended to elect a delegate to meet in convention at Windsor, on the 2d day of July following.

July 2d the convention met at Windsor, in the hall of a hotel, which has since been known as the Constitution House. Until the fall of 1869 the building occupied its place on the main street.

The draft of a constitution was presented and read, and the convention proceeded to consider its provisions with deliberation, and while having the subject under consideration, the news of the evacuation of Ticonderoga arrived, and the Convention was on the point of adjourning without completing their labors, when a violent storm accompanied with thunder and lightning broke upon them; they remained in session, the constitution was read and adopted, but was never submitted to the people of the State for their approval or disapproval.

The first Legislature of the State of Vermont assembled at Windsor, March 12, 1778, and on the 17th of that month all the land lying between the Green Mountains and Connecticut river was erected into a county, to be called Unity, but this name was changed to Cumberland on the 21st, and on the 24th this large county was divided into two shires, the old dividing line between Gloucester and Cumberland counties being adopted as the line of separation between the two shires. Newbury was the name assigned to the northern shire, and Westminster to the southern shire.

A Court of Confiscation was established by the Council on the 26th, to have jurisdiction over, and power to confiscate and sell lands in the county adjudged forfeited. Col. Joseph Marsh, Gen Jacob Bagley, Maj. Thomas Murdock, Benjamin Emmons, Esq., Dr. Paul Spooner, and Col. Benjamin Carpenter, were the members of this court.

On the 24th the Assembly made choice of judges for the shire of Newbury, Jacob Bailey, Jacob Barton, William Heaton, Reuben Foster and John French; for the Westminster shire, John Sheperdson of Guilford, Stephen Tilden of Hartford, Hubbel Wells of Halifax, Hezekiah Thomson of Windsor, and Nathaniel Robinson of Westminster.

At a session of the General Assembly holden at Bennington, in June, 1778, a special court was established for Westminster shire, and John Sheperdson, Stephen Tilden, Hezekiah Thomson of Windsor, Samuel Fletcher of Townsend, and Joshua Webb of Rockingham, appointed the judges. And also a special court for Newbury shire, and Deacon Smalley, Deacon John Barnett, William Heaton, Benjamin Baldwin, and Reuben Foster, appointed judges.

Very many of the inhabitants of Vermont were Tories during the revolution. Some of them were large land owners, and early measures were taken to confiscate their lands and thus replenish the treasury and aid in the common defence. In addition to the Court of Confiscation, on the 30th of April, 1779, commissioners for the sale of these confiscated estates were appointed. Major Thomas Chandler had jurisdiction in the towns of Rockingham, Chester, and Westminster; Captain Ebenezer Curtis in the towns of Windsor, Hertford, (now Hartland,) Woodstock and Reading.

Meantime the Court of Confiscation was established on a different basis, and the powers which had formerly belonged to it were, on the 2d of June, 1779, vested in the governor and any two of his council.

At the session of the Legislature in October justices of the peace were appointed in 18 towns, and two of the Probate Districts were supplied with judges.

The friends of New York were not idle spectators of these proceedings. They denied the jurisdiction of the State of Vermont, and though they were not sufficiently numerous to establish and hold a superior court, yet justices of the peace were appointed, and other civil and military officers for the county, and many towns were thus provided with two sets of officials, the one deriving their authority from the State of Vermont, the other from New York.

In August, 1778, an attempt was made to ascertain the views of a majority of the citizens of the southern part of the county, on this question of the jurisdiction. It appears that in the towns of Hinsdale, Guilford, Halifax, Brattleboro, Marlboro, Draper, Fulham, Newfane, Putney, Westminster, Springfield and Weathersfield, there were at this time 480 voters who supported New York, 320 who supported Vermont, and 185 who were neutral in opinion.

The Superior Court was appointed to be holden at Westminster on the 2d Thursday of March, 1779, and at Newbury on the 2d Thursday of September, 1779. At the first session of the Superior Court at Westminster, the first case tried was that of Pompey Brakkee of Chester, a negro, plf., against Elijah Lovell of Rockingham, deft. The exact nature of the complaint does not appear, but Brakkee won damages to the amount of £400 and costs. At an adjourned term of the court holden May 26, Stephen R. Bradley of Westminster, was appointed clerk of the court, and at the same term Bradley and Noah Smith were admitted and sworn as attorneys of the court, and at the same term Nathan Stone, a citizen of Windsor, but an adherent of New York, was arraigned, having been charged with using "Reproachful and scandalous words on the 15th of March, concerning the authority of the State of Vermont." The offence consisted in having said to John Benjamin, Esq., the sheriff of the county of Cumberland, "G—d—you and your governor and council." Stone pleaded guilty and was fined £20 lawful money, and costs, and was obliged to give bonds in £1000 as a guaranty for his future good conduct.

On the 18th of August, 1778, the authorities of New York, still claiming jurisdiction over the county, had by virtue of the Constitution of the State of New York, appointed a full complement of officials for the county. Pelatiah Fitch of Halifax, John Sessions of Westminster, and James Clay of Putney, were commissioned judges of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas. Eleazer Patterson, Hilkiah Grout and Stephen Greenleaf, assistant justices of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas. Micah Townsend, county clerk; Simeon Edwards, sheriff; James Clay, surrogate.

These judicial officers never were permitted to exercise the functions of their respective offices in Cumberland county. There were some conflicts between the Vermont officials and the adherents of New York, but it is not my purpose to give a detailed account of them. Such accounts more appropriately being given in the local histories of the towns in which the conflicts happened. Judges, justices of the peace and sheriff were appointed by the New York authorities, as late as June 5, 1782.

CHAPTER VI.

The New York Convention of representatives in session at Kingston, Apr. 25, 1777, directed all county and sub-committees to use their utmost endeavors to apprehend, secure and otherwise in their discretion to dispose of all such persons as were inimical or dangerous to the State until further orders from the New York Legislature. The right of appeal from any sub-committee to the general committee was not to be abridged; and again on the 5th of May the committee of Cumberland county were especially requested and empowered to take the most effectual measures to prevent, surprise and quell all insurrections, revolts and disaffections; and were empowered to call out the militia and cause "all such traitorous inhabitants of this State as shall be found in arms against the authority of the same, to be destroyed or otherwise effectually secured."

It was well known in the convention that a strong spirit of disaffection existed in Cumberland county, that a majority of the towns refused allegiance to the authority of the State of New York; and therefore the convention proceeded on the 10th day of May to resolve "that such of the members of the committee as should meet on due and regular notice, should be authorized to proceed to business."

May 19th a warrant was issued to the sheriff of Cumberland county directing him to order an election for State officers under the constitution of New York. The sheriff of Cumberland county was Paul Spooner, appointed May 5, 1777, but he declined the office and no election was holden under the above warrant.

James Clay, however, acting as chairman of the county committee, sent letters to the several towns in the county ordering the election of members of the County Committee of Safety. The inhabitants of Windsor met May the 20th and voted by a great majority not to proceed to act according to the orders of the State of New York. The inhabitants of Townsend assembled June 2nd and instructed Joseph Tyler, the member of the County Committee from that town, not to act with the County Committee agreeable to the new constitution of the State of New York, "Because in our opinion we do not belong to the jurisdiction of that State."

June 4, 1777, the Yorker Committee of Safety met at the court house in Westminster. Westminster, Putney, Brattleboro, Hinsdale, Hartford, Springfield, Kent, and Pomfret, were represented. James Clay was chosen chairman and Simon Stevens clerk. The convention adjourned until afternoon, hoping for a more full attendance, and again to the 5th, when they voted, "Not to go upon the public business of the county until a fuller number of the committee were present," and adjourned until the 17th inst.

On the 17th this committee again assembled at Westminster. Putney, Westminster, Brattleboro, Springfield and Weathersfield being represented—they adjourned until the following day—when a further adjournment was had until the 26th, at the house of John Sargeant in Brattleboro. And on the 26th the committee reassembled at Brattleboro, "being terrified by threats from the people who are setting up a new State here they thought it imprudent to proceed to any business at Westminster," and concluded to go to a more congenial atmosphere at Brattleboro.

The members present at Brattleboro were: James Clay and Lucius Wilson of Putney, Michel Gilson of Westminster, Obediah Wells and John Sargeant of Brattleboro, Luke Knowlton of Newfane, Hilkiah Grout of Weathersfield, and Eleazer Patterson and Amos Tute of Hinsdale—the forlorn hope of the Yorkers.

Hilkiah Grout was chosen clerk. The convention voted to make a true representation of the broken state of the inhabitants of the county of Cumberland, and assign some reason why the county committee did not proceed agreeable to the resolves of the convention of the State of New York in respect "of their choosing Governors and Delegates to send to convention."

James Clay, Eleazer Patterson and Hilkiah Grout were chosen a committee to draft a representation and lay before the convention. The committee reported, and their report was accepted, and Messrs. Patterson and Grout appointed a committee to carry the representation to the convention of the State of New York.

These gentlemen were furnished with proper credentials stating that the expense of the journey is borne by private subscription "as the divided State of the county renders it impossible to raise any money in any public way, therefore the committee prays the assembly or convention give their assistance in this affair."

The committee then adjourned to meet on the first Tuesday of September, at the court house in Westminster.

The report of the committee set forth that the convention held at Windsor on the fourth day of June instant, for the purpose of establishing the new State of Vermont, have taken into their possession the prison of the county and have strictly forbid all committees acting under the authority of the State of New York—so that it is become impracticable to proceed to any public business in the county—that "the public peace is so interrupted by the proceedings of the convention at Windsor, that it hath already hindered the raising of men for the common defence; that the friends of the new State were pursuing their own private interests rather than the public weal, adding what was no doubt fully true, "We really believe that without the interposition of the Honorable Continental Congress they will never submit to the authority of the State of New York until obliged to do so by the sword."

Eleazer Patterson and Hilkiah Grout were deputed to present said report to the New York convention, and this service was performed by Col. Patterson, but the records of the convention do not show any action to have been taken in regard to it.

Sept. 2, 1777, the New York Committee of Safety met at Westminster, at the court house, pursuant to adjournment from Brattleboro.

Mr. Rust of Hartford, Mr. Gilson of Westminster, Mr. Simons of Rockingham, Messrs. Simon, Stevens and Powers of Springfield, Mr. Sargeant of Chester and Hilkiah Grout of Weathersfield, were the only persons present. An adjournment was had until the next day, with no addition to their numbers, when a motion was made "to send some suitable person to the convention or Legislature of the State of New York to inform them of the conduct of the Pretended Council and Pretended Committee of the State of Vermont, and take their advice and directions thereon," but the motion was rejected by a vote of four to three, and the committee adjourned to the second Tuesday of November.

The new State of Vermont was successfully formed and met with the hearty approval of a large majority of the people, but still the adherents of New York, though few in numbers, were not disposed to yield the contest, and held several meetings at Brattleboro, where seems to have been their headquarters, to take measures to carry out their views. At a meeting held at that place, April 15, 1778, representatives from Guilford, Brattleboro, Putney, Newfane, Hinsdale and Rockingham, were present, and adopted a protest in the form of an address, "To the gentlemen convened at Windsor, under the style of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont," against the formation of the new State. The towns of Weathersfield and Westminster concurred in the sentiments of the address. The protestors state: "Therefore, on behalf of ourselves and those who delegated us for that purpose, we publicly declare that as we have not in any way assisted in, or consented to the forming of a separate and independent government, we shall not consider ourselves bound by any acts of the Legislature thereof," and declare their allegiance due to the State of New York.

The opposition thus declared did not confine itself to words, but as subsequent events show, developed itself by resisting the precepts of the courts and the new State officials.

An enumeration of the friends of New York was made and it appeared that in the towns of Hinsdale, Guilford, Halifax, Brattleboro, Marlboro, Draper, Fulham, Newfane, Putney, Westminster, Springfield and Weathersfield, 480 voters supported New York, 320 the jurisdiction of Vermont and 185 were neutral in opinion.

A convention of the disaffected was holden at Brattleboro, May 4, 1779, and addressed a long petition to Gov. Clinton of New York, setting forth the acts of authority of "the partizans for a new State," in confiscating property, in attempting to exercise judicial and military authority "over those who continue loyal to the State of New York," assessing and collecting taxes, etc., and urging the governor to take effectual and immediate measures for protecting the loyal subjects of New York and to convince Congress of the impropriety of delaying to interfere in regard to the jurisdiction of New York over the "Grants."

Samuel Minot was chairman of this convention, and committees were present from the towns of Hinsdale, Guilford, Brattleboro, Fulham, Putney. Westminster, Rockingham, Springfield and Weathersfield. About this time a military association appears to have been formed in this county, to resist the authority of the State of Vermont. Ethan Allen was directed by the governor to raise the militia for the purpose of suppressing it. Upon receiving intelligence of this, Col. Patterson, who held a commission in this county under the authority of New York, addressed Gov. Clinton, under the date of May 5, requesting directions how to proceed, and suggesting the necessity of sending the militia of Albany county to his assistance.

Governor Clinton answered this communication and the petition of May 4, with assurances of protection, and recommending that the authority of Vermont should in no instance be acknowledged, except in the alternative of submission or inevitable ruin.

On the 18th of May, Gov. Clinton wrote to the President of Congress, urging the immediate interposition of Congress, "That he daily expected he should be obliged to order out a force for the defence of those who adhered to New York. That the wisdom of Congress would suggest to them what would be the consequence of submitting the controversy, specially at that juncture, to the decision of the sword."

June 1, 1779, this letter from Governor Clinton, the petition of the committee of Cumberland county, the letter of Colonel Patterson, and Governor Clinton's reply, were laid before Congress, and a committee of five, Messrs. Ellsworth, Edwards, Witherspoon, Atlee, and Root, were chosen "To repair to the inhabitants of the Grants, and enquire into the reason why they refuse to continue citizens of the respective States which heretofore exercised jurisdiction over the said District. * * * And that they take every prudent measure to promote an amicable settlement of all differences, and prevent divisions and animosities so prejudicial to the United States."

While the subject was engaging the attention of Congress, Allen marched with an unarmed force and made prisoners of the colonel and militia officers who were acting under the authority of the State of New York, and this was practically the end of the New York authority within this county.

Without pursuing the subject further in detail, the corporate existence of Cumberland county was terminated by an act of the Legislature, passed February, 1781, "For the division of counties within the State." Cumberland county was subdivided into the counties of Windham, Windsor, and Orange.

BRATTLEBORO.

BY HENRY BURNHAM.

The population of this town, now about 6,000, is principally in two villages called East and West village. The West village is nearest the geographical centre of the town. It was formerly the larger and only village, where were the church privileges, town meetings, June trainings, etc. In consequence of the navigation of the Connecticut river—which forms the eastern boundary of the East village, and of the town for about six miles—and the enterprising character and efforts of Wm. Fessenden, John Holbrook, Francis Goodhue, and others, the East village received an impulse, early in the present century, which caused it to far surpass the West village in business and population.

The town derives its name from William Brattle, from Massachusetts—one of the grantees of the town—and his name is the first one upon the list. Being loyal to King George, he fled to Nova Scotia at the commencement of the Revolutionary War. It is said he died there before the close of the war, and, after the "Jay treaty," his heirs made efforts to recover his confiscated property in this country. How much land he owned in this town, we are not informed; but his claim covered some of the best land in the town of Putney, which is ten miles north of Brattleboro. It has long been quite universally believed that the first civilized establishment in Vermont was at Fort Dummer, which was erected in the southeast corner of the town of Brattleboro in 1724. Hon. David Reed, in his account of Colchester, ably maintains and claims this honor for Isle LaMotte, in the county of Grand Isle. [See Isle LaMotte, this work, Vol. II.—Ed.] Though it is evident that the several histories of the State have been led into the error of claiming too much for this town, it is equally evident, we believe, that the first English or Anglo-Saxon settlement, in this State, was made on what is now soil of Brattleboro, by the erection of "His Majesty's Fort Dummer," as stated in the charter. Twenty-nine years after this settlement, Brattleboro was chartered under George II., and Josiah Willard, Esq., chosen or appointed Moderator of the first town meeting.

State of New Hampshire, }

CONCORD, Sept. 26, 1869. }

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the Record of the Charter of Brattleborough as recorded in "Charter Records," Vol. 1, pages 181, 2, 3, 4.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the Seal of said State the date above written.

NATHAN W. GOVE,
Deputy Secretary of State.

The town contains about 34 square miles, in latitude 42 deg., 52 min., and longitude 40 deg., 25 min. It is bounded N. by Dummerston, E. by Connecticut River, which separates it from Chesterfield, N. H., S. by Vernon and Guilford, and W. by Marlboro. Among the first settlers were John and Thomas Sargent, John Alexander, John Arms, and Fairbank Moore and son. With the exception of John and Thomas Sargent—who were born at Fort Dummer—they were from Massachusetts. The father and brother of John Sargent, Jr., were ambushed by the Indians; the father killed and scalped and the brother carried into captivity, where he adopted the Indian habits and manners, but afterwards returned to his friends. Fairbank Moore and son were killed by Indians at the West River meadows—now owned by the Vermont Asylum—two miles north of Fort Dummer, and the wife and daughter of the younger Moore were captured.

John Alexander died in Marlboro, July 8, 1828, supposed to be near 90 years of age. At the time Bridgeman's Fort was burned by the Indians—the site of which is now in Vernon, and a short distance from Fort Dummer—where Mrs. Howe and others were made captive by said Indians, John Alexander was a lad 10 years old, and then in the woods after the cows belonging to the fort; being thus in the woods he escaped captivity. The following year he gave proof of a daring spirit for a boy of only eleven years. He discovered a bear and two cubs a short distance from his residence. His father being absent, he, fearless of consequences, repaired to the house, took down a loaded gun, and with a well directed shot killed the old bear on the spot. He then, with a lad of similar age, caught and secured both of the cubs.

In the old French War, so called, at the age of 17, he served under Gen. Amherst, and was at the taking of Ticonderoga, and in the American Revolution was at the taking of Burgoyne. He resided in Brattleboro more than half a century and reared a large family. Few men have lived to his age and enjoyed so great a measure of health; and very few men of his stature, which was below the middle size, have been more active, robust and herculean than Mr. Alexander. He, at one time, carried on his shoulders, upon snow-shoes, a five-pail iron kettle, two sap-buckets, an axe and trap-pings, a knapsack, four day's provisions, a gun and ammunition, more than three miles through the woods, over hills, valleys, and in a deep snow. He was the second white person born, and, at the time of his decease, the oldest living of the first native settlers on the New Hampshire grants, alias Vermont.

At the time Colonel Samuel Wells represented this place, this side of the mountain was called Cumberland County. He represented this part of the State, at New York, until Ethan Allen came down here, in his wrath, to repair the politics of Brattleboro and Guilford.

The man who said, "Rather than submit to the authority of Great Britain, or even the State of New York, I will retire with the Green Mountain boys into the mountains and caves of the earth, and wage war with human nature at large," also said, "Unless the inhabitants of Brattleboro and Guilford peaceably submit to the authority of Vermont, their territory shall be made as desolate as Sodom and Gomorrah."

This proclamation, with the "last arguments to which kings resort," cured the York State proclivities in this part of the State. And no wonder that New York power and influence ceased, for all she ever did in defence of her persecuted friends, advocates and officers in this part of the State, was to use brave words and make promises that were never performed.

Allen knew brave words or law was vain without force, therefore he brought all these with him when he rested at the hotel kept by John Arms, a few rods north of and on premises now owned by the Vermont Asylum.

Among the men of this town most distinguished in the annals of the State, and who have been men of influence here, may be mentioned John Arms, Samuel Wells, Samuel Knight, Samuel Gale, Henry Wells, Sam'l Stearns, Micah Townshend, Stephen Greenleaf, William Wells, John Stewart, Royall Tyler, John Noyes, Lemuel Whitney, John W. Blake, Francis Goodhue, Oliver Chapin, William Fessenden, Joseph Clark, John Holbrook, Samuel Clark, Sam'l Elliott, James Elliott, Jonathan Hunt, Jr., Thomas G. Fessenden, Joseph Fessenden, Jonathan D. Bradley, Edward A. Kirkland, C. Townsley, L. G. Mead, Paul Chase.

Most of the foregoing names can be seen, in marble, at the cemeteries in this town. It is impossible to obtain biographical sketches of all these persons, but we have succeeded in getting some information respecting the lives or career of twelve of the persons afore-named, three of whom have been members of the United States House of Representatives, viz: John Noyes, James Elliott, Jonathan Hunt, Jr.

SAMUEL KNIGHT

Was a man of high culture and one of the most talented men of his time. He was, for years, Chief Justice of the courts in this country, and one of our early town representatives.

JOHN W. BLAKE

Was one of the foremost lawyers of Windham County. He came to this place, from Bellows Falls, about 1790; was one of the earliest postmasters in this place; represented the town in the Legislature, was a large owner of real estate in the East village, which he sold to Francis Goodhue in 1811. He died October 27, 1818, aged 59 years.

JONATHAN HUNT, JR.,

Was first president of the first bank established in Brattleboro. He built the large brick house now owned and occupied by George Howe, Esq. He died, while a Member of Congress, at Washington, May 15, 1832, aged 45 years.

LARKIN G. MEAD

Came from Chesterfield, N. H., about 1838, was president of the Brattleboro Typographic Co., was in the practice of law; very active in promoting the cause of common school education; the first to move in establishing the savings bank in this place, and for over twenty years was treasurer of that institution. He raised a talented family, and one of his sons, L. G. Mead, Jr., grandson of John Noyes, has a world-wide reputation as a sculptor.

Further descriptions of the character and doings of others upon the foregoing list of names can be found in our biographical department, and quite extended notices of Micah Townshend, Samuel Wells, Samuel Knight, Royall Tyler and Samuel Gale can be found in Hall's History of Eastern Vermont.

AN ACADEMY

Was incorporated in 1801, and the building for the same erected at the West village. The hall in this building was used for town meetings until 1855, when the town constructed, at the East village, on Main street, a large brick, two-story building for this purpose. The upper room is over 100 feet long, over 60 feet wide, and 20 feet in height.

WEST BRATTLEBORO ACADEMY AND FEMALE SEMINARY.

William R. Hayes, a native of West village, left an appropriation, by will, for building an academy at said village. The conditions of the will having been complied with, the building was erected in 1853.

Rev. Hiram Orcutt, in 1859, erected a large three-story building and established a female seminary near the old academy, and the later one built in part by the Hayes appropriation, and, by consent of parties, occupied the three buildings for the seminary school.

At the East village a high school building was erected by a joint stock company in 1831. Deacon John Holbrook, John L. Dickerman and others were first officers, either trustees or committee for building this school house. The site was pleasant, and all conditions seemed favorable, but the school never was prosperous for any great length of time. In 1841, the house was purchased by the district to be used in teaching the advanced scholars from the primary schools. In 1868, a wing upon each side was added.

The soil of this township is similar to that generally found along the Connecticut River, intervals of sand, loam and gravel, with the timber adapted to them.

The principal streams are West River and Whetstone Brook. The former runs but a short distance in town, entering it from Dummerston, near the northeast corner.

Whetstone Brook rises in Marlboro and runs through this town near the centre, affording excellent water privileges, occupied by a variety of mills and other machinery.

The Connecticut River is crossed at the south part of the East village by a bridge, connecting this town with Hinsdale, N. H. The first bridge was built in 1804. Oliver Chapin was a pioneer in this enterprise and owned a large share of stock in the same. A few rods above this bridge was the general landing-place for merchandise, which was formerly brought by flat-boats from Hartford, Ct. After Mr. John Holbrook—the pioneer of this method of freighting goods to Brattleboro—had abandoned importing West India goods to this place, the boating business was carried on many years by G. C. Hall, F. Goodhue & Son, John R. Blake & Co., &c. From 1828 to 1831 these gentlemen, with other enterprising men in towns on the river, made commendable efforts—worthy of a greater success than they achieved—to navigate the river by steam. But some of those enterprising men have lived to see a greater success, by using the river bank on which to employ steam, than the most sanguine of them ever dared to hope from using the river. The steam cars first entered Brattleboro in February, 1848, bringing such a multitude of visitors that the hotels could not accommodate them.

MINERALOGY AND GEOLOGY.

Not enough of any kind of metals have been found here for any practical purpose. A small amount of lead and gold has been found near Whetstone Brook. * "Actinolite is found in steatite. It is in very perfect capillary crystals, which are grouped together in different forms, and sometimes radiated mica is found of rose-red color with schorl in quartz, and abundance of schorl in beautiful crystals; also the red oxide of titanium." Argillaceous slate is very abundant, and is quarried to considerable extent. Some large granite boulders have been found of sufficient size to split into blocks for steps and other building purposes, and no lack of sufficient clay for brick making. Fine roofing slate is found within three miles of the East village, and though it is in the town of Guilford, it is just as well for the interest of builders here as though found in town.

It is the belief of geologists that there has been a time when the Connecticut River ran where is now the East village, and that it has now worn for itself a rocky bed against the base of Wantastiquet Mountain which, from present appearances, will effectually check its further progress in that direction.

descendants of Captain Thomas, we notice, have a boat which they now keep at the same place where he rowed the heroic Stark across the Connecticut River when on his way to use forcible, and, as events showed, fully demonstrated arguments at Bennington, to prove that the English troops had "got too far from Canada."

INDIAN RELICS.

Indian relics have been found near Fort Dummer, and we have in our possession an Indian pipe-bowl, flint arrow-heads, and a stone pestle for pounding corn. They were found by Mr. Holland Pettis, some 30 years since, when ploughing in "The Cove" near West River. His plough point threw up a human skull. It was clearly apparent, upon examination, that the individual (believed to be an Indian chief) was buried in a sitting posture, and the arrow-heads, pipe and pestle were buried with him, that he might not enter upon another life with the same destitution of the means of protection and defence as he entered upon this life. Articles of a more perishable nature, long since decayed, were probably buried with him. A son of Mr. Pettis—W. H. Pettis—who gave us the foregoing information and the relics afore-named, gave vent to his emotions as follows:

"It was here the old chieftain once sailed his canoe,
With his band of red warriors, so valiantly true,
Upon the dark bosom of the slow-heaving wave,
Till he passed from his wars to the shadowy grave."

In consequence of this and other evidences of the proclivities or abilities of W. H. Pettis in this department of human expression, we have for many years called him the "Bard of West River."

Indian hieroglyphics can now be seen upon rocks in West River Cove, and, from location and circumstances, it is believed that this place was one of the favorite resorts of the wild red man of the forest.

About sixteen years ago Mr. Newman Allen, whose farm is on West River meadows, found two partially decayed human skeletons. In one of the skulls was found an old-fashioned lead musket ball, and there was a hole in the cranium where the ball entered. It is possible, and it seems quite probable, that these were the remains of Fairbank Moore and son, of Fort Dummer, who were killed on these meadows by the Indians.

We learn from the last document, in the foregoing, that the first settled minister in this town came from Hadley. We have many more ancient papers, similar in kind, but they are of no farther use than to find names of the early settlers which are signed to them. We give the names below, not given heretofore, as follows, 1769 to 1786:

Jacob Spaldin, Abner Scovell, Oliver Harris, Josiah Wheeler, Thos. Cumption, Wm. McCune, Wm. Brall, Richard Prouty, Doct. Dickerman, John Houghton, Elisha Pierce, Eben'r Howze, Wm. Ellas, Benj'm Gorten, Joseph Whipple, David Church, Lemuel Kendrick, Seth Smith, Joshua Wilder, Ebenezer Hadley, Jonathan Herrick, Silas Houghton, Joseph Burt, Eben'r Fisher, O. Cook, John Griffin, Sam'l Wariner, Daniel Johnson.

The following was called forth in reply to a resolution or vote of the town, Sept. 23. 1774, as follows:

"At town meeting assembled voted, that the Rev. Abner Reeve be the settled minister of this town upon his acceptance hereof and relinquishing from this date the covenant, made by him with many of the inhabitants of this town for his support, for so long a time—and no longer—as he is able to supply the pulpit with preaching, on this condition, however, that the said Mr. Reeve by virtue hereof be not entitled to any land in this town given by public authority to the first settled minister."

The next vote states the amount of salary and how it shall be paid, in barter, &c., all showing sharp practice, and a disposition, on the part of the town, to obtain the gospel with the least possible expense. Mr. Reeve made in writing the following reply,

"GENTLEMEN: You have sent me a conditional vote, with which I cordially comply, if your meaning and intention be not to weaken or destroy my claim to the Lands in this town granted to the first settled minister of the Gospel, previous to passing said vote."

Upon receiving the communication of Mr. Reeve, the town acted upon the same in this wise:

"Voted that this town do not intend by the preceding vote to weaken or destroy any claim which the Rev. Abner Reeve heretofore had to the right of lands in this town, granted to the first settled minister, or to add any strength thereto."

Brattleborough Sept 24 1774

The foregoing are true copies of the record.

Attest,

SAML KNIGHT,
Town Clerk.

It is an old saying, and became an adage, "Corporations have no souls." In dealing with another pastor in this town, some years later, we see another proof of the truthfulness of this old adage. With a package of bills paid to the pastor, by the proper officer of the society, were two counterfeit bills. The society refused to make the matter right, because the pastor was paid with the veritable money obtained from subscribers for his support, and the collector could not tell from whom the bad bills came. Every individual in that society knew better than to make so miserable a pretext, for such an outrage against a man who dug his potatoes or cut his wood. All knew the poor minister would pocket the loss rather than appeal to the law. Though Mr. Reeve was the first settled minister in this town, there was, previous to his advent here, occasional preaching at "Fort Dummer," but we do not learn the names of the preachers, the denomination, or frequency of their ministrations.

We learn Mr. Reeve was a graduate of Yale College, and father of Judge Tapping Reeve who founded the famous "Law School" at Litchfield, Ct., and was principal of that institution as late as 1816. Rev. Abner Reeve was of the order called N. E. Calvinistic Congregationalist. Excepting the foreign element, that denomination was the most numerous in this town up to 1845, if not at the present time, thus giving evidence that the influence of Mr. Reeve yet lives. He was settled in 1770, and closed his labors about 1794.

RENUNCIATION OF THE PULPIT, BY THE FIRST PASTOR IN BRATTLEBORO, IN 1792.

Among old papers presented us by Hon. LaFayette Clark, we have found, from the pen of Abner Reeve, his letter of resignation in 1792. Though this document gives an idea of the situation of pastor and people eighty years ago, it needs but little, if any, alteration to adapt it to modern uses, or a description of the situation of the successors since that time.

COPY OF THE REV. ABNER REEVE'S RESIGNATION.

"There being unhappily, to my great Grief of Mind, differences subsisting in the Town of Brattleboro, with respect to my further preaching the Gospel to the Inhabitants of said Town in virtue of a former vote thereof. For healing said Differences, & for uniting the said Inhabitants in brotherly Love in the service of our common Lord & Master, & in full hope that these very important purposes will be answered, I do hereby disclaim for myself, my Heirs, Ex'ors & Adm'ors all pretence to any salary, by virtue of any vote of the Inhabitants of said Town, in legal meeting assembled, to become due & payable after the date hereof.

Provided always & this writing is on this express Condition that all arrearages of Salary be settled, including the time to the date hereof, or paid to me my heirs Ex'ors Adm'ors, the one half on or before 3d of April next & the other half the 3d day of October next, and that I may have the privilege of preaching in the meeting house as heretofore when no other preacher shall be employed by the selectmen of said town, or by a Com'e appointed for the purpose, upon such pay only as shall gratuitously be given me by said Inhabitants or a part thereof. Given under my hand the 3d Oct'r 1792. ABNER REEVE."

Mr. Reeve died in 1798, aged 90 years.

We find the following inscription upon the headstone at his grave, near where stood the old meeting-house in which he officiated:

REV. ABNER REEVE,
Died May the 16th, 1798,
In the 91 year of his age.

"Farewell dear friends,
We part in pain,
But hope to live
And meet again."

"About the time Mr. Reeve was sinking under the infirmities of age, Rev. William Wells settled in town. He was a native of Biggleswade in England, and had been for twenty-three years a dissenting minister at Browns Grove in Worcestershire, Eng. He was at once invited to take the spiritual charge of the church and society, and entered upon his work in March, 1794." Cong. Manual.

Mr. Wells did not officiate in the first meeting-house, which stood close to the old cemetery on the hill, for in 1785, a new and spacious house was built, for the accommodation of the whole town, near the site of the present one at the West village. In March, 1814, Mr. Wells gave up his charge, the care of the whole town being too much for his advanced years and infirm health. He was succeeded by Rev. Caleb Burge, who officiated from 1814 to 1819. Rev. Jedediah L. Stark officiated from 1821 to 1839; Rev. Corbin Kidder from 1839 to 1845; Rev. Joseph Chandler from 1845 to 1870. Present pastor, (1879), Rev. C. H. Merrill.

The large, spacious meeting-house, built at the West village in 1785, was destroyed by fire February 2, 1845, and the smaller one, now standing in the same place, was built in 1846.

Sometime previous to the resignation of Rev. Mr. Wells, the East village had commenced a rapid, thriving growth. Mr.

Wells, whose residence was near by, at the place now owned by Charles A. Miles, had been in the habit of officiating two or three times a month at the East village, in the old school-house, then standing on the Village Common. The room was too small, and a proposition was made to build a house of worship at the East village, in which services should be held a part of the time without dividing the parish. This plan not meeting with general favor in the town, it was determined to form a new society, erect a house and invite Mr. Wells to be their minister.

Grindall R. Ellis, Esq., deeded to the society the land now known as the Village Common, on condition that the new edifice be located there. The new society acted in conformity with said conditions in 1815, but in 1842, lost all claim to the land by removing the house and neglecting to fence the grounds.

Rev. Mr. Wells accepted the invitation of the parish, and was the first minister who occupied the pulpit in the first meeting-house built in this village. He officiated here less than three years, thus closing his long ministry of sixty years, and died at his home in December, 1827, aged eighty-three years. His successors have been as follows:

Rev. Jonathan McGee, from Jan. 13, 1819, to Sept. 10, 1834; Rev. Chas. Walker, from Jan. 1, 1835, to Feb. 11, 1846; Rev. A. H. Clapp, from Oct. 14, 1846, to Nov. 15, 1853; Rev. George P. Tyler, from Nov. 16, 1853, to 1866; Rev. N. Mighill, from October, 1867, to 1875; Rev. George L. Walker to Jan. 1, 1878; Rev. George E. Martin, engaged for one year from July 1, 1878. Since has received an invitation to become settled pastor by ordination in July, 1879.

Rev. Mr. Wells was eminent in that department of ministerial duty in the olden time—visiting. The children were always glad to see the pleasant old English gentleman, in antique costume, and his inexhaustible fund of anecdote and story, his fine attractive social qualities, with much of the kindly and sympathetic in his nature, endeared him to the homes of joy or sadness.

His daughter, Miss HANNAH WELLS, established the first Sabbath school in this village, and employed much of her time in advancing the prosperity of that institution. Another daughter, Mrs. Freeme, the widow of a Liverpool merchant, came here from England some years after the death of her father. A few years after she had made alterations and refitted the old residence of her father, the house burned in the night time, and she with her house, nice paintings, furniture, barn, horses, carriages, &c., were destroyed. At this fire, which occurred in 1849, we noticed in the air, high above the flames, a large collection of birds, drawn thither by the light from the surrounding darkness. This circumstance was happily alluded to by Rev. Mr. Mott, in a funeral sermon on this occasion, by suggesting that those little winged messengers might have come to escort her spirit to mansions of the blessed.

Most generally the finale to all sermons by Mr. Wells were in these words: "Consider well what has been said and may God give you understanding." His laconic commentary upon "the Sermon on the Mount," reminds us of the brief defence by Patrick Henry of the dissenting ministers in Virginia. Mr. Wells, after reading the concluding words of the chapter, viz.: "And the people were astonished at his doctrine," &c., gave a general glance over the congregation, as he closed the Bible, and simply but impressively said, "and well they might be."

Among old papers left by Stephen Greenleaf, Esq., we are gratified to find the following letter from the pen of Mr. Wells. This letter was directed to Mr. Russell Hayes, but, judging from its contents, it was for the students of the old academy:

BRATTLEBORO, March 20, 1808.

"MY YOUNG FRIENDS:—I am much pleased and comforted with your respectful address. Those lectures at the academy would have been begun many years ago, had not a series of bodily indisposition prevented. When it pleased God to favor me with returning health, I did not know any way in which I could be used more agreeably to myself, or with better prospect of success, than to have an occasional service in the winter season particularly suitable for young men and youth growing up into life. To find, therefore, that those labors have been acceptable and useful, and, as I hope, cannot fail of affording me great satisfaction.

"Being considerably advanced into the vale of years, the shadows of the evening are growing long and the night of death fast approaching with respect to me. This, however, I do not in the least regret. But so long as I sustain my present relation to the society in this town, and health and capacity for usefulness remain, be assured I shall, with great pleasure, continue the services above-mentioned, well knowing that the sober, virtuous and religious character of young men is of infinite importance to themselves, to their friends, and to the community at large. That you, my young friends, may continue to be useful in life, the supports and ornaments of religion when my head is laid low in the dust and my lips closed in perpetual silence, and that we may all at last have a happy meeting in the world above, never more to part, is the ardent prayer of your sincere friend and affectionate pastor, WM. WELLS."

FIRST CHURCH IN EAST VILLAGE OF BRATTLEBORO.

Fourteen members withdrew from the church at West Brattleboro, and July 15, 1816, the new church was organized, with Rev. Wm. Wells as pastor, and John Holbrook set apart as deacon. During the short ministry of Mr. Wells, the church was increased by the addition of seventy-eight members. The new edifice was dedicated August 22, 1816. Rev. Samuel Willard, of Deerfield, offered the dedicatory prayer, and Rev. Mr. Pratt, of Westmoreland, the concluding prayer.

The successor of Mr. Wells—Rev. Jonathan McGee—was a graduate of Williams College and of the Theological Seminary of Andover, Mass. At his ordination, January 1, 1819, the sermon was preached by Rev. Samuel Taggart, from II Cor. 4th chap., 5th verse. This was the first ordination that had taken place in Brattleboro, although there had been stated preaching in the town for more than fifty years.

During the ministry of Rev. Mr. McGee of nearly fifteen years, 281 members were added to the church. During the last four years Mr. McGee remained in his charge, large additions were made to this church. From 1831 to 1833, there was manifested unusual interest on the subject of religion. In 1831, special efforts were made, in various parts of New England, to revive the churches by holding four-day meetings, and concentrating the ministerial ability of several towns to assist at such places as were deemed the most proper for such a purpose. These measures proved so successful that many thought four days a too limited time, and were loth to discontinue these meetings so long as success seemed to attend them. Consequently they were extended and obtained the name of "protracted meetings," where was employed, for weeks and months together, the most gifted eloquence and talented ministrations that could be obtained. The itinerant preachers demanded for these occasions were called "Evangelists." Great powers of originality were expected of him, and he must be able to bring forward old truths in a new, startling manner, so as to not only arouse "those that were asleep in Zion," but those who had ever been careless and indifferent to their spiritual interests.

Curiosity and the love of something new and exciting drew the attention of many to these meetings, who went home in sadness and despair. Old church members were made to feel

"But oh, this wretched heart of sin—
It may deceive me still,
And while I look for joys above,
May plunge me down to hell."

Rev. Mr. Boyle commenced preaching at the Congregational church, on the Common, in the month of November, 1832, and continued his labors almost every Sabbath and evening until late in February, 1833. In his addresses, he was solemn, eloquent and impressive, and the still, noiseless, crowded house betokened "no room for mirth or trifling here if life so soon is past." A revival, long continued and of great power, followed or accompanied these exercises. Some old church members of to-day look back to this light of other days with heartfelt joy; as then, old things with them then passed away and all things became new, and they felt confident that the smiles of heaven and an approving God rested upon these movements. Some good citizens and professed Christians disapproved of so much excitement, though they rejoiced to see the attention given to religion by those hitherto averse to the subject. Others condemned the whole thing; with them it was "all emotional religion, an animal excitement, that would soon pass away, leaving the churches in worse condition than before." A theological or spiritual nutriment so highly stimulating, would render the former good gospel preaching distasteful or insipid, and the faithful old pastor, who had baptized us in our infancy and buried our fathers, would be graciously informed certain wise men in the parish beg leave to suggest, for his consideration, the propriety of a change in his field of usefulness.

This prophecy, to some extent, proved true, but we hope some good was accomplished by diverting the attention of many, as it could be done in no other way, from this all-absorbing theme, "What shall we eat, what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" If man, with his wonderful, mysterious combination of mind and matter, can have no higher aspirations without being stimulated thereto by unusual events, we feel resigned when they occur.

Among the church and society that quietly sat under the ministrations of Rev. Dr. Wells were those who could not sustain or endure a state of affairs so different from the past. Therefore, and but a short time previous to the events alluded to in the foregoing, the society divided and the church bell, presented to the society by Gov. Hunt, of Vernon, and Dea. J. Holbrook of this place, broke at the same time.

A minority portion of the society, called Unitarian, built on Main street the second church erected in this village, in the summer of 1831.

Rev. Jonathan McGee was dismissed by a mutual council, Sept. 10, 1834, and January, 1835, Rev. Charles Walker was installed pastor elect. The sermon upon this occasion was preached by Rev. Willard Child, of Pittsford, Vt.

In the year 1842, the church and society finding their house of worship very much out of repair, and being situated too far north for the convenience of a large portion of the congregation, concluded to remove it into Main street, near the old Brattleboro Bank. The meeting-house was removed and enlarged in 1842, and the heirs of Francis Goodhue, Esq., gave the land to the society upon which the building now stands. It was dedicated Jan. 11, 1843. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Z. S. Barstow, D. D., of Keene, N. H.; dedicatory prayer by Rev. Amos Foster, of Putney.

Rev. Charles Walker continued the pastor until Feb. 14, 1846, when he was dismissed by mutual council called for this purpose. Mr. Walker was a fearless, uncompromising advocate of the temperance cause. He possessed great moral power and a praiseworthy independence in advocating his views. His sermons upon special occasions showed great research and extensive information. The church, under his teaching, was built up and strengthened. The additions during his ministry were 62 by letter and 82 by profession.

After the dismissal of Rev. Dr. Walker, the pulpit was supplied by different ones until May 23, 1846, when the society extended a call to Mr. A. Huntington Clapp, of Boston, Mass., then engaged as a professor in Middlebury College. He was a graduate of Yale College and Andover Theological Seminary. After the usual examination by council he was ordained Oct. 14, 1846. Rev. Dr. Blagden, of the old South Church, Boston, preached the sermon.

Rev. Mr. Clapp continued his labors with great satisfaction to the church and society until Jan. 1, 1853, when, from a disease of the eyes, he was induced to ask leave of absence for at least four months, that he might be under treatment for the difficulty. After an absence of nearly eight months, and under daily treatment, yet without perceptible improvement, he sent in his resignation, to take effect Oct. 14, 1853, that being the close of the seventh year of his connection with this society. During the seven years Mr. Clapp was pastor, 80 were added by profession and 42 by letter.

Immediately after Rev. Mr. Clapp had sent in his resignation the church and society united in extending a call to Rev.

George P. Tyler, of Lowville, N. Y., a native of Brattleboro, and graduate of Yale College and Union Theological Seminary, New York. He, having accepted the call, commenced his labors as pastor, Nov. 14, 1854, by a preparatory lecture for the communion, and on the following Sabbath preached his first sermon. Nov. 15, 1854, the council met and dismissed Rev. Mr. Clapp and examined Rev. Mr. Tyler. This examination proving satisfactory, he was the next day installed pastor of the church and society. The sermon was preached by Rev. L. G. Buckingham, of Springfield, Mass.; charge by Rev. Charles Walker, of Pittsford, Vt.; right hand of fellowship by Rev. Joseph Chandler; address to the people by Rev. A. H. Clapp; concluding prayer by Rev. Mr. Aiken. The fact that the two former pastors were present and took part in the services, rendered it very solemn and interesting to the large congregation who were assembled on the occasion.

During the pastorate of Mr. Tyler there was received into the church 194 members, and during the latter part of his ministry here in 1864, extensive alterations were made in his house of worship. He was a man of much energy and originality, and zealous in defence of the government during the late rebellion. That he was a faithful and efficient pastor has, we believe, never been questioned. In 1866, at his own request, he was dismissed from the charge of this church. He was succeeded by Rev. Nathaniel Migbill, who was installed pastor in October, 1867. Rev. L. Buckingham preached the sermon, and Rev. A. H. Clapp addressed the church and society.

From the time of its organization to March, 1869, this church had received 884 members and six settled pastors.

BRATTLEBORO UNITARIAN CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

BY A FORMER PASTOR.

After the death of Rev. William Wells, D. D., which occurred in 1827, a large number of the members of the Congregational society, then under the charge of Rev. Jonathan McGee, became dissatisfied with him as their pastor on account of certain doctrines which he preached, and because he refused to exchange pulpit services with several clergymen with whom Rev. Mr. Wells had been accustomed to hold ministerial intercourse. They finally withdrew from that society and formed a new society, known by the name of the "Brattleboro Unitarian Congregational Society." The organization of this society was effected in 1831, and a house of worship was erected on Main street during that year and finished early the next year. It was dedicated Feb. 22, 1832, Rev. George W. Hosmer, of Northfield, Mass., preaching the sermon. On the same day Rev. Nathaniel Thayer, D. D., of Lancaster, Mass., and other clergymen being present, the following persons, Eben Wells, Mary Wells, Samuel A. Allen, Maria Allen, Lemuel Whitney, Sophia Whitney, S. D. Chapin, Eliza Hyde, and Eunice Metcalf, united themselves into a Christian church, adopting and subscribing the same covenant which had been used under the ministry of Dr. Wells, and which was at that time still in use in the Congregational church under the charge of Mr. McGee, which is as follows:

"Admiring the infinite condescension and grace of God, in opening a door of life and salvation to perishing sinners through the death and mediation of Jesus Christ: together with a sense of your own unworthiness, you do now make choice of the living God for your God, of God the Father for your Father; of his only begotten Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, for your Lord and Saviour; of the Holy Ghost for your teacher, sanctifier and comforter; and of the Word of God for the rule of your faith and practice. And you do dedicate and give up yourselves to God, to be only his: to be guided by his spirit, to be ruled by his laws, to be disposed of by his providence, and to be eternally saved in the gospel way, promising by the help of Christ, (without which you can do nothing), that you will live soberly, righteously and godly all your days. And you do likewise covenant and bind yourselves to walk with the church of Christ in this place, in all the ways of God's ordinances, submitting yourselves to the discipline and government of this church according to the rules of the gospel. Thus you give up yourselves to God, and promise by his help to live for Him, and to walk in holy fellowship with this church."

The church was enlarged from time to time by the addition of other members, and the above covenant was used for several years on the admission of new members to the church. For some years past, however, it has not been read or assented to when persons have united themselves with the church.

On the Sunday succeeding the dedication of the church, Mr. Addison Brown, who had been preaching several months at Troy, N. Y., where he had organized a society, on invitation of the prudential committee of the society, commenced supplying the pulpit as a candidate, and after preaching about three months he received an invitation to settle as pastor of the church and accepted the same.

Mr. Brown was a native of New Ipswich, N. H., graduated at Harvard College in the year, 1826, and at the Theological School at Cambridge in 1831. His ordination took place June 14, 1832, introductory prayer by Rev. Mr. Rogers, of Bernards-ton, Mass.; reading of the Scriptures by Rev. Josiah Moore, of Athol, Mass.; sermon by Rev. Mr. Hill, of Worcester, Mass.; ordaining prayer by Rev. James Kendall, D. D., of Plymouth, Mass.; charge by Rev. Abiel Abbott, D. D., of Peterboro, N. H.; right hand of fellowship by Rev. G. W. Hosmer, of Northfield, Mass.; address to the society by Rev. Hersey B. Goodwin, of Concord, Mass.; concluding prayer by Rev. Alpheus Harding, of New Salem, Mass.

Mr. Brown's engagement was at first for three years. At the expiration of that time he renewed his engagement to supply the pulpit for five years, and after the expiration of that time his engagement was made annually during the remainder of his pastorate, which terminated near the close of 1845, he having preached for the society for nearly fourteen years in succession, with the exception of a few months' interruption on account of sickness.

On accepting the resignation of Mr. Brown of his pastoral relation to the society, the following resolution was passed at a meeting of the society, Dec. 1, 1845:

Resolved, That while acceding to the Rev. Addison Brown's request to be discharged from the further performance of ministerial duties, this society, collectively and individually, entertain towards him the highest respect and strong personal regard, and that they shall ever cherish a lively recollection of his devotion to duty and his sincere efforts for their moral and spiritual good.

Since the close of Mr. Brown's ministry to the society they have been supplied by a great number and variety of preachers, some for a brief period, others for a longer time. Those who have supplied the pulpit for the longest periods are Rev. G. G. Ingersoll, D. D., now deceased, who preached for the society at several different times; Rev. Farrington McIntire, who was ordained as pastor of the society, April 7, 1847, and closed his ministry at the end of that year; Rev. John L. Russell, who continued with the society several months; Rev. Mellish I. Motte, Rev. Solon W. Bush, and Rev. Francis C. Williams, each of whose ministry was three years or more; Rev. F. Frothingham, who was the society's pastor for over two years, and Rev. H. N. Richardson, who supplied the desk for a little more than half a year. The society is at the present time (August, 1869) without a settled ministry.

The stone church erected by this society in 1874-5, surpasses in durability and as a fine specimen of church architecture, anything of the kind in this place. Rev. W. L. Jenkins has officiated as pastor to the present time, January, 1879.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

The new church building erected by the first and only Baptist society in this town is of brick, with Portland stone caps to the windows, buttresses, &c. It stands upon the ground where once stood a nice brick dwelling-house, on Main street, built by G. C. Hall, Esq., in 1826 or '27. This, the most costly and elegant specimen of church architecture this side of Rutland, if not in the State, was built in 1867. E. Boyden, of Worcester, was architect, and J. M. Buzzell, master workman or superintendent of construction. In the fall of 1868 a bell, weighing 4,500 pounds, was placed in the tower. This bell is said to be the largest one in Vermont. This is the fourth house of religious worship erected on Main street, where is the business of the town, its stores and "temples of mammon."

A venerable deacon once said, "religion should be separated from politics or business; it should be lifted high above all things of a worldly nature." In accordance with this sentiment of early times, temples for religious worship were erected on some elevated spot, or away from the hum of business and frequent haunts of men.

"Where musing solitude might love to lift
Her soul above this sphere of earthliness."

The people, when approaching this sacred place, were expected to leave behind their worldly cares and their every day garments, if not their shoes, as did Moses when he ascended the sacred mountain. From present indications, we are inclined to think it is well for the old deacon's peace of mind that he has gone to his rest. If his aged form now moved about our busy streets, and his attention was aroused by the heavy, solemn tones of that great bell, so near the temples of politics and mammon, how sadly he would shake his head to witness this evidence of degeneracy! Vain would be our efforts to calm his troubled mind, by telling him the spirit of the age demanded that religion should be a more every-day, practical affair, and its temples and influences should be brought down to sanctify, baptize or purify all needful earthly transactions.

This church and society have made rapid progress. From its infancy this church has had within its fold individuals of superior business capacity, who have not been found wanting or backward in advancing the material interests of the organization, and thereby has been erected a church building which is one of the greatest ornaments to this village. This account would be incomplete unless we present the events of nearly 40 years ago, when this society was forming and deriving its first nutrition under a Methodist roof, aided by professed Christians antagonistic to the peculiar features of this church.

In March, 1840, Rev. Mr. Andrews commenced a series of revival meetings in the Methodist chapel, then standing on Canal street. The text to his first sermon was, "Plough up the fallow ground." In this sermon Mr. Andrews declared his indifference or independence in regard to sectarianism, but plainly stated his belief in the necessity of immediate repentance, regeneration or new birth. "If," said he, "you have evidence of sins forgiven, it matters not whether you are Methodist, Baptist, Orthodox, Congregationalist or Episcopalian." The Methodist society was at this time in a feeble condition. The magnanimous declaration of Elder Andrews aroused the vitality that was yet remaining in that society, and caused it to welcome him with open arms. Deacon Wood and some other members of the Congregational church gathered at these meetings, and used their abilities and influence to sustain Elder Andrews and forward the work according to programme.

The novel, startling titles Mr. Andrews gave out for sermons he was to preach the next evening, as, for instance, "To-morrow evening I shall preach the looking-glass sermon," or, "to-morrow night I will preach the funeral sermon for the first one of this congregation who will die," caused the house to be well filled about every evening for four or five weeks. The result of these efforts were soon apparent in the professed conversion of several persons, who were persuaded to be baptized by immersion. Some communicants of that faith, residing here, united with the new converts and, under the lead of Elder Andrews, organized the first Baptist church, April 2, 1840. The whole number was but 23 members at this time.

This action on the part of the presiding genius of this movement so disturbed the harmonious feeling heretofore existing, it was considered desirable or necessary to find other quarters wherein to continue the meetings. As might have been expected, some heretofore warm friends of Mr. Andrews became cold, and they could not justify his action or make it appear consistent with his declarations at the commencement of these meetings. It occurred to others that his course might, perhaps, be justified by eminent precedent or sentiments of the great apostle, as expressed in II Cor., xii, 16.

During six or seven weeks, from the beginning of these labors, Mr. Andrews occupied three places for this purpose, the last place being Dickenson's Hall, where he made the following remarks before his congregation:

"Some people have said this was a peaceable community, a short time ago, but since Andrews came here we have all got by the ears. I don't doubt it my friends, for when the truth of God is thrust amongst a people they will boil like a pot."

Elder Andrews left his charge in a short time, after occupying the third place of worship, and Rev. Joseph Freeman was chosen as pastor, April 24, 1840. The public recognition was upon May 6, 1840, the membership at this time being 94. Mr. Freeman resigned his pastoral charge after a service of about four months.

Aug. 28, 1840, Rev. Moses Field accepted a call of the society to be their pastor. The church was admitted into the Windham County Baptist Association at its annual meeting in the following autumn. The first church building was erected on Elliot street, and completed in the autumn and winter of 1840 '41 and dedicated the following spring.

Sept. 27, 1842, Rev. Mr. Field gave in his resignation which was accepted. His successor, Rev. J. C. Foster, supplied the pulpit from Oct. 2, 1841, to Dec. 11 of the same year, and he was ordained pastor, Jan. 19, 1843.

In 1852, the meeting-house was repaired and re-opened with the following dedicatory exercises: Prayer by Rev. L. Sherwin, sermon by the pastor, dedicatory prayer by Rev. Samuel Fish, concluding prayer by Rev. A. H. Stevens.

June 8, 1856, Rev. Mr. Foster resigned his position, to take effect July 1. June 13, the church accepted his resignation. This is the longest pastorate in the history of the church. Mr. Foster administered to it for nearly 14 years.

August 24, 1856, Rev. P. L. Adams was invited to the vacant pastorate, and commenced his labors Nov. 2d of the same year. The last Sabbath in January, 1859, he closed his ministrations. He was succeeded by Rev. Mark Carpenter upon the second Sabbath of February, 1859. He resigned Dec. 4, 1864.

Rev. A. Sherwin succeeded Mr. Carpenter, coming Jan. 4, 1865; resigned April 7, 1867. The seventh pastor of the church, Rev. H. H. Peabody, came Sept. 1, 1867, to supply the pulpit six months.

The congregation worshipped for the last time in the old church building in January, 1868. On the first Sabbath in February, of the same winter, the new church was occupied in the basement, as the principal room was not finished. Mr. Peabody, at the expiration of six months, was ordained as pastor of the church. At this time the total number on the church record was 412.

There is a large Sabbath School in connection with this institution. The society is in a prosperous condition, and the oft-sounding of the bell, the frequent, well attended meetings, gives evidence of the sincerity of its members.

Rev. Mr. Matteson officiated about seven years. Present pastor, (1879), Rev. Horace Buerhard.

METHODIST CHURCH.

In giving an account of this institution, we have nothing upon which to rely but memory; therefore, do not pretend to perfect accuracy in regard to dates, nor do we remember the names of but few of the pastors who have officiated for that church in this place. Regular services date from the advent of Cyrus Davis, who came to this village about 1833, to superintend the printing department of the publishing house of Messrs. Holbrook & Co. When we were first made aware of Methodist preaching in the East village was in 1834, and Mr. Davis, a firm advocate and class leader of the order, was quite prominent in commencing and sustaining these services, which were first held in a small district school-house on Canal street.

Between 1835 and '37 the society erected their first house of worship. This building was placed near the school-house they at first occupied on Canal street. Rev. William Brewster was the pastor of this church in 1837, and by his excellent character, eloquence and energy, considerable advance was made in building up the society. His worthy successor, "Elder Harding," was also a talented and effective preacher; but the organization was not fortunate in members who were able or willing to clear off the mortgage upon their meeting-house. Feeble in worldly matters, "The hull drove on though mast and sail was torn."

But the advent of the Baptist church, born under its roof in 1840, seemed to exhaust the little vitality remaining in the society. The meeting house passed out of their possession into the hands of "Millerites," so called, in 1842. The Universalist society next obtained possession of this house and occupied it for their denominational purposes until their present house of worship was built, in 1850 and '51. The old house was then sold to Mr. W. Alexander, who made such alterations as fitted it for a private residence.

The Methodist society was, for a time, a thing of the past, but within seven years after their trials with the Millerites, &c., it was made evident that some of the "old leaven, hid in three measures of meal," yet remained. Within the time above-named they built the neat brick meeting house, now (1869) owned and occupied by the society. Its advocates and supporters, in numbers, character and influence, compare favorably with other denominations in this place. When we consider the trials, difficulties and disappointments the Methodists have encountered in establishing their organization here, we must allow they are entitled to much credit for conscientiousness and perseverance. Methodist services are now (1879) held in the lower town hall, Rev. D. E. Miller, pastor.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Regular services of this church, in this town, commenced at "Dickenson's Hall" in 1836. A society was then formed, with some hope of permanency, and Rev. Chas. Devens, a talented, promising young man, officiated as rector. Hon. John Phelps and family, prominent actors in commencing this enterprise, during the short time said family resided here, moved to Maryland soon after the organization, and this society, in its days of infancy, could ill afford to lose the influence, power and protection afforded by this family. After about two years, services were only occasional, and then usually conducted at some place hired for this purpose, by the rector of the church, three miles distant, at East Guilford.

Public sentiment in this town seems never to have been favorable to this order, and there has never been a compliance with the conditions of the charter of 1753, wherein we find a reservation of one share of land for this church, and also "one share for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts." Since 1852, accessions to this population have been of such a character as to require this form of religious worship.

In 1853, a society was organized and services at first conducted by Rev. G. C. Eastman in a lower room of the town hall. Rev. Mr. Eastman resigned his charge April 15, 1854. Rev. William Southgate officiated from 1857 to April, 1860. Rev. A. P. Morris was invited to accept the rectorship Oct. 10, 1860. Rev. Edmund Rowland occupied the desk in the summer previous to the advent of Mr. Morris. Rev. A. P. Morris was from Hamilton, C. W., and was rector of this church during most of the time of the late war of the rebellion. October 14, 1864, Rev. G. W. Porter was invited to become rector of the parish. He accepted, and resigned after about two years' service. Rev. Francis W. Smith accepted an invitation to fill the vacancy, April 3, 1867, and resigned Dec. 30, 1868. In 1867 the society procured a parsonage, situated upon Green street, at an expense of $2,500. March 19, 1869, Rev. Mr. Harris accepted an invitation of the parish to become rector and now supplies the desk. (1870).

Since 1853, this institution has been known and recognized as "St. Michael's Church," and its progress in numbers, influence and all needful requirements to sustain it, renders the permanent establishment of Episcopacy in this town, no longer, as at first considered, an experiment.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Irregular preaching commenced by the Catholics from 1846 to '48, about the time the Vermont and Massachusetts railroad was being constructed in this vicinity. Meetings were held for several years in a building on Elliot street, formerly used for mechanical purposes. In 1863-4 they constructed a good, substantial brick church on Walnut street. This undertaking was under the administration of Father O'Reilly. Judging from the large number of persons going to and from this new house, the church is in a flourishing condition.

[By Rt. Rev. Louis de Goesbriand, Bishop of Burlington].

The number of Catholic families in this town must have been about fifty when the diocese of Burlington was separated from that of Boston. Rev. Z. Druon, (now of St. Albans), in 1844, bought an old paint or carpenter shop and fitted it up for a church. Rev. Charles O'Reilly was given charge of the mission in 1855, and after a few years came to live in the village. He succeeded in building the present neat and substantial church edifice of St. Michael. In 1869, he was succeeded by Rev. Charles Halpin. Rev. N. St. Onge had charge of Brattleboro after Rev. Father Halpin. To Rev. Henry Lane, the present incumbent, is due the erection of the Catholic school house, the establishment of the house of the Sisters of St. Joseph, for the teaching of the children, the purchase of a parsonage, and ornamenting of the church edifice. There are 135 families in this congregation, and the number of pupils taught by the Sisters in 1877 was 125.

Too much credit cannot be given this congregation, who have done much, so well and so constantly, notwithstanding many and serious difficulties.

NOTE.—Some of the details, respecting the religious societies of Brattleboro, have been taken from their own printed books.

EAST VILLAGE OF BRATTLEBORO.

Within the limits of this village was made the first English settlement in Vermont. "His Majesty's Fort Dummer," as stated in the charter of the town in 1753, was here erected in 1724. In this charter is made four reservations of land, one for the first settled minister, one for the English or Episcopal church, one for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts, and one of 800 acres for Gov. Wentworth of New Hampshire. With one exception, we learn these reservations have never been appropriated for the purposes above named. That exception is the land now covered by this village, which was owned by Governor Wentworth and sold at some period from the date of the charter to 1771, for five oxen. Because first owned by Gov. Wentworth, this territory was for a long time known as "Governor's Farm." In 1771, this farm was purchased by Stephen Greenleaf, of Boston, Mass., and he established a store where now stands Union block on Main street. This store is said to be the first one established in Vermont. From ancient letters we learn this merchant was an importer of goods from England. From Harrison, Barnard & Spragg, of London, we find a letter, dated 1769, addressed to Stephen Greenleaf, containing a receipt for cash £100 on account, and information they had forwarded to his order and his "risque" goods to the amount of £400. This gentleman, Stephen Greenleaf, was father of Stephen Greenleaf, Jr., who was clerk of this town 45 years.

Among various means which have contributed to the rise and growth of this place, not the least that can be mentioned is the early attention given to mechanics. The first water-power set in operation here was by Matthew Martin, who built a saw mill near the mouth of Whetstone Brook, at the south part of Main street. Matthew Martin was born in 1737, and died in 1831. When 91 years of age, he informed us that at the time he built this saw-mill all "Governor's Farm" could be bought for 25 cents per acre.

This water-power, since first used by Mr. Martin, has operated a great variety of machinery. Joseph Clark, from Auburn, Mass., who owned, at one time, most of the land on the south side of Whetstone Brook to the Vernon and Guilford line, established here the first shop for wool-carding and cloth-dressing. This power has been used for printing, paper making, machine shops, grinding grain, manufacturing silk, cotton, wool, pearl, ivory and boxwood rules, paper machinery, &c. John Holbrook, in 1811, sold all this water privilege below the paper mill to Francis Goodhue.

As Deacon John Holbrook was the main cause, and is so identified with the early prosperity of this village, it is difficult to separate his history from it; therefore, we give a brief sketch of him in this connection.

JOHN HOLBROOK

Was born at Weymouth, Mass., in 1761, and died in this village in 1838, aged 77 years. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war, his father moved with his family to Dorchester, Mass. English officers stationed on Dorchester Heights were so well pleased with the conduct and personal appearance of young Holbrook, they offered to instruct him in engineering, surveying, &c. The offer was gratefully accepted, and he became so well qualified that he was in after years employed by the government.

The opportunities for obtaining knowledge of this character were limited in this country at that time, and to this early event in his history may be attributed much of his success in after life; but men so lavishly gifted by nature with mind and matter, with the most desirable requisites of true manhood, as was Mr. Holbrook, wait not for opportunities or occasions, they create them. Difficulties, dangers, obstacles, such as discourage or dishearten common men, act, if they act at all, on such men as Mr. Holbrook, merely as stimulants to their progress.

His duties, while in the employ of the government, led him beyond his native State to Newfane, Vt., where he married Sarah Knowlton, daughter of Luke Knowlton, Esq., then known as "Judge Knowlton," and presiding at the courts of Windham county. Late in the last century he established a store in the building which has since undergone alterations, fitting it for a hotel, now called the American House. He here became successful in importing goods from the West Indies, all the way to Brattleboro by water. His goods came by shipping to Hartford, Ct., and from there by flat-boats up the river to this place, and we learn he was the pioneer of this method of freighting to Brattleboro, which was long afterwards successfully carried on by G. C. Hall, Francis Goodhue, John R. Blake, and others. In 1811, Mr. Holbrook removed to Warehouse Point, Ct. His son-in-law, Wm. Fessenden, was proprietor of "The Reporter," and published Webster's spelling books as early as 1807. Immediately after the death of William Fessenden, in 1815, Mr. Holbrook returned to Brattleboro and bought of the heirs of William Fessenden all his stock, fixtures, &c., and greatly enlarged the publishing business. For undertaking to publish a large family Bible, by subscription, in this obscure town, so far away from the great centers of trade, Mr. Holbrook was ridiculed by the greatest publishers of the day in New York and Boston, and certain failure of the enterprise was by them confidently predicted. Little did the sons of luxury and affluence know of the character or capabilities of that man. His opening manhood was in the storm of the Revolution; his early life was spent in grappling with all sorts of difficulties, wandering on snow-shoes through trackless forests with compass and chain, and often did he retire for the night, under hemlock boughs, with scanty uncooked food, in the dark, cold, wintry, unbroken forest. Some of the disadvantages in establishing his business here may be learned by reading the following account, as given us not long ago by Mr. Hines, a few days before his death, at the age of 89 years:

"Many years ago I built a paper-mill in this village for Deacon Holbrook. It was a hard job, for there was at that time no iron foundry in this region, no machine shop, no engine-lathe or tools such as would be considered indispensable now for doing such work. I went with a horse team to Rhode Island to get iron castings for this mill. After I returned and had been several days at work, the deacon called on me to see how the work was progressing. 'Well,' said he, 'any new troubles, any more lions in the road?' 'Yes; there is one big one,' said I, pointing to a large iron casting on the floor; 'we must make a hole (giving the size) clear through that iron in the thickest place.' 'How in the world will you do it?' asked the deacon. I replied, 'I don't exactly know, but I must contrive some way to do it.' The deacon gave expression to his views upon the subject by saying, 'I should like to see the generation that will be on earth when you finish that job.' In the after part of that day it was a great pleasure to me to congratulate the deacon upon having had his wish, for the job was done."

Some idea of Mr. Holbrook's peculiar style of expressing his emotions, can be seen by the following: Mr. H. sent his man-of-all-work some distance from home to get some early potatoes for planting. The man returned with the potatoes and informed him of the price charged. Mr.

Holbrook said: "Jacob, return the potatoes immediately, and say to Mr. W. I would as soon die by famine as by the sword."

In spite of prophecy and discouragement, Mr. Holbrook supplied all subscribers with the great family Bible, and made a complete financial success. For more than 25 years the publishing business, first started by Wm. Fessenden, more than all other causes, in that day, put together, enlarged and built up this village. Mr. H. retired from being an active participant in the business, though he became associated with Joseph Fessenden, and the business continued under the name of "Holbrook & Fessenden" until Mr. Holbrook became president of the Brattleboro Bank in 1832. Joseph Fessenden died in 1834. John C. Holbrook and others bought out the old concern and published "The Polyglot Bible," "Comprehensive Commentary," "Church History," and "Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge."

Unable to endure the financial crisis in 1836, the company failed, but the business was continued by a joint stock concern called the "Typographic Co.," which commenced operation in 1836; but it died such a gradual, lingering death, we hardly know when it ceased to breathe.

Previous to the establishment of the publishing enterprise by Wm. Fessenden and his successor, Mr. Holbrook, the inhabitants of this place attended public worship, on the Sabbath, at the West village, over 2 miles distant. In locating the first church building in this village, in 1814, the inhabitants of that day gave evidence of possessing more taste for the beautiful than any of their predecessors or successors. The meeting-house was placed at or near the centre of what is now the public park or common. In summer time the northern view, especially from the upper windows and belfry, was the most beautiful in this country. People living all their lives among mountains and scenery of a similar character, have said much in praise of this prospect, and even travelers from far-famed lands of song and story, have declared it unsurpassed in its peculiar attractiveness, and reluctantly withdrew their gaze upon scenes on which the eye long loved to linger.

At the time carpenters were framing the new meeting-house, Rev. Caleb Burge, then pastor at the West village, said he had a dream that two men were killed while raising the new church frame. This story got noised about, causing a large collection of people at the raising of the frame. Some difficulties and dangers attended the process, which made great excitement among the people. Finally, after the business was completed, without injury to life or limb, the crowd gave three tremendous cheers for "Rev. Caleb Burge."

When this village was very small, not more than one-fourth its present size, it was remarkable for its trade, life or business activity. Long before the introduction of railroads, eight or ten daily stages drove up at some hour of the day or night to the old "stage house," where the passengers were sure to be greeted with excellent fare, and the kind, polite attentions of that prince of hotel-keepers, COL. PAUL CHASE. His house was constantly open both night and day. During the winter months, fires were constantly burning in his capacious, old-fashioned fire-places. Many who have experienced life under his administration and roof, have declared it caused no unpleasant memories.

THE POSTOFFICE,

Held by Asa Green, Esq., from 1811 to 1841, was, as the old stage house, constantly open both night and day. It was a distributing office, and at one period of Mr. Green's administration was the postoffice for Guilford, Dummerston, Halifax, Vernon, Whitingham, Newfane, Bernardston, Weybridge, Marlboro, Hinsdale, N. H., Gill, Mass., Leyden, Mass., and Chesterfield, N. H. Inhabitants are yet living here who remember the pleasantries, peculiarities, virtues and eccentricities of the veteran postmaster. His memory will be ever green, for one of the pleasantest streets in this village, on land he once owned, now bears his name. Since the establishment of U. S. government postoffices in this State, he had two predecessors in this office, viz.: John W. Blake, in 1790, when there were but 8 government offices in this State, and Samuel Elliot in 1810. Previous to the admission of Vermont into the Union, we learn that John Arms was the first postmaster of this town under the authority of Vermont.

A LOTTERY OFFICE,

Opposite the old stage house, with a large mythological painting for a sign, occupied the attention of the people from 1826 to '29. Ceres, goddess of the harvest, smilingly and willingly, through summer's heat and winter's cold, looked down upon the public while scattering from a cornucopia a large quantity of Mexican dollars. This lottery was chartered by the State for the benefit of Horatio Knight, and Messrs. Chase and Smith, managers. The people, though charmed for a while and paying a sufficient tax on ignorance to learn this to be no improvement on the old ways of money-making, turned their backs on this temple of mammon, and beautiful Ceres smiled on us no more. The most appropriate use ever made of the unsold tickets was by Messrs. Hooper and Hughes, in the construction of rarified air-balloons, which were started upon their important mission near the old meeting-house on the village common.

Some notoriety abroad was given this place by the Vermont Asylum for the Insane, established here in 1836, but its popularity as a city resort in summer time, dates from 1845, when Dr. Wesselhoeft, from Germany, established here his, at one time, famous hydropathic institution. Dr. Wesselhoeft, after traveling extensively in New England and testing water brought from various parts of the United States, decided upon locating in this village. The purity of the water in this place was an important consideration with him, but he was not insensible to the purity of the air, the mountainous features, ever clothed in green, and the varied surface of grounds in and about this place. There was here, in his estimation, a rare and happy combination of the desirable things which his system of treatment required. He found here excellent mechanics, markets, stores, schools, churches, representing all phases of Christianity, from Rome to Geneva or Boston, Mass.; in short, a high civilization, from which a walk of fifteen minutes would place one in primitive forests, among precipices, glens, brooks, cascades, and scenes of the most perfect wildness and attractiveness.

Dr. Wesselhoeft did not bring to this work the vigor of early manhood or even the noontide of his life. His whitened locks and other indications made it manifest his stay here must be short, and he was only making an evening call. But his sagacity, as shown by his choice of location, has been highly commended by ladies and gentlemen of much culture, experience and extensive travel in this and other countries. His success in the treatment of chronic complaints, led us to hope his system would be continued here, and his mantle fall upon some worthy successor; but after he passed away, everything of his excepting the buildings he erected, disappeared, and the buildings were converted to other uses.

During the Rebellion, when Vermont placed over 32,000 of her sons upon the altar of freedom, Gov. F. Holbrook, son of Dea. John Holbrook, made application to the general government for leave to establish a hospital here for sick and wounded soldiers. Leave being granted, the institution went into operation. There was reported from this hospital so large a percentage of cures from chronic diarrhoea and other difficult diseases to cure, as placed this hospital so far above any other in the United States, the authorities at Washington thought there was a mistake in the reports. Investigation proved the reports correct. Consequently the institution was enlarged and made a United States hospital, where have been congregated, from several States, over 1500 invalid soldiers at once.

The surgeon-general, who officiated to the last, declared he never before found it necessary to use so little medicine, for obstinate chronic cases, as considered when brought from other hospitals to this one, seemed to be cured as if by magic.

Some years after the war closed, the doctor, while on a visit to this place, was consulted by a gentleman from New Haven, who was afflicted with chronic diarrhoea. After making the needful inquiries, examinations and prescriptions, the doctor said: "Above all things I recommend, in your case, a large dose of Brattleboro."

The ground south of the village, where was this military hospital, is now (1872) owned by a company named "The Windham County Park Association," and used by them for agricultural exhibitions and horse races.

In the erection of buildings, there was but little of the elegant in architecture prior to 1833. Since that time utility alone has not always been consulted, but within the last twenty years art and taste have presided in construction of really elegant and pleasant homes, which greatly help to give a desirable character to the place. It has been said that beautiful things have a beneficial effect upon the mind, causing a more agreeable expression upon its dial-plate. Seeing these unmistakable evidences of surplus means is ever gratifying to solicitors of contributions for literary, charitable or religious objects. The grand list is thereby made grander and more effective in satisfying public needs by taxation.

Desirable as is this place for a summer residence, in particular localities, we believe some houses on Main and High streets are disease-breeding institutions, from the toleration of overgrown shade trees near the dwellings, causing gloom, dampness, rheumatism, &c., to many otherwise sunny, healthful, cheerful homes.

Most of the roads and sidewalks are too narrow. With an increasing population, requiring an expansion of the avenues for public travel, some of these roads, which have been open to the public from all time, have, within 25 years, been partly covered by the enlargement of buildings or enclosed front yard fences. This practice is not only a damage to the public but to the real estate owners who are guilty of this action. It is also far from complimentary to the public authorities who suffer the public to be robbed.

FIRE AND WATER DEPARTMENT.

However sensible individuals may be as to the public necessities, communities require some costly experience before they will sufficiently realize those needs, as to be willing a tax should be raised upon their property to supply them. This village in providing the means for extinguishing fires has awaited this educational process. In the summer of 1834, a house near the north part of Main street, owned by Dr. John L. Dickerman, was entirely consumed by fire. Only the out-buildings were on fire when the engines arrived on the ground, and it was only the lack of water prevented the most valuable part of the house from being saved. The indignant owner said, as he gazed upon the crowd doing nothing, "there are women enough here to extinguish that fire with their petticoats."

It was easy to see how perfectly useless were the best of fire engines without some way to supply them. Meetings of the inhabitants were called at various times, at which committees were appointed to devise and report at a future meeting some feasible plan to meet the difficulty. Progress to this end was slow, but after years of consideration, large underground cement cisterns, supplied by waste water from dwelling houses, were placed at such points as was most advantageous. In 1866, a great advance was made in this department, rendering the supply of water in Main street inexhaustible. A power-engine or force-pump was placed in the machine-shop of F. Tyler, at the south part of Main street, and operated by a large water-wheel. By this means 200 gallons of water per minute, from Whetstone Brook, could be delivered at several hydrants, in such positions as to be available at a fire in any part of Main street, and, with sufficient hose, can be of great service in protecting property in other streets.

There are now (1870) 3 engines and 1 hook and ladder company. Enrolled in the fire engine companies are 300 citizens. Having 4,000 feet of hose, a large part of the village can be protected from fires by water from Whetstone Brook. One of the engines was built by C. Hunneman & Co., of Boston, Mass., at a cost of $4,000. The other two hand-engines cost $2,000 each. Messrs. Jacob Estey & Co. purchased, a few years since, a steam fire engine, which will be more effectual than four or five hand-engines.

There never has been so efficient a fire department as within the last 4 years. For the late improvements, much credit is due the chief engineer, Col. S. M. Waite. Fires, under the present management, are almost invariably confined to buildings where they originate. The most remarkable exception to this rule occurred in November, 1869, when the Brattleboro House and several stores were consumed. The great freshet, which occurred in the month before this fire, rendered inefficient the power-engine upon which the village depended for the great supply of water from Whetstone Brook.

All the buildings on Main street and a large share of the dwelling houses in the village are supplied with constantly running water from springs of great purity. The water is brought by conduits to several distributing reservoirs in such localities as to best accommodate the consumers of the water. There are 7 or 8 companies or organizations for supplying all demands for running water. The Western Aqueduct Association is the largest and most important in the place. Their spring is divided into 180 shares. This water was brought about one mile to High street in 1826, by Messrs. John Holbrook, Asa Green and Francis Goodhue. Shares have been sold for $8 each, but now are valued at not less than $100 each. The company deliver the water at a brick aqueduct house in High street, and share owners put down small pipes leading to their dwellings at their own expense, and they are subject to taxation, in proportion to the amount of water they own, to keep the main conduit in repair.

To the Western aqueduct may be attributed the growth, in fact, the very existence of two of the most important streets in this village. The three originators of this association conferred a benefit of great importance to the public. They have long since passed away, but their memory lives in that appropriate emblem of purity and industry—pure running water.

The men who act as if they "were ordained to do, not to enjoy," unconsciously build their own monuments. However large may be our organ of reverence, we involuntarily exercise it upon such as these. It will be well for human interests when selfishness shall assume no worse form of manifestation than was apparent in the action of these gentlemen in this and other movements, in which they acted more for the benefit of others than for themselves.

The village is well located for good drainage; therefore, the neglect to improve this advantage seems, at first thought, inexcusable. It needs no argument to convince any thoughtful, reflective person how important it is for the general welfare that impure water be not allowed to stand near dwellings, to be removed only by solar evaporation. Legal gentlemen have informed us that the laws of this State are defective in regard to this matter, and should be so amended as to give the same privileges in making sewers as is now given in the construction of roads.

The proprietors of the large brick block, now building on the west side of Main street, have given a commendable example in making drains on private account.

STEAM NAVIGATION.

Three steamboats from below here have, at different times, visited this village, viz.: "Barnet," "John Ledyard" and "William Holmes." The first-named boat was built by Thos. Blanchard, of Springfield, Mass., where he invented a lathe for turning eccentric shapes, and first set it in successful operation at the U. S. Armory in shaping gun-stocks. Mr. Blanchard was confident he could make steam navigation on the Connecticut River, from Hartford far up into Vermont, a success. In 1827, when the little Barnet went, for the first time, screaming and puffing up the river, the inhabitants of this place, always noted for keeping up with the times in their notions if not their actions, needed but little to excite their hopes or stimulate their ideality regarding the great advantages this village was likely to receive from this powerful agency. Capt. Blanchard, the hero of the hour, the presiding genius of the Barnet, already known to fame for his achievements in mechanics, proudly walked the deck of his steamer, inspiring increased confidence that greater things were at hand and a new era about to dawn upon this fertile valley. His advent here was greeted with bonfires, bell-ringing, illumination and intoxication. There was loud cheering from the well-lined river bank, and British cannon, taken from Burgoyne at Bennington, roared out from their brazen throats the joyful news. But these demonstrations were made before our hero had got into port: he was struggling against the rapids, called "the tunnel," below the bridge. When about half way up the rapids, the boat came to a standstill. Notwithstanding the fire was so great that the blaze poured from the smoke-stack, and Capt. Blanchard, with the energy of despair, was punching against the bed of the river with a spiked pole, no further progress could be made. While making vain efforts to successfully reinforce stream with this ancient method of navigation, Capt. Blanchard fell from the boat into the rapids and came near being drawn under the boat, but was fortunately rescued by strong hands, which seized him by the collar at the right moment to save him from the threatened calamity. Sorrow and disappointment were apparent as swift water now obtained the victory, floating the Barnet and Blanchard down the stream. But all was not lost, the unconquerable will and genius, ever fertile in expedients, survived this cruel shock. The next trial to ascend proved successful, by applying the old stationary windlass that had long been used for drawing flat-boats over these rapids.

Now safely moored in the desired haven, as the sun went down, the asthmatic breathing and noise of contending elements in the bosom of the Barnet ceased, but the public mind was under a high pressure all that night. For the best reasons in the world, some "wouldn't go home till morning." Light from the morning sun fell upon broken windows, tables, chairs, crockery, glass-ware, &c., thus giving any but complimentary evidence as to the way this high pressure was vented. The participants in this, ever after called, "famous high-go," largely represented the village. The survivors of this brilliant engagement for the evening, aroused the following day by the cannon, bell and hissing steam of the Barnet, bravely stepped on the hot, quivering, trembling deck of the monster, and away they went north, at the enormous speed of 4 miles an hour.

These heroic deeds were embalmed in verse by the poetical genius of the time and place, but most of the actors are now covered by the silent turf.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Early in the present century, when the financial prosperity of this place depended upon the manufacture of spelling-books, Bibles, and rye whiskey, and the most conspicuous, noticeable feature at town meetings and other public gatherings, was the tall, majestic form of Judge Whitney. Mr. A. said to his neighbor, Mr. F., "I learn an attempt is to be made at the next school meeting to raise money on the scholar, instead of on the grand list." Mr. F. replied, "I don't doubt the truth of that report, for I have heard conversation in various quarters of such a character as leads me to believe they will try it, and if we don't work pretty smartly they will accomplish their plans. Esquire S. said he should pay no more money to educate other people's children, and Mr. C. and Mr. P. were agreed in saying it is as bad as highway robbery to compel them to pay money for such a purpose."

Mr. A., the first person alluded to in this conversation, was a firm believer in special providences. He was a poor man with a young, dependent family, and it was all he could do to keep the wolf from the door. After hearing the remarks of his friend F., he said, "If Judge Whitney is on our side, they will find it up hill to carry out their plan, but, after all, my greatest confidence is in God; his attributes are on our side."

When this question came before the school meeting of the district, Judge Whitney expressed, in a decided manner, his opposition to it, and by a majority vote the cause of poor Mr. A. was sustained.

"Well," said Mr. F., "Whom are you going to thank now, God or Judge Whitney?"

There was at this time but little system in conducting public schools here. Children carried to their desks or benches any kind of books parents or guardians found the cheapest or most convenient to furnish. Consequently there could not be a proper classification of the school, or economy of effort by the teacher. A large part of the time was occupied by the schoolmaster in the manufacture of pens from goose quills and arousing the fiend, by almost incessant obedience to the "wise man's" instructions. In the ill-ventilated school-room were long benches and seats, containing from 3 to 10 scholars each, crowded together in such a manner as to interfere as much as possible with their comfort and convenience. When school was dismissed, none but those who have been through such experiences can fully realize the joy occasioned by this temporary emancipation.

In a master, for the winter term, three qualifications were indispensable. He must understand how to make a good pen, and have an indomitable will, and sufficient physical power to maintain an absolute monarchy over "cabined, cribbed, confined," juvenile republicans, who, outside of school, were tolerated by their parents in all sorts of noisy, riotous demonstrations and ovations to the goddess of liberty. It was not without some influence upon the rising generation, that the old veterans from Bunker Hill, Saratoga and Bennington were then among us, living, walking realities and representatives of that desperate though successful contest under a banner on which was inscribed, in awful letters of fire and blood, "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

Almost daily, attended with cries of anguish, came physical conflicts between scholars and a master, who seemed as deficient in a knowledge of human nature, or philosophy of the mind, as in ability to make a watch.

Clearly comes before us recollections of that brute in human form, with stiff, black hair, standing like hog's bristles upon his head, slashing his rule indiscriminately upon innocent and guilty tremblers,

"Who had learned to trace

The day's disaster in his morning face."

"Romeo Wilson," "Tinsel Sargent,"

"Toad Cushing," and others were made to plainly understand if they received a blow from this modern Solomon, a severer one awaited them at home. The suffering victims of tyrannical outrages from teachers and parents, as was enough, and did make some hate school and master forever, well knew an exposure of their wrongs would not lessen them, therefore,

"That tale they did not then unfold."

Time brought some improvements, and other or different qualifications for teachers than those mentioned were demanded. The first time a blackboard appeared in the school-room was under the administration of Mr. C. C. Frost, in the winter of 1827. This gentleman, who is now called "the learned shoemaker," we think had as much will as any of his predecessors, but he did not spend so much of his time, as did most of them, in using the rod. While in the employ of the district, he was faithful to his charge, and it was said the school had never been so well kept before. He was obliged to labor under so many disadvantages, such as we have already alluded to, he could not be induced to continue in this work. He has ever since labored upon the human understanding, though in a different manner, in Main street.

As this place advanced in wealth, citizens from other States became residents here. Among those who have helped to bring about desirable changes in our school system, may be honorably mentioned Rev. ADDISON BROWN, a graduate of Harvard and first pastor of the second church established here. He gave early attention to this matter, was a frequent visitor of the schools and tried to influence others to do the same. As early as 1834, he made this matter a theme of a public discourse at his church on Fast day. From personal observation, we have reason to believe he improved every opportunity to move the people to establish the school system now in operation. With persistence and confidence, under some bitter persecution and but little, if any, encouragement, he labored on until seven years saw the accomplishment of his wishes. Then one of his most wealthy parishioners, who would have all the "poor boys boot-blacks," abandoned his residence in this village to avoid, it was said, paying his school tax.

In the autumn of 1841, sufficient interest was excited upon this subject, as to call several meetings, attended by both sexes, to hear a discussion of the new system, as advocated by Mr. Brown. Messrs. J. Dorr Bradley, L. G. Mead, J. Steen, John R. Blake, A. Brown and C. Davis, advocated the new movement and made the occasion highly interesting by their remarks. It was convincingly made evident to their audience, all real estate owners would be benefitted by having good schools, as a knowledge abroad of such a fact would be an inducement to people living in less favored places, to settle here for the educational advantages. Families coming here from this motive would make valuable acquisitions to this community, &c.

No outspoken opposition was manifested at these meetings and such an array of the talent and wealth of the place carried the question almost by acclamation.

Messrs. L. G. Mead, C. Davis and Joseph Steen were elected prudential committee, with instructions to reorganize the schools upon the new plan, and Moses Woolson was the first teacher of the central or most advanced school. He proved fully competent for his position and was quite fortunate in material upon which to operate, thereby building up a good reputation for himself as well as for the school.

Brattleboro is the first town in the State where was adopted the Massachusetts system of graded schools. The expense of sustaining the public schools for one year, were at first less than $2000. Now, (1870), as we learn from the report of the town superintendent, John Cutting, Esq., the expenses are over $6000 per year, for this village.

In 1857, and we think at some other times, there has not been that progress and discipline as was pleasing to the friends of common school education; but during most of the time since 1841 the schools have made good progress and given general if not universal satisfaction. During all this period of about 40 years, there has never been manifested anything like a general desire of the people to abandon the present system and return to the old ways. Under able management during the last 16 years, the most advanced school has maintained a high character and is now (1879), well worthy to be called a model school. Certainly no public institution is doing more good, or reflects so high honor upon the East village of Brattleboro.

That accomplished and able instructor, Mr. B. F. Bingham, now (1879), in charge of the high school, has served longer in this department than any one of his predecessors and no one has, since the beginning of the system, given better satisfaction.

MECHANICS.

Among the mechanics of the past, whose genius or inventive power has contributed to the welfare of the world, may be honorably noted the name of Sam'l G. Foster of this village. In the year 1828, Mr. Foster made an important improvement in paper making, called the "pulp dresser." This invention, we learn, is now used in all paper mills and is considered indispensable. Though others have received great benefits from the use of this invention, Mr. Foster received no compensation for this benefit to the world, in cheapening the cost in paper manufacture. The first mill where this invention was used, caused the discharge of 12 hands and at the same time accomplished more work in the mill than before the discharge. This invention caused the establishment in this place of a manufactory of paper machinery, a business that has been successfully carried on here about 40 years.

Mr. Foster died in Fitchburg, Mass., in 1870, aged about 75 years.

In 1832, and from that time to 1845, John Gore manufactured in this place stationary steam engines and boilers. He also made machinery used on steamboats for freight business on Connecticut river. In 1837 he constructed a steam carriage, for use on common roads, which we have seen ascend some of the hills in this village by the power of steam alone.

The genius and successful efforts of our old mechanics is not sufficiently appreciated. We are reaping, almost unconsciously, the fruits of their efforts with as little thought of their origin as we bestow upon those little silent coral workers beneath the sea, while we partake of tropical fruits and admire the beauty of islands on which they grow, reared by their unceasing industry.

Barnard A. Warren, born in Marlboro, Vt., in 1810, during some 10 years of life in East Brattleboro, gave evidence of great excellence in mechanical ability. Upon the urgent solicitation of the leading member of a large importing house in New York city, he left Brattleboro in the employ of this company, in March, 1840, and lived in Brooklyn until his death in May, 1850. Six years before he left this village for New York, he received an accidental gun-shot wound upon one side of his head, that came near proving fatal and impaired his health for some months. As his greatest successes in the exercise of his skill or inventive power, came after this accident, it is possible some new combinations or extra stimulus was given to his brain; as the health of some people has been improved by a shock of lightning. The aforesaid house in New York employed him to devise and construct machinery for the manufacture of steel pens. Up to this time they had employed during 5 or 6 years, the best mechanical talent they could find in this country for this purpose, but had been unable to produce an article that would successfully compete with the imported pen. Mr. Warren so fully answered the demands of his employers, after laboring for them 5 years, they tried to secure his services by written contract 8 years longer and at greatly increased compensation. He left his employers, after 5 years service and commenced the manufacture of gold pens. His labors in this new field and upon his own responsibility were attended with remarkable success. His career forms a noteworthy exception of the rule, viz: "Inventors sow for others to reap."

A MASONIC LODGE

Was in operation here several years before the "Morgan excitement." This excitement rendered the order unpopular in this State and meetings of the order were discontinued for many years. From a historical sketch of this organization by R. W. Clarke, Esq., we copy the following: -

The first Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons established in Brattleboro, was called Columbian Lodge, No. 34, and received its charter from the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Vermont, at its annual session held at Montpelier in October, A. L. 5812. The original petition for a Warrant of Dispensation to work, was dated March 27, A. L. 5812, and addressed to the Hon. John Chipman, at that time the Most Worshipful Grand Master of the G. L. of Vermont, signed by the following named Brethren, none of whom are now living, viz: Lemuel Whitney, Abram Kingsbury, Abram Tinker, Elisha Chase, Elihu Field, Jr., Samuel Elliot, Samuel Clark, John W. Blake, Nahum Cutler, Rodney Burt, Quartus Smead, Nathaniel Bliss, Aaron Barney, Samuel Dickenson, Richard Phillips, Porter Johnson, Joseph Brown and Asa Green. Grand Master Chipman, having considered the petition, granted his Warrant of Dispensation under date of May 5th, A. L. 5812, which permitted the brethren to hold their communications either at Brattleboro or Guilford. For many years after the Lodge was constituted, the meetings were held in Guilford, but subsequently in Brattleboro. This Lodge suspended work about the year A. L. 5830, and soon after surrendered its Charter to the Grand Lodge of the State, under a mandate to that effect. The Hon. Lemuel Whitney was the first appointed Master of this Lodge and held that office by election for many consecutive years from the date of the charter. Many if not most of the leading and influential men of Brattleboro and Guilford, during those times, were of its membership. Masters of the old Columbian Lodge were Samuel Whitney, Elihu Field, Artemas Robbins, Aaron Barney, Emerson Burnham, Dana Hyde, Jr., Ariel Root, John Hudson. The present lodge received its charter January, A. L. 5856, under the name of Columbian Lodge. No. 36. The warrant of dispensation was issued to the following named brethren, petitioners, by the late Grand Master, P. C. Tucker, under date of January 4, 5855, viz: Chas. Cummings, Louis Furst, E. J. Carpenter, A. P. Wilder, W. C. Bryant, J. H. Capen, H. R. Godfrey, H. Hastings, Ashbell Dickinson, Henry Smith, Samuel Knight and R. W. Clarke. Brother E. J. Carpenter was the first appointed Master of the Lodge, as also the first elected Master. The following brethren have held the office of W. M. since the constitution of the lodge, viz: E. J. Carpenter, R. W. Clarke, Wm. E. Nichols, Geo. H. Newman, Wm. H. Vinton, N. S. Howe, L. H. Dearborn, C. A. Miles, E. H. Putnam and A. J. Simonds." The present membership is 180.

AN ODD FELLOWS LODGE

Was instituted in this town in 1846. The ceremonies of organization were conducted by Grand Master Rev. Albert Case, from Massachusetts. The first Noble Grand was Rev. John Willis. The order is in a prosperous condition, and has within its ranks many worthy citizens.

At the time of the organization of this lodge there was no Grand Lodge of the State, therefore they applied to the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts for a dispensation.

BANKS.

The first monied institution in this place, called the Brattleboro Bank, was incorporated in 1821. Hon. Jonathan Hunt was the first president and Epa. Seymour first cashier. The institution always maintained a high character, and the first president and cashier continued in office during life. Mr. Hunt died in 1832, and Mr. Seymour died in 1854. Dea. John Holbrook succeeded Mr. Hunt in 1832, and upon the death of Mr. Holbrook, Epa. Seymour was chosen president. It was during the administration of the next president, Capt. Sam'l Root, that the institution was changed to suit the times into what is now called "Brattleboro National Bank," chartered July 13, 1865.

The cashiers from its first organization in 1821, to the last charter in 1865, are as follows: Epa. Seymour, Henry Smith, S. M. Clark, Horatio Noyes, Phillip Wells, Frank Wells. George S. Dowley, present cashier, 1876. Present capital $150,000.

*THE WINDHAM PROVIDENT INSTITUTION FOR SAVINGS

Was chartered in 1846 and it went into operation January 1847. Application was made for a charter in 1844 and in 1845, but without success, as but little was then known about savings banks in this State, and it was thought no more banks were needed in Vermont. In 1869, with liberty granted by the Legislature in 1867, the directors have erected a substantial brick building three stories in height, which in its general appearance, its finish and arrangements, its thorough construction, both as to material and work is a credit to the institution and an ornament to the village. L. G. Mead, Esq., was its treasurer from the time of its commencement to 1869. Under the able and faithful management of Mr. Mead, assisted by a board of directors selected from time to time from the best business men of Brattleboro and other towns in this county, the institution has attained its present success and importance. It has now, 1869, invested \$816,000. It has paid depositors $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the last 5 years. N. B. Williston, Esq., was the first president and L. G. Mead, Esq., was the last one chosen to fill that office in January, 1869.

THE WINDHAM COUNTY BANK.

N. B. Williston, president, and S. M. Waite, cashier, was first in operation in the year 1856. It is now called the First National Bank of Brattleboro, with a capital of $300,000.

ANTI-SLAVERY IN 1837.

From 1832 to 1840, lectures against slavery met with an unwelcome reception in many towns in New England. Public sentiment as manifested on this subject by the people of Brattleboro. in the summer of 1837, was more suited to the atmosphere of Hartford, Ct., or Charleston, S. C., than to the free air of Vermont. Looking back 40 years, in our history and realizing the comparatively isolated condition and quiet avocations of the people, it is hard to account for the diseased state of the public mind as then exhibited upon this subject. This disease by its malignancy or intensity soon worked its own cure. The conduct of the opponents to these lectures answered their oft repeated question, "Why do you come here to lecture upon slavery, where we have no slaves?" When ministers of the gospel refused to read notifications of anti-slavery meetings, when one justice of the peace in Brattleboro advocated the application of tar and feathers to the person of Rev. E. R. Tyler, because he gave lectures upon this subject at the Congregational chapel in Elliot street, and another justice of the peace said he would "find powder for the mob if they would blow the damned abolitionist down the bank"—we involuntarily became abolitionists. This crusade against free speech, this violation of the right of discussion, as manifested by firing cannons near the windows of the lecture room and loud disturbing, threatening shouts of a mob, sustained in this rascality, as we knew, by officers of the law and our nearest, and on other subjects, most rational neighbors—convinced thoughtful people that they had a work to do to emancipate themselves.

Such exhibitions of injustice or illiberality, in a community like this, are not without their uses, in the instruction they convey to perpetrators as well as the victims of it. Probably this place is now as free from public intolerance as any community in the world. There is ample proof that persecution, whether from combinations of men or individuals, is beneficial to the persecuted. In the autumn of 1842 a stone was thrown against the door of the Methodist chapel, in Canal street, while a Second Advent preacher was on his knees at prayer, he exclaimed instantly, "God bless that stone."

MILITARY IN BRATTLEBORO FROM 1724.

The circumstances in which our early settlers were placed, rendered necessary a constant appeal to force. Frequent attacks from Indians, French Canadians, growing out of old French War difficulties, claims and aggressions of New York, &c., so exercised their organs of combativeness, there was probably but little time or disposition to cultivate other departments of the brain. The military was, with them, the earliest and most important institution.

The first operations were commenced here 29 years before this town was chartered by the royal governor of New Hampshire. To protect her northern frontier from attacks from Canada, Massachusetts built a fort on grounds within the present limits of Brattleboro East village, on grounds now owned and occupied by Simon Brooks, Esq. In honor of Sir William Dummer, who was at that time Lieut.-Governor of Massachusetts, this fort received the name of "Fort Dummer." Sixteen years after the erection of this fort, the command devolved upon Col. Josiah Willard, and, we have been informed, his remains, with those of other early occupants of this fort, were placed in a cemetery upon the eastern bank of the Connecticut river, nearly opposite the site of the old fort.

Some of the monuments in this ancient cemetery are covered with lichens, and the inscriptions so effaced it is not possible to read them. The earliest date legible is

Several headstones have inscribed thereon the name Willard, and they were probably erected to the memory of the connections of the old commander.

Though from some of these headstones we cannot learn who was placed beneath them, yet the following inscription, copied from one of these monuments, furnishes good presumptive evidence that we have been correctly informed as to the last resting-place of Col. Josiah Willard:

"Here lies the remains of

MADAM HANNAH WILLARD,

Relict of Col. Josiah Willard, of Fort Dummer. She was an affectionate, faithful wife, a tender mother, a cordial friend, and a sincere Christian, and quitted mortality, May 13, 1772, in the 78th year of her age, leaving behind her a numerous progeny and a noble example."

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Of the "numerous progeny," this moss-covered record of a hundred years informs us, one was well-known to several citizens now living in this village, and we well remember an aged gentleman, known as "Mr. Willard," who lived with his son-in-law, Asa Green, Esq., near the entrance of High from Main street. There was in the possession of Mr. Willard, a musket with a barrel of unusual length. This interesting relic of the olden time had proved a very effective weapon in the hands of his father. Col. Willard, as several Indians, thereby assisted to their happy hunting-grounds, could testify. Mr. Willard several times visited the "Dummer Farm" when it was owned by the father of the present proprietor.

Interesting accounts and descriptions of the fort, from personal recollections, were given by Willard to Mr. Brooks. The size of the buildings and inclosure were given, and the exact location designated by stakes.

As here was the dawning-light, the first foot-print of civilization in this town, if not the first in the State, all interesting details of facts respecting it must ever be precious to the inhabitants of Brattleboro to all future time. For this reason, we present some particulars from

"HALL'S HISTORY OF EASTERN VERMONT."

"Col. John Stoddard, of Northampton, was ordered to superintend the building of the block-house. The immediate oversight of the work was committed to Lieut. Timothy Dwight, who, with a competent force, consisting of four carpenters, twelve soldiers, with narrow axes, and two teams, commenced operations on the 3d of Feb'y, 1734. Before the summer had begun, the fort was in such a condition as to be habitable. It was built of yellow pine, and was nearly 180 feet square. Within were four province houses, as they were called, two stories in height, comfortable, and, for those days, even convenient; besides which there were smaller houses, containing a room each, which could be occupied when the garrison numbered more than its usual complement of men.

Without, the fort was picketed. Posts, 25 feet in height, placed perpendicularly in the ground, side by side, and sharpened at the upper end, surrounded it on every side. Openings were left in the pickets through which to fire on the enemy, and at opposite angles of the fort, 25 feet from the ground and five feet above the tops of the pickets, square boxes were placed in which sentinels kept guard.

To the patereros, with which the garrison was originally furnished, several swivels were added in 1740, which enabled the inmates of the fort to receive the enemy with an enfilading fire, rendering the place comparatively secure.

There was in the fort a great gun whose report could be heard for many miles. This gun was never fired except as a signal for assistance, or on the reception of some news.

The force of Capt. Dwight, the first commander, numbered in all 55 effective men, of whom 12 were Indians of the Maquas tribe. October 11th the fort was attacked by the enemy, and four or five of its occupants either killed or wounded.

A trading or truck-house was built in 1731, for receiving articles of traffic from the Indians, and they came hither in large numbers to trade, bringing, to exchange for the products of the white man, deer, beaver and moose skins, and tallow. This traffic was carried on many years under the charge of Joseph Kellogg, who was captain and truck-master.

The Rev. Ebenezer Hinsdill was chaplain 12 or 14 years from 1730.

Capt. Josiah Willard assumed the command in 1740, and its former commander, Joseph Kellogg, was Indian interpreter until 1794.

In 1746, some of the block-houses on the river were burned, and during several months Fort Dummer was the most northern post provided with a garrison.

In 1747, Brig.-Gen. Joseph Wright, by order of the governor, directed Lieut. Dudley Bradstreet to take command of 40 men, and with them garrison Fort Dummer in place of the guard then stationed there. April 5th, Col. Josiah Willard was superseded by Bradstreet, but after five months the fort was again placed in care of its former commander, Col. Josiah Willard.

In the year 1748, the Rev. Andrew Gardner was appointed chaplain, and Col. Willard added two more swivels to the munitions. He also at this time made needed repairs to the fort. Dec. 8, 1750, Col. Josiah Willard died, and ten days thereafter was succeeded by his son, Maj. Josiah Willard, who formerly had charge of a garrison at Ashuelot.

In 1751, there was much alarm for the safety of the fort, but in consequence of vigilant activity in measures of defense, no incursions were made during the summer. In February, 1752, the garrison was reduced to five men. In this condition it remained, under the command of Major Josiah Willard, until January, 1754, when the General Court of Massachusetts voted, 'that from and after February next, no further provision be made for the pay and subsistence of the five men now posted at Fort Dummer, and that the Captain-General be desired to direct Major Josiah Willard to take care that the artillery and other warlike stores be secured for the government.'

In consequence of renewed hostilities on the part of the Indians, late in the summer of 1754, the garrison was increased and continued until 1757, under the command of Nathan Willard.

Records at Concord, N. H., show petitions, about this time, from the grantees of Brattleboro, asking, in consequence of trouble with Indians, for further time in which to comply with the terms of the charter of 1753.

Gov. Shirley, of Massachusetts, repeatedly requested New Hampshire to assist in the defense of Fort Dummer. Gov. Wentworth, of New Hampshire, was willing and anxious to render requisite aid to Fort Dummer and other forts in the western part of the State, but the Assembly of New Hampshire doggedly and obstinately refused to grant any appropriation for this purpose, or in any manner to second the proper and reasonable request of the governor.

Application was then made to the Massachusetts Legislature by Nathan Willard, and in a memorial by him, presented in August, it was stated that the enemy were continually lurking in the woods near the fort, and that during the past summer, 19 persons, within 2 miles of it, had been either 'killed or captivated.'

Thus, in the dark wilderness, surrounded by dangers, the infant Brattleboro sent forth its imploring cry for help. Her mother heard it, but she heeded not; but Massachusetts, that magnanimous, ever-faithful old nurse, heeded that cry from among the tall pines, and in her powerful arms she folded and guarded the wailing child.

During five or six years, after the last petition of the grantees for farther time in which to fulfill the conditions of the charter, there must have been a rapid increase in the population of Brattleboro, for in 1766, there was in this vicinity an organized regiment under the command of Col. Thomas Chandler.

Major John Arms, grandfather of the late Dr. Willard Arms, who died in 1863, aged, 83 years, received his commission as major of the afore-mentioned regiment in 1766. At the time John Arms received this commission, he kept a tavern, which stood at the foot of the first descent in the road a few rods north of the Vermont Asylum for the Insane. He owned the extensive meadows now in the possession of the Asylum. The occupants of this house, since the death of John Arms, in 1770, we name: Widow Susannah Arms, Josiah Arms, Peleg Kingsley, Joseph Goodhue, Nelson Crosby, Newman Hall. Mr. Allen sold the house and farm to the Vermont Asylum, and the venerable old house, which was standing at a recent date, was torn away by the present owners of the estate, and a new building erected upon the same ground.

Col. Ethan Allen, it has been said, made this old tavern-house his headquarters when he came here with a detachment of "Green Mountain Boys," to enforce obedience to the authority of Vermont, and we can furnish evidence that military companies in this town were warned to appear at this house "armed and equipped as the law directs."

The following is a copy of the commission received by Major John Arms from Gov. Sir Henry Moore. It was written upon parchment, and we received it from Willard Arms, Esq., who is great grandson of the old major:

COPY OF THE COMMISSION OF MAJ. JOHN ARMES, 1766.

"By his Excellency, Sir Henry Moore, Baronet, Captain-General and General-in-Chief in and over the Province of New York and the Territories depending thereon in America, Chancellor and Vice Admiral of the same.

Chandler, Esquire, is Colonel. You are, therefore, to take the said Regiment into your Charge and Care as Major thereof, and duly to Exercise both the Officers and Soldiers of that Regiment in Arms. in New York, the Twentieth day of Janua'y in the Sixth year of his Majestys Reign, Annoque Domini One Thousand Seven Hundred and Sixty Six."

H. MOORE.

By his Excellencys Command.

JOHN FRENCH.

From this commission we learn it was well understood that the place now known as Brattleboro was, in 1766, a province of New York, and also so considered 14 years later, when the town was first represented by Col. Samuel Wells to the New York Assembly.

AN ANCIENT DOCUMENT.

Mr. Zenas Frost, of this town, while looking over some old papers left by his grandfather, came upon a warrant of which the following is a literal copy:

"To Corporal Jesse Frost

[L. S.] In his Majestys Name you are hearby commanded to Warn all the Soldiers hearin Named to appear on tuesday ye thurteenth day of November next at Nine of ye Clock Before Noon at the house of the widdow Susanna Arms, Compleat with Arms and Aminition as ye Law Directs in Order for Vewing hearof fail not at ye pearcl of ye Law and make Due Return of your Doings to me.

"Given Under my hand and Seale at Arms in Brattleborough this Eighth Day of October 1770 in ye tenth year of his Majestys Reign.

Benja. Butterfield, Capt.

"Notify ye Sargants

"John Ellis, Nath'l french Jr, Benja. Butterfield Jur, Phillip Paddleford, Oliver Wells, Thomas Sergants, Josiah Armes, Jon't. Wells, Wm. Rile."

The foregoing rare gem of our military history was published in the Vermont Phoenix in 1871.

Six years before the War of American Independence commenced, Brattleboro troops, in short breeches and long stockings, were training under the command of Capt. Benjamin Butterfield, who was afterwards one of the first representatives of the town after the establishment of the authority of Vermont.

From a headstone in the cemetery in West River district, we learn that Benjamin Butterfield died Dec. 7, 1804, aged 79 years. According to this account, the first military captain, whom we can learn of in this place, after the town organization, was born 147 years ago.

In more modern times, as from 1845 to 1847, there was a company here, under the command of Capt. T. C. Lord, known as the "LaFayette Light Infantry." This company had a brief existence, but it was well sustained until the failing health of its popular commander caused his resignation.

The first company organized here was the old "Flood-wood Company." This name was probably given them, after the formation of the "independent" or uniformed companies, in derision for their plain dress and lack of military show. The name of the first captain known, has already been mentioned. Of later times the commanders have been: Capts. Warner, Jerry Frost, D. Mixer, Henry Clark, Benajah Dudley, Nathaniel Bliss, La Fayette Clark, Chas. C. Frost, in 1825; John Leavitt in 1829; Frederick Holbrook, afterwards governor of this State, in 1862; Perrin Smith in 1837; George Salisbury in 1840.

Not only was this company the first one in existence, but it existed the longest, and was, at one period, the largest in town. If they did not burn so much gunpowder at the annual June trainings as did other companies, and their general practice was more in accordance with the dictates of prudence and economy, there was undoubtedly as good, serviceable fighting material in it as in the ranks of birds of brighter plumage. They did, however, occasionally have a little brush with the Light Infantry.

In 1834, their lieutenant, B. A. Warren, was wounded and disabled in a contest with a company, which had a short time before been organized by Captain George Wood, soon after the dissolution of the old "Brattleboro Light Infantry."

As company records have rarely been preserved, we are under the necessity of jumping over long intervals of time, enlivened, no doubt, by interesting military events which would, if recorded, render this department of our subject of far greater value. There has been in existence here three companies of foot soldiers, and part of a cavalry company. The three first companies were known under the following names: "Brattleboro Light Infantry," "Brattleboro Artillery," and State Militia, without uniform, and often spoken of as "The Old Flood-wood Company."

THE BRATTLEBORO LIGHT INFANTRY

Was organized before the present century. The date of organization is not ascertained, but we have learned that the gentlemen whose names we give, have, at different periods, commanded the company:

Capt. Benjamin Smead, in 1797, when he was publishing "The Federal Galaxy," which was the first newspaper published in this town; Capt. Ebenezer Wells, in 1804. (Capt. Wells came from England with his father, Rev. Wm. Wells, D. D.); Capt. Howard Wells, in 1810, who was also a son of Rev. William Wells; Capt. Ebenezer Sabin, Capt. Daniel Bliss; Capt. Samuel Whitney, 1816 to '21, son of Hon. Lemuel Whitney; Capt. Nathaniel Chandler, 1822; Capt. Eli Sargent, 1823 '24, grandson of Col. John Sargent, who was born at Fort Dummer; Adolphus Stebbins, elected captain in 1824; Capt. Willard Frost, 1825 and '26; Capt. Chester Sargent, 1827, '29; William Brooks, captain in 1830; Capt. John King, in 1831, '32.

From 1816 to 1830, this company maintained full numbers, excellent discipline, and elegant uniforms; but their bright array, on a June morning, oftentimes became dim before night from dust, heat, and powder smoke. When making a bayonet charge upon the artillery, in 1820, a brass field-piece was discharged upon the advancing ranks of the infantry, by which two members of said company were laid prostrate on the ground, and for a time rendered insensible. Their faces were blackened and disfigured, and one of them carried the marks of that day's work to his grave.

The inevitable tubs and pails of whiskey-punch, immoderately used at these annual sham-fights, may have had something to do in making these exercises appear sometimes like real fights. It was needful, as our elders informed us, that Geo. Sargent, Hollan Pettis and Martin Sartwell should keep up an unceasing din with their drum sticks, on these occasions, to drown the groans of the wounded soldiers.

Among the causes which contributed to give a consequence to our citizen-soldiery of 1820 and '26, was a sprinkling in their ranks of veterans, who had seen service in the last war with Britain.

SOLDIERS OF 1812.

There was J. Wilson Landers and J. Freeman, who had stood on the deck with Com. Decatur when he captured the proud Macedonian. In the Brattleboro infantry were John Burnham, from Connecticut, and John Fowler, both soldiers in the war of 1812, and also Ebenezer Howe, grandson of Caleb Howe of Fort Bridgeman; in the artillery was Capt. Lewis Henry, who, in the same war, had served in a company commanded by Capt. James Elliot, and there were probably others, in the several companies, deserving of honorable mention, but their names have passed from our memory. But we can never forget the name, nor the dying words, of Col. Charles Cummings, who, during the late war, went out from among us to his death in the wilderness. With a defiant wave of his sword, came forth his last words, "Boys, save the flag!" By this closing scene of his brief career, we are reminded of Scott's poetic heroes, of whom it has been said, "How grandly they die, when die they must."

"A light on Marston's visage spread,
And fired his glazing eye;
With dying hand above his head,
He shook the fragments of his blade,
And shouted, 'Victory!'"

THE BRATTLEBORO ARTILLERY

came into existence shortly after the organization of the Infantry, and their first commander was Capt. Jacob Stoddard. Capt. Jonathan Hunt in 1811. He was afterward appointed Brig. Gen'l, and died while a member of Congress in 1832. Capt. Atherton, from 1812 to '15, Capt. Samuel Root, afterward last president of the old Brattleboro Bank, Capt. Simpson Goodenough, Capt. Osear Stoddard, Capt. Lewis Henry, in 1827, Capt. Willard Cobleigh, Capt. Roswell Goodenough, Capt. Albert Bennett, Capt. Argillas Streeter, Capt. Arnold J. Hines, afterward colonel of the regiment, Capt. Franklin Cobleigh, Capt. Jonathan Davis, in 1836 and '37.

Gen. Jonathan Hunt, when captain of this company in 1811, gave several hundred dollars for the purchase of arms and equipments. His promotion was followed by the election of J. Atherton as captain. During his command the National Capitol buildings were laid in ashes, and the air was filled with startling rumors of the defeat of our arms by British troops. Capt. Atherton made the following appeal to his company: "Every man who will do his duty and act as government may require him to act in this war, please to step forward three paces." The whole company moved the required distance, and that was as far as they ever did move in this war; but how much may have been the moral effect of this manifestation upon the common enemy, or how much credit is due the Brattleboro Artillery for taking those three brave steps toward the British lion, we may never know.

This much is certain: rumors of a directly opposite character followed this event. The joyful news from Plattsburg, followed by a blaze of glory from New Orleans, made every Yankee believe he could whip his weight in wildcats, and unitedly clean out the rest of creation. New uniforms were procured, regardless of expense, and "Yankee Doodle" and Fourth of July

"Ruled the camp, the court, the grove."

One of the captains on our list, now past 90 years of age, lately informed us he paid $57 for his coat and $9 for 3 dozen buttons, at the time oats would bring but 17 cents per bushel, and all agricultural products were proportionately low.

During some months, or years, after their organization, the artillery company used, in their military exercises, simply indifferent swords. This was too much like playing Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet left out. After they came in possession of two field-pieces, one of them, it has been said, was taken from Burgoyne at Bennington, there was a noisy demonstration, accompanied by the breaking of window-glass in the East village, quite extensively; much powder was burned, and a lively market created for old West India rum and "black-strap." If the actors in this scene were not drunk or sick before the close of the exercises, some of them, at least, appeared as if very much discouraged.

With other juveniles of that day, now past life's meridian, we shared in the fear, awe and reverence inspired by the black artillery. Dressed in long, black, swallow-tail coats—profusely covered with brass buttons of the size and shape of a large musket-ball—tall, bell-shaped, black leather caps, mounted by long, waving, black plumes, gave this company such a solemn, funeral air when on parade, they might be taken as undertakers of the regiment.

Not even the lively rattle of Sartwell's drum, the piercing notes of Greenleaf's fife, nor the cheering strains of Joy's bugle, could divert our melancholy, gloomy forebodings, when the Artillery company seized their drag-ropes to move their mighty, loud-sounding instruments of death to bear upon the gaily-dressed Light Infantry.

At a sham fight in 1821, Lieut. Emerson Goodenough, of the Artillery, was so severely wounded he was compelled to suffer the amputation of his arm at the shoulder. The accident was caused by some neglect of the usual custom in managing the field-piece. This sad event occasioned a sudden stop to the exercises of that day; but on the next appointed time for the display of Brattleboro chivalry, all thoughts of danger seemed forgotten, and the inspiring sounds from Greenleaf, Sartwell, Joy, Pettes, &c., aroused a martial spirit that could be satiated alone by the explosion of gunpowder in the faces of ideal enemies.

In the excitement and hurry of action there has been, we learn, a neglect to withdraw the ramrod from the gun before the charge was fired. This, with many other liabilities of accident, makes it surprising that there were so few casualties, so few really sad occasions to record.

The artillery has ever been considered an indispensable element in celebrations of the Fourth of July. With memories of our youth and joyful anticipations, there come, like remembered music, recollections of the heavy echoes of the guns of this company—mellowed and softened by distance—when fired in the early morning of our national anniversary. These venerable brass pieces, when not in use, were stored under the old church, on the Common. Under the same building, waiting for sad, needful occasions, was keeping company with these instruments of death, under the house of God. These objects separately had each a deep significance, but in their association they gave additional importance to each other, and brave was that boy who would venture alone into their awful presence.

In 1837, Capt. Jonathan Davis revived the expiring embers of military enthusiasm in this company. A new uniform was procured, and the wood-work of the guns was repaired and newly painted. This proved to be the last revival, before the final dissolution, of the organization. The wheels and other wood-work of the guns rotted away or disappeared, and for years nothing was seen to remind us of the old glory but two heavy, lonesome old brass cannon, lying under Capt. Lord's horse-bed. Unreverenced and unappreciated as they were, they could not die or decay, as had all else with whom they had been associated in the early days of their advent here.

A demagogue or politician would sometimes drag them from obscurity to announce party success; but rarely were they called upon, as in days gone by, to proclaim the glory of the nation, in the dim, misty light of early morning. The sensitive temperament of one of this long-united couple could bear this indignity no longer, and has left us, we have reason to believe, forever. When last heard from, it was nearly 100 miles away, "marching to the sea."

The military gatherings in this town, called musters, in which appeared companies from other towns, and sometimes attended by invited companies from out of the State, excited the universal attention of the public, and crowds of both sexes attended these meetings or reviews. A resident of Augusta, Ga., but a native of Connecticut, gave us the following information:—

"From 1815 to '23, I lived in Brattleboro, and during this period I attended a military muster in that town. Col. Henry Jones Blake was in command, and he well understood his duty. When marching through Main street, the military bands of the several companies united. I know not how many wind instruments were in operation, but I counted 50 drums, and ten of them were large bass drums. The noise made by this band exceeded anything of the kind I have ever heard since; but the most pleasing impression left upon my mind was the address, action and elegant appearance of Col. Blake." [Son of J. W. Blake, Esq., first postmaster, 1790.]

Col. Blake was, if we are rightly informed, in the war of 1812, and had a military education.

Of other regimental commanders who have made this their place of residence, were: Gen. Mann; Gen. Jonathan Hunt; Col. Paul Chase; Col. Joseph Goodhue; Gen. Jonathan Smith; Col. Lewis Henry; Gen. F. H. Fessenden; Col. Nathan Miller; Col. Albert Bennett; Col. Arnold J. Hines, and there were probably others whose names do not occur to us. They have mostly or all disappeared, and now it is more difficult to find the holiday soldier of the halcyon days of 1825, than it then was to find a living relic of the Revolutionary war.

Before daylight, one muster-day morning, in 1826, the "Guilford Light Infantry," with loud music, awakened the slumbering citizens of this place. Capt. Phillip Martin—the oldest captain in the regiment—then commanded this company, and only about a dozen years had passed since he had marched through this place with 16 Guilford soldiers, on their way to Plattsburgh. These facts, with the commendable virtue of early rising, and being the first company on duty, seemed to entitle this company to such consideration as to offer them position upon the right wing of the regiment.

But the "Brattleboro Light Infantry" had just got a "Royal Kent Bugle," new tents and new uniforms; therefore they made a fine show. "Clothes make the man," had long been an adage; why not clothes make the soldier? Carlyle said, the gown and wig had so much to do in making an English judge, that if he was deprived of them, and a wood-sawer's garb substituted, no one would call him a judge, or respect his authority as such.

wing, and old Guilford, once the independent republic and empire town, was ordered upon the left wing.

Capt. Martin refused to obey the Colonel of the regiment, and did not appear with his company on the field, but marched his soldiers in by ways and all ways about the village, where they kept up a constant firing of muskets, and, by their independent action, attracted much observation. The Guilford troops unitedly sustained their Commander, it was said, on the following ground: "By military law, or precedent, the company having the senior captain could claim position on the right."

After a conflict of arms came a conflict of opinions and some unpleasantness from the action of Capt. Martin in showing disrespect to his superior officer and giving so flagrant an example of insubordination. But the most serious affair of the day was the death, by accident, of an old soldier of the Revolution, known as Grandpa Thompson.

GRANDPA LEMUEL THOMPSON

Was a native of Connecticut and came to Brattleboro in 1816, and lived with his son, Isaac Thompson, the remainder of his days. He never held rank or position, but was a private in the army of Washington, in 1777. He was truthful, honest, and far from being pretentious, vain or boastful of his service in the cause of liberty.

Respecting his career in the army, he related to us the following incident, which we give as nearly as possible in his own language:

"The commanding officer ordered us all into a ditch. Every man was told to keep there until further orders. We stayed there several days and got so dry and hungry life didn't seem worth having. One fellow vowed he wouldn't stand it any longer, and jumped out of the ditch, but he didn't more than get out when he fell down dead, his body completely riddled with bullets. I then thought it was best to stand it a little longer."

After Grandpa Thompson told this story he seated himself with us at our dinner table and partook of his last dinner, and then with hands crossed behind him, he slowly moved towards the muster ground, where is now Forest Square. On his return, near the close of the day, the highway crowded with people, many of them from other towns in a hurry to get home, there was a test of speed in horses by the efforts of drivers to pass by teams ahead of them. During this rush of wheels, animals and men, poor old Grandpa Thompson was run over on High street. A violent blow upon his head, from the foot of a horse, destroyed all consciousness immediately and forever.

Not a long time elapsed after this eventful day, when a tribunal assembled at the old Stage house, in Main street, before which Capt. Martin appeared on a charge of playing "Grouchly."

"Not a drum was heard," nor a drum stick seen, but the tap, tap, tap, of the toddy stick kept time to the movements of gay uniforms, as they passed in and out of the house. There was a thorough trial of the spirits in the house, however it may have been with the veteran captain. Military laws and precedents were expatiated or commented upon, by opposing advocates, and it was finally decided that Capt. Martin had done nothing worthy of death or any other punishment.

The regiment at this time was under the command of Col. Nathan Miller, of Dummerston, in this county. His commanding appearance when on duty, good taste and decided military proclivities, made his appointment to this office seem to us eminently proper.

With generous, noble impulses, he had great veneration for the old soldiers of the Revolution.

Whenever he served as a marshal, or on a committee of arrangements for any celebration, or public gathering, his first and greatest solicitude was for the honor and comfort of these old men. There was to him a peculiar charm in the number 76. He lived to that age, passing the last 40 years of his life in Brattleboro. When he could find no more living veterans of '76, his work on earth was ended and he followed on after them.

THE LAST MUSTER

In this place, by legal authority, we think occurred in 1837, and was considered by all a feeble affair. It was on grounds now known as Forest Square, on Western Avenue.

A volunteer muster came off in a short time thereafter, attended by invited companies from New Hampshire. The Ashuelot Guards, from Hinsdale, and the Chesterfield Rifles, from Chesterfield, helped greatly to improve the military aspect. The Vernon troops gave a poetical touch to the occasion as they moved past our dwellings before daylight in the morning, keeping step to that grand old tune or march, "The Banks of Ayr." Making some complimentary remarks respecting this company, to a venerable citizen of Vernon: "By zounds," replied uncle Bob, "I marched after that tune 40 years ago."

This military gathering was called Chapin's muster, as that gentleman was the highest officer on parade. How much he had to do in bringing about this event, we are not informed, but he was very active in the movement, and much interested in this military revival, as was evident from the address he delivered near the close of the day, to the assembled troops. He was sorry to see a decline in the military spirit of our people, as was manifested by late events, for the following reasons: "The rapid increase of our population from people unfitted for the duties of freemen. Our institutions and privileges for self-government have been obtained by the bayonet and by the bayonet they must be maintained.

The law is force. The last argument to which kings resort, is the only effectual one we can use, when tyranny or ignorance shall obstinately try to impede or defeat our progress. The time is not far off when there will be needful occasion to use this argument."

In 24 years the events of 1861, proved that the volunteer general was not a false prophet.

The good order, harmonious action, very appropriate speech and a fine day, made this a pleasant affair; but in permanent benefits to this institution, this military revival did but little.

In the summer of 1840, an attempt was made to enforce the military laws. Some 40 or 50 delinquents were summoned to appear before a court martial in the hall of the old Vermont house, which was burned down in February, 1852.

Col. Taft in bright military attire presided at this court. Other regimental officers in official costume appeared upon the scene, and dignified, learned mouth-pieces of the law came to expound ponderous russet-colored volumes of statutes. Shivering culprits stood before this imposing array of Mars and Minerva awaiting impending doom.

After the day was nearly spent in hearing cases and imposing fines, it was ascertained by J. Dorr Bradley, Esq., that all the citations had been served upon the defendants before the 12 days grace had expired, which was by law granted the soldier, in which to make his excuse for non-appearance on military duty. In consequence of this revelation not a fine was collected, but there were loud cheers for J. D. Bradley.

The result was quite unsatisfactory to some military officials who, it was said, had declared it their intention to devote a portion of the cash obtained from defendants, to some festive purpose.

In some towns where the Col. held his court, he met with unpleasant receptions and suffered some personal indignities, while in the discharge of his duty. His clothing was, in some towns, spattered with objectionable matter, and other things were done to show disrespect to military law.

Though the mission of Col. Taft was unwelcome to the delinquents in this place, he suffered no violence or illegal interruption in the discharge of his duty.

People respected military law about the same as they do temperance laws, and very little training, from fear of the law, was done here after this trial in 1840.

The veterans of the old flint lock and log cabin days, had departed, and with them went the inspiration of grand marches, martial music and powder explosions against imaginary enemies.

During 20 years after the war of 1812, the universal cry was, "In peace prepare for war." The cost of uniforms, equipments, gunpowder, rum punch and time spent in these preparations, made an expense or tax upon the people great enough to carry on quite extensive hostilities. There was, however, this difference, blank charges exploded from their guns, and the deadly charges came from their canteens. Finally it was generally believed we were preparing for what would never come again, and the work of heroism, at least on the battle-field, was considered done forever.

The people of this community, as over all sections of the North, were "gazing on the armour suits of buried giants as if no brave acts could now be done," until aroused to action by the guns of the rebellion, in 1861.

ANCIENT ROLL OF HONOR.

Soldiers of 1776, who have lived in Brattleboro:

Oliver Chapin, Reuben Church, Obadiah Gill, Wm. Harris, James Dennis, Dan'l Harris, Isaac Pratt, Oliver Jones, Ichabod King, Dan'l Stearns, David Wells, Thomas Akely, Sam'l Bennet, Joel Bolster, Wm. Butterfield, John Bemis, Jabez Clark, Benjamin Chamberlain, Benajah Dudley, Warren Esterbrooks, Salathiel Harris, Elihue Hotchkiss, Income Jones, Bromer Jenks, Joseph Joy, Elias Jones, Israel Jones, Thaddeus Miller, John Kelsey, Hezekiah Salisbury, Levi Shumway, Sylvanus Sartwell, Reuben Stearns, Thomas Simpson, Nathaniel Sampson, Sam'l Willington, Lemuel Thompson, Wm. King, Cushing King, Royall Tyler, John Alexander.

National gratitude to the old soldiers of the Revolution very much increased about 1826, or soon after the last visit of Lafayette to this country. Previous to that time, pensions were paid only to the poor dependent soldiers; but after 1832, no discrimination was made as to pecuniary circumstances, and the widow of a soldier received the same pension as was paid her husband.

Our list of their names is probably far from complete, as some of the soldiers never received a pension, therefore their names are not on the list.

All of the adventures or personal reminiscences of those who have died in this town, would, if recorded, be without doubt, entertaining and instructive.

We can give but few events of this character,

"For sealed is now the lips that could have told."

During the life of these old heroes among us, the most popular gatherings of the people were of a military character, and the most joyful day of the year, the 4th of July.

From 1816 to 1845, there was rarely, if any newspapers issued not containing obituary notices of soldiers of the Revolution. Since 1850, or very near that time, the occasion for such notices ceased, and the military spirit of the people almost entirely passed away, or slumbered, until awakened by the guns of Sumpter.

At the beginning of the Revolutionary war, Mr. King and his twin sons, William and Cushing King, were living on what has long been known as the Rufus Clark place. On the 19th of June, two days after the battle of Bunker Hill, they learned of that event as they were hoeing corn. They immediately stopped work and prepared for war, first placing their hoes against a stump in the woods. Mr. Chandler, then a store keeper in this town, furnished the three men with guns and ammunition. The next morning, three days after the battle, they were on their way to Boston, where they enlisted. They participated in the important actions of the war, they passed the long dark night of liberty, with Washington at Valley Forge, and not until the morning came, when their services were no longer needed, did they return to their home, in Brattleboro, where they found their hoes beside the stump, exactly where they placed them seven years before. In all this long service not one of them was wounded or received, as we were told, "one single scratch."

Oliver Chapin was a member of Washington's body guard. The most interesting event to him during the service was when his bridle was rendered of no use in managing his horse, by a musket ball from the enemy. He came from Orange, Mass., to make his home in Brattleboro, near the beginning of the present century. He became one of our county judges and held other offices with credit to himself and honor to his constituents. Eminently capable, enterprising and persevering, he proved the right man for the time and place.

Not only did he erect several buildings in Main street, destroyed by fire in 1869, but he was chiefly instrumental in building the first bridge connecting this village with New Hampshire. Application for the charter was made in 1801, and the bridge and Hinsdale turnpike was completed in 1806. As he died in 1811, at the age of 51 years, he must have been active and energetic to accomplish so much in so short a time. His venerable widow died in 1849, at the age of 84 years, universally respected.

CEMETERIES.

PROSPECT HILL CEMETERY IN 1872.

N. B. Williston, President; George Newman, Secretary of the company; Timothy Vinton, Julius J. Estey, S. M. Waite, Dr. Wm. Rockwell, Trustees.

The land first used for this cemetery was given, for the use of the East Village of Brattleboro. in 1797, by Joseph Clark, Esq., and his wife, the first occupant, was buried there the same year.

Additions to this land, upon the east and south, have been made by purchase, as required by an increasing population.

In the care of cemeteries in small villages, eighty years ago, neglect was the rule, yet even in early times some persons made the burial-places of their families attractive by neatly-arranged grounds, flowers and costly monuments. Sufficient labor was bestowed every year by individuals, upon their own family lots, as to render more noticeable the surrounding general neglect. Neatness and well arranged grounds, in Prospect Hill cemetery, is now the rule, rather than the exception. The solemn looking, round-top, black headstone, with wings of cherubim shielding memento mori, is a thing of the past. Mullen, red sorrel, have disappeared, giving place to more choice and fitting decorations. Some rare works of art, in memory of the dead, can now be seen in this cemetery.

The monument of the late Col. James Fisk—designed by Larkin G. Mead—has attracted many visitors from afar and near. The shaft is of Italian marble, with four nude female figures, made of the same material, in a sitting posture, with their backs toward the shaft—two of them facing east and the other two facing west—representing the principal departments of human effort wherein Col. Fisk engaged during his brief career in New York. No language we can use will do this work justice in description, but we can say it is perfectly beautiful, and is as fitting a memorial of the artist who designed it as of him who now lies beneath it. It is to us a constant reminder of that young genius of our village, who, over 20 years ago, made for himself a national reputation by his monument of snow.*

The memorials of Hall, Francis, A. H. Bull, Rockwell, and of several others we might name, are very elegant, chaste, and fitting the purpose designed.

Located upon a high elevation, overlooking a large portion of the village—depot grounds, Connecticut river, and the mountainous country on the north—this place is a frequent resort of many persons in summer time, who seem to never tire in their admiration of the lovely prospect spread out before them.

Although this place of the dead is the largest of the five cemeteries of the town—and contains the remains of all, or very nearly all, the business proprietors and real-estate owners of this place, fifty years ago—yet, it is not the most ancient place of the kind in this town. To find where we must go to a much higher elevation, over two miles distant.

By ascending a long hill, nearly north from Centerville, and about a mile distant from that place, we find the ancient burial place of the town. It is but a few rods north of the home of Micah Townshend, which, in the year 1800, he sold to Hon. Royall Tyler. The place is now (1878) owned and occupied by Gilbert Smith, Esq.

For an interesting description of the same see letter of Hon. R. Tyler, in Tyler papers.

In this cemetery is the grave of our first representative—Col. Sam'l Wells—and also of the first minister settled in this town—Rev. Abner Reeve. Maj. John Arms, one of the early settlers, and grandfather of the late Dr. Willard Arms, was buried here six years before the beginning of the war of the Revolution. Three generations of this early family, and our early physician, Dr. Lem'l Dickerman, lie buried here.

Over West river—that charming place of our earliest recollections—is another ancient place of the dead, where can now be seen the headstone which marks the grave of Col. John Sargent, the first English child born in the State of Vermont. In addition to the foregoing information, engraved upon the stone is the following:

Advising them to prepare for death.”

The first military captain we can learn of, outside of Fort Dummer, in this town, is Capt. Benjamin Butterfield, and in this burial ground is his memorial stone. His daughter taught the district school in Brattleboro, East village, nearly 60 years ago, and the writer of this article received from her his first lessons in the spelling book, and also received from her a severe whipping because he forgot the small letter—a.

EARLY PHYSICIANS OF BRATTLEBORO, FROM 1786.

Drs. Henry Wells, Lemuel Dickerman, Geo. Holmes Hall, Russell Fitch, Willard Arms, Artemas Robbins, Jonathan A. Allen, John L. Dickerman, Phillip Hall, Daniel Gilbert Bruce, John Wilson, Dana Hyde, Reuben Spaulding, F. J. Higginson, Kitteredge, Robert Wesselheft, William Grau, Loewenthal, Carley, Blackall, Murphy, Cross, Ayres, E. Chapin, Geo. P. Wesselheft, Bowles, Morrill. From 1838 to 1845, three Thompsonian, or botanic, physicians were in practice here, viz.: Joseph and Oliver Wright and Page.

Of the given list, 19 are not living, and none of them now live in this town.

DR. LEMUEL DICKERMAN.

Born Oct. 18, 1751, married in Brattleboro to Lucinda Arms, Mar. 17, 1779, died Oct., 1732. It has been said that he was the first established physician in this town, but, according to later information, he was the second, and the longest in practice. With but one exception, no physician in Brattleboro has lived so many years, and few, if any, have had a more successful career.

He was a good manager. He attended faithfully to a wide practice, and, at the same time, successfully carried on a large farm, situated about 3 miles northwest from Brattleboro, East village.

The old house he occupied is yet (1869) standing, without change, save that effected by time and neglect. One of the few relics left of the first village of the town, where is the greatest evidence of a former population, is the old cemetery wherein the Doctor sleeps.

There is character expressed in a well-preserved painting of him, in possession of his grandson. Blending with good humor and penetration, something tells of conscious power in reserve for occasion. The accuracy and quickness of perception, for which he was noted, as also a proclivity for the healing art, seems to have been hereditary in his posterity to the third generation. His son, Dr. John L. Dickerman, was an established physician in this town about 40 years, and his two sons, William and Lemuel, are members of the same profession, in Eastern Massachusetts.

DR. WILLARD ARMS.

Born in Brattleboro, Dec. 2, 1880, the 3d generation from Maj. John Arms. (See military history preceding) studied with Dr. Wm. S. Williams, of Deerfield, Mass., Feb. 8, 1803, married Susan Arms, of Deerfield, went immediately to Stukely, Canada.

After about a year, he was called back to settle the estate of his father, Josiah Arms, who died in possession of the meadow farm (now of the Vermont asylum, which had belonged to the Major, his father).

Dr. Arms remained in practice in his profession in this place about 14 years. He built the house at the East village now owned and occupied by N. B. Williston, Esq. In 1818, he sold his house and practice to Dr. Artemas Robbins, conditioned that he should not practice in this town for 10 years, and followed his profession, the most of this time, in Northfield, Mass.

In 1833, he returned and settled in the West village, where he remained 30 years, and died, Sep. 25, 1863, aged almost 83 years.

He practiced 60 years, 44 in this town, where, in many branches of his profession, his counsel was often sought. He was considered the leading authority in obstetrics, small-pox, &c.

"When I am sick," said he, "I don't want medicine; but I live on corn-meal hasty-pudding until the disease gets disgusted and leaves me."

His long life and good health was owing, in no small degree, undoubtedly, to excellent care, good habits, and a large share of good common sense.

First resident physician at the East village, commenced practice here about 1790. He added to his professional labors the mercantile.

From a report of expenses for building the first meeting-house at the West village, presented us by Hon. Fayette Clark, we quote:

"Report of Accompts. by Meeting-House committee." "Dr. George H. Hall, £46.10.2=§155.26-100, for rum, sugar, glass, white lead, &c." The foregoing is one of 56 accounts, reported by this committee, amounting in all to £696.12.1.=§2988.6-100.

Dr. Hall's store for the sale of drugs, medicines and New England goods, stood, in 1797, at the southeast corner of the front grounds of the brick house, in Main street, of Geo. Howe, Esq.

In 1797, a clerk in the employ of Dr. Hall, caused the complete destruction of his store and goods by contact of a lighted lamp, in his hand, with an open cask of alcohol. The cask of spirits exploded and scattered the flames with such rapidity there was no time to save anything. There was no insurance. It was a blow to Dr. Hall, it has been said, from which he never recovered. He lived about 10 years after this, and died in 1807, aged 44.

In January, 1798, Rev. Dr. Wells, in remarks from the pulpit upon the past year, said: "I allude to two very calamitous events in our midst during the year that has just closed—the death by drowning of two promising young men, Taylor and Palmer, and the destruction by fire of the property of our friend and neighbor, Dr. Hall."

Two sons of Dr. Hall, George W. and Gardner C., became successful traders in this place.

George married Sarah Holbrook, a daughter of Dea. John Holbrook, in Sept., 1818, but his life came to an early close. He died in 1825, leaving a widow and three children.

Gardner C., slender built and, to appearance, physically feeble, became, at one period, the most extensive merchant in this county.

While doing a large wholesale and retail business in dry goods, hardware and West India products, he engaged in the manufacture of linseed oil, cotton, iron, &c., and not the least among the benefits he conferred upon this community was the encouragement he gave to home industry by finding a market for its products.

Not the least interesting event in our old times was the arrival of one of Hall's flat-bottom ships, laden with 20 or 25 tons of merchandise from the port of Hartford, Ct. The large white sails, swelling up the rapids on their important mission, along the shore of tall trees and banks of summer verdure, were assisted by hard-handed, swift watermen, who, on arrival at the landing, were sure to gratify their weakness for the contents of the old back store of their patron.

He was a prominent member of the Unitarian society. We believe, no one contributed more material aid in erecting the second meeting-house in the East village, in 1831.

To public improvements he gave his right hand and purse together. To all shams he presented a quiet, uncompromising front. From the administration of Jackson to that of Pierce, he was opposed to the Democratic party, and, as a devoted Whig, was chosen to represent his native town in the State Legislature.

and his family lived on Main street, in the East village, as early as 1816, but how long before we are not able to state.

The house he owned and occupied was, in 1828, in the possession of Willard Pomroy, who, by enlargements, converted it into a hotel, called the Vermont House, opened to the public in 1829 or '30. In 1849, it was removed, and a new brick hotel of three stories was erected in place by Capt. Thomas C. Lord. In Feb., 1851, this hotel was destroyed by fire, and the ground is now occupied by the Episcopal church and Town hall.

Dr. Allen is spoken of in high terms of commendation by the few aged citizens in our village who remember him. The recollection of his proficiency in chemistry is yet fresh in the mind of the oldest native citizen of this village, who was one of a class, under instructions from Dr. Allen in this science, and listened to his lectures upon this subject in 1820 '21. He was an honor to the profession; gentlemanly, prudent and considerate in his intercourse and dealings with his fellow-men.

He left this place, at some period from 1822 to '24, for a wider field, and satisfactorily did he prove his capability for the same in the way he long and faithfully fulfilled the duties he accepted, as professor of chemistry in Middlebury college.

bought the house and practice of Dr. Willard Arms, in the East village. At first sight no one could mistake his calling.

He had that dignity of person and general appearance requisite to meet our ideal, as to the externals, of a first-class doctor. A faithful painting of him would be recognized at once as that of an M. D.

The Dr. sleeps more than 20 miles from this place, but of the good he did, during his short mission of 8 years in this place, we every day experience.

He was one of the nine originators and owners of the Northern Aqueduct company, which first went into practical operation about 60 years ago, and now continues to supply several families with water.

Efficient as he generally was in the discharge of missions thrust upon him, there was a chronic difficulty in that huge old machinery, called the town clock, he failed to remedy.

As the old thing was irregularly ticking, and pounding out uncertain sounds, up in that old church tower on the Common, the troubled countenance and anxious eye of Dr. Robbins could be seen moving about the village in pursuit of ability such as he could trust to make the needed repairs. The desire of his heart would be gratified if he could only find that universal genius, Tom Stores, with his head level. The doctor knew that Tom could make nice tempered and beautiful surgical instruments, such as, in 1821, severed the arm of Lieut. Goodenough at the shoulder. In short, there was scarcely anything that could be done with the fingers, Tom could not do when he was not on a bender, but when the rum came in his wits went out, and he would do nothing but pound a bass drum until the heads broke in.

After the doctor moved from this place to Bellows Falls, in 1826, to the old clock

"There came an hour of peaceful rest."

It became so accustomed to resting and rusting it would not do anything else. In 1832, it was taken down, to make room for a new successor.

Dr. Robbins became a partner with Dr. Wells in establishing a drug store at Bellows Falls, Vt. In consequence of investing nearly all his property in railroad stocks, that became comparatively worthless, he came to the close of a long life, in 1860, in destitute circumstances.

came, and was in practice here, from 1828 or '29 until 1841, when he removed to officiate in the Massachusetts General Hospital at Boston, where he died, some years since, of Asiatic cholera.

He studied surgery, under instructions from the noted Dr. Twichell, of Keene, N. H., and was a good surgeon. If deficient in knowledge respecting subjects coming under his consideration, he had the courage to acknowledge it, or at least was not so careful to conceal it as he was diligent to seek the remedy. Said Hon. J. Dorr Bradley: "I had confidence in Dr. Gilbert from the moment I discovered this feature in his character."

There was a bluntness in his manner not always pleasing to his patients. A stout-built, vigorous young man was under his treatment for fever. The fever left him, as did also the doctor, but it became necessary to recall the doctor, for the patient had a relapse, from indulgence of appetite too soon.

"Sick again?" said the doctor. "Well, good constitution; you can stand this thing, I reckon, once or twice more, if you choose; therefore, as soon as you get over this difficulty, eat too much again, before you are able to exercise enough to digest it."

Willing to accept truth from any source, yet not confined to rules of others, but original, progressive and courageous, he was the man for emergencies. His prescriptions were often simple, while effectual. In a case of obstinate, continued hiccup, which he traveled 7 or 8 miles to visit, the remedy he ordered was simply popped corn, which gave to the patient immediate relief.

of Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, came to this place in 1836. He had previously passed some years in Dunmeston and Newfane.

In some way he was connected with Thomas Arnold in building a steam saw-mill at the southeast part of the East village, on the site now occupied by the Vermont and Massachusetts R. R. Co., for their depot and other buildings. The old-fashioned cylinder boilers required so much fuel, to create the needful power, the mill proved an unprofitable investment. Arnold disappeared, and the mill was for several years useless property on the hands of the Doctor.

The Doctor married a daughter of Selah Chamberlain. His wife returned to her father, after becoming the mother of one child, and he lived a solitary, secluded life until 1847, in a small house, standing near the silent mill.

In a rather inferior carriage, accompanied by his little boy, he visited, in rural districts, those persons who required his professional services, which, in some instances, were highly appreciated.

Though gifted with rare powers of conversation, which gave evidence of extensive information, he rarely, if ever, sought the society of those who could best appreciate him, or the company we should suppose would have been most congenial to a man of his high cultivation.

The visits necessity compelled him to make to the grocery and stores, were improved by some people to draw forth ideas, or get opinions from this mysterious oracle, and when well started in conversation, we have noticed a charmed circle of attentive listeners gather around him, and all seemed willing to adhere to the maxims of Zeno.

Upon one occasion I heard him remark: "I have never witnessed such extravagances in the use of language as I have noticed in New England. For instance, Mr. H. said to me, 'Doctor, there is some grand, almighty, elegant, magnificent, splendid, nice, fresh fish.' My first impression was that Mr. H. had just returned from St. Peter's at Rome, or from the grand Cathedral at Milan, and had commenced to enlighten me upon his discoveries; but judge of my surprise, after he had used up superlatives enough to do justice to the architecture of the middle ages, my attention was directed to a few small, dead fishes."

After the death of Dr. Wilson, in 1847, a book was published presenting circumstantial evidence to show we had been entertaining "Thunderbolt" unawares, and our quiet, obscure, peaceable Dr. Wilson was the accomplice of the notorious Lightfoot, an English highwayman, who suffered the death penalty, many years ago, for his crimes.

Many persons thought the evidence of sufficient weight to make the idea interesting, but how extensively it was believed we are not able to state. If the most the advocates of this theory claimed was true, death had closed the door against all action and passed the case onward beyond all human jurisdiction.

As if to more fully complete the work of forgetfulness, the Irishman's shovel has been employed, until not less than 14 feet in depth of solid earth now covers all that surface of ground once encumbered by the piles of lumber, steam mill and humble abode of the mysterious doctor. In less than a year after his death, every tangible object that could remind us of him vanished.

All this happened about 35 years ago, yet more than one person can say there is now impressed upon their memories the records of many moments less pleasantly and profitably spent than have been passed by them in the presence of Dr. John Wilson.

The 11 closing years of his life in this place has left with us an unsolved problem more interesting from the dim, misty light of uncertainty in which it is enveloped. From this cause Brattleboro is richer in her past, and with the mind's eye we see a picture in her silent halls, left there by this event, we could not if we would remove.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

SAMUEL WELLS.

Col. Sam'l Wells, the first representative from this town, then in Cumberland county, was born at Deerfield, Mass., Sept. 9, 1730. He married Hannah Sheldon and in July 1762, settled in Brattleboro, on lands now owned by the Vermont Asylum, situated about a mile north of the East village.

We have found where his log cabin stood 100 years ago, but the spot is now a wild, with no road or indications that there ever was a road leading to the place. At the time he came to Brattleboro, many of the pioneers considered it a great success to secure a roof, however humble, and food to sustain life.

Here was born his family of thirteen children, two of whom died in infancy. His daughters were married to Samuel Gale, Ephraim Nash, Micah Townshend, Jonathan Gorton, Nathaniel Church and Ephraim Stimpson.

Like most of the prominent men of the time, in this part of the State, Col. Wells sustained the claims of New York.

Between the years 1798 and 1802, all the family of Col. Wells removed to Canada, where each of his children received from the crown 1200 acres of land as a compensation for the losses Col. Wells had suffered during the Revolution on account of his adherence to the King. He died in this town and a marble head-stone in the old burying-ground gives the following information:

In Memory of

of this town, a Judge of Cumberland County Court, and a Member of the Assembly of the Province of New York, who departed this life

Aug. 6, 1786, in his 55th year.

His friends, the stranger and the poor have lost
A kind companion and a generous host:

When he fell, the Statesman fell

HENRY WELLS, M. D.,

Was the first town clerk of Brattleboro elected to office in 1768. He was born in Essex Co., N. J., June 14, 1742, but from 1746, for about 20 years, his home was in New York, when the population of that city was less than 10 thousand. When 11 years old he began his college course at "Nassau Hall" in Princeton. Here he took his first degree at the age of 15. Immediately after his graduation he began the study of medicine at New Haven, with the celebrated Dr. Hull, under whose instruction he remained four years. In 1760, Yale College conferred on him the degree of A. M., and in the following year he returned to New York, where he continued his studies until 1764. He studied divinity for a short time after this and added the business of an apothecary to his early medical practice in New York. He was married in the old Dutch church on Nassau street, to Hannah Stout, May 28, 1764. They lived together within a few months of half a century.

Dr. Wells was hardly more than 25 and his wife 20 and the mother of two young children, when they started for their new home in the wilds of what is now Vermont. The town of Brattleboro, of which he and his wife were 2 of the patentees, had been partly settled from New Hampshire as early as 1752. They came by a small sloop to Hartford, Ct., and from thence followed the Connecticut river to Brattleboro. Their new home was a farm of not far from 1000 acres, some 2 miles west of the present beautiful East village of Brattleboro. Here on the brow of a lofty hill Dr. Wells erected a substantial frame house of considerable size, which stood almost unaltered for a century, and was finally taken down (by Gilbert Smith,) in 1875. In 1801 it was purchased from Micah Townshend (its second owner,) by Chief Justice Tyler, who occupied it about 14 or 15 years. From 1768 to the time of his removal in 1781, he constantly held some public office. His name, for the last time, appears upon the records as moderator of the meeting of March, 1781. His name is attached to two memorials to the King in behalf of the legal government, the only civil government, in fact, under the Province of New York. Seven more children were born to Dr. Wells during his 13 years residence in Brattleboro. In 1781 he relinquished the magnificent estate, (in acres,) which cost him so much toil and suffering, and removed to Montague, Mass. He settled in the house which for 80 years continued to be the home of his children. This house is still standing though not in possession of the family. In the associations of his new home and the better opportunities for the practice of his profession, Dr. Wells no doubt found compensation for the visionary fortune, as landed proprietor, for which he and his father had left New York. He soon acquired a reputation as a physician, especially in consultations, which made long journeys from home often necessary. Such occasional calls for him extended from Boston to Albany, New Hampshire and Connecticut, as well as to and beyond his old home in Vermont.

In 1785 he was elected a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society with which he was connected most of the time as counsellor until his death. In 1802 a formidable epidemic made its appearance in Greenfield and its vicinity. "Eminent physicians," says Willard in his history, "did what they could to stop the plague. That excellent physician and estimable man, Dr. John Stone of Greenfield, the late Dr. Williams of Deerfield, and that Nobleman of Nature, Dr. Henry Wells of Montague, were employed, the last and the first named, mostly.

The sick seemed to have the impression, generally, that they certainly should recover if Dr. Wells attended upon them, so great was their reverence for that philanthropist." As a recognition of his services in this pestilence, Dartmouth College conferred on him the honorary degree of M. D. Professor Nathan Smith was accustomed to quote him in his lectures and to speak of him in terms of the highest respect.

"Dr. Wells," adds Dr. Alden, "in his profession attained the most distinguished rank. His natural powers were good, his medical reading extensive and judicious, his application methodical and patient.

His eminent skill, however, in the management of disease was derived chiefly from his own observation and experience. Possessing a clear and discriminating mind and an accurate judgment, his practical deductions were remarkably just. In difficult cases his advice was much sought and highly appreciated. Courteous in his manners, modest and unassuming in his intercourse with his professional brethren, he was highly respected by the profession and the public."

Dr. Williams remarks "Dr. Wells had the confidence of all his professional brethren throughout the country, and many of his patients almost worshiped him."

Very little need be added in regard to Dr. Wells' character and principles. His whole life, family, social and professional, was permeated with a deep sense of religious duty. He died Aug. 24, 1814, aged 72, and was buried in Montague. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people and a great number of physicians from the neighboring towns paid him the last token of respect.

DR. SAMUEL STEARNS, LL. D.,

Was born in Bolton, Mass., in 1747, and died in Brattleboro, Aug. 8, 1810. This gentleman, previous to becoming a resident of this town, suffered greatly in mind, body and estate, from the persistent attacks of "The Sons of Liberty," in Worcester, Mass. For his supposed loyalty to King George III, he was confined in a filthy prison nearly 3 years, in Worcester, Mass. In that prison he suffered for the want of the common necessities of life. A large share of this imprisonment was after the close of the Revolutionary war with Great Britain. By the conditions of the Jay treaty, he was legally entitled to his freedom; but his enemies by legal technicalities, various pretexts and false swearing, continued his confinement and declared he should rot in jail.

Though he was a man of fine presence and great personal beauty, as we learn from a well preserved painting of him, and of rare mental cultivation for the times in which he lived, misfortune was so constantly his attendant he had but little from this world, for which to be thankful.

"Life had no more to bring to him Than mockery of the past alone."

From his monument at the East village cemetery, we copy the following words:

"Nature was his preceptor, philosophy
His mistress, and astronomy his prompter,
Disappointment ever succeeded his best
Endeavors; he deserved better—
Ingratitude was the reward of His labors,

Peace to his ashes."

Dr. Samuel Stearns, while in the practice of medicine in New York, calculated and published the first "Nautical Almanac" published in America. He was the author of "The American Herbal, or Materia Medica," published in 1801. The work was printed at Walpole, N. H., for Thomas & Thomas and the author.

Upon the list of subscribers are 47 names, comprising the most prominent citizens of that time in Brattleboro. He obtained many subscribers for a "Medical Dispensatory," upon which he labored 28 years. To obtain information for this work, of two volumes containing 600 pages each, he traveled 9 years in Europe and in this country, at an expense of several thousand dollars. He died before completing the enterprise. Upon the list of subscribers for this work we find the names of Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, Gen. George Washington, and other names of the most noted men of the age in this country.

MAJ. STEPHEN GREENLEAF

Who held the office of town clerk from 1799 to 1844 was by trade a carpenter. We who have only seen him late in the afternoon of life, a tottering, feeble old man, find it hard to realize how athletic and fearless he was in the prime of life. We have been told by an eye witness of the feat, Mr. Greenleaf, after raising a large building, stood upon his head on the ridgepole of the building.

Whatever he attempted was well performed and as a workman and a citizen no fairer name is on the list of Brattleboro mechanics. His penmanship in the old town books, for its uniformity and perfection, is the admiration of everyone who has examined it. Each letter and word is made in full, giving so perfect exactness no one can mistake it.

The example he has left us is a monumental rebuke—45 years in building—to men of learning, to legal gentlemen who use their pens, as Talleryand said some men did their tongues, "to conceal rather than to express their meaning." In 1834 he wrote several long, highly interesting letters to his friends, that were published in the Phoenix, not long since, respecting the past and present of Brattleboro, and he also furnished that brief though able sketch of this town in "Thompson's Historical Gazetteer of Vermont," published in 1846.

Mr. Greenleaf enjoyed the study of mathematics and often assisted others in that department of knowledge.

Only 13 years of age when he came here with his father in 1771, with no educational advantages and few books worth mentioning, what superior native resources must have been concealed under that modest, unassuming exterior, so faithfully shown in a painting of him, which, to the honor of Brattleboro, now hangs in the town hall.

From Mrs. Ellis, now (1869) 80 years of age, and the only child of Maj. Greenleaf now living, we learn that her father educated himself, long winter evenings, by light from the kitchen fire-place. To get full advantage of the light, he extended himself horizontally upon the floor where he worked upon mathematical problems, practised penmanship, read the few books he could obtain, and thus laid the foundation of such a character for ability and virtue as won the well-deserved respect, love and confidence of three generations, then calmly and peacefully died in 1850, aged 92 years.

From our earliest recollections, we have heard much said in commendation of Maj Greenleaf, but feel incompetent to do justice to his memory, or find language to express our admiration of his long, faithful, beautiful life. One who knew him well, has said of him: "Surely, one such man in Sodom would have been sufficient to have saved that wicked city."

Among our ancient worthies of the buried past, there were those of his contemporaries who surpassed him in mental attainments, brilliancy of the imagination, business faculties or abilities to grasp the prizes in this intense never-ceasing life struggle going on about us, but as the Creator's masterpiece, "an honest man," no one was his superior.

HAYES FAMILY.

BY W. H. BIGELOW, OF CHICAGO.

In February, 1778, there came to Brattleboro. from New Haven, Ct., a young man, just of age, a blacksmith by trade. The few settlers, wishing such a workman to locate among them, made a bee, shoveled away the deep snow, helped to build a shop, and in less than a month he was at work with his tools. Great results flowed from this hasty settlement of the young man—Rutherford Hayes.

We trace his ancestors back to George Hayes, who came from Scotland and was living in Windsor, Ct., in 1682, and subsequently in Granby, Ct. His grandfather, Daniel Hayes, was, in 1702, taken captive by the Indians, carried to Canada, and was kept a prisoner about 5 years. His mother was Rebecca Russel, great granddaughter of Rev. John Russell, who lived in Hadley, Mass., where he concealed the Regicides for many years.

Rutherford Hayes was born in Brandford, Ct., July 29, 1756, removed to New Haven with his father, Ezekiel Hayes, in 1778. In his new home, now the West village, he for many years worked at his trade, which he called a "dirty, black business, but it brought white money."

For some time he kept a tavern, joining farming with it, and during his passing old age he was a farmer in easy circumstances. As to his characteristics, he is described as a "round, corpulent, old gentleman, with an elastic, square step, medium height, with florid complexion, sandy hair, a cheerful temper, and friendly, courteous manners." Capt. Dudley, now living, in his 82d year, an intelligent old gentleman of many interesting memories, recalls his hale, hearty laugh, accompanied usually with a noted rubbing of his hands, in the enjoyment of jokes and stories. Of him, one who remembers him well, says: "He was an honest, kindly, religious man, and may well be regarded by his descendants as a model." After he was seventy he became a total abstinence man, "fearing," he said, "that his example would be quoted against the cause of temperance." He died Sept. 25, 1836.

His wife, Chloe Smith, born Nov. 10, 1762, in Hadley, Mass., moved with her parents to Brattleboro when young, and was married (1789) in her seventeenth year. She matured into a noble, Christian lady. She was noted as a wonderful worker, and of great force of will. On a certain occasion she waited upon guests at a country ball, in their tavern. All night, and started in the morning on horseback for a visit to Bainbridge, N. Y. She made the journey with her husband, 200 miles or more, and back in health and strength. She is remembered by her descendants with affectionate admiration. She died Feb. 17, 1847. They had three sons and six daughters, whom they lived to see in positions of honor and usefulness.

DEA. RUSSELL HAYES,

The oldest of the sons, born May 31, 1784, passed a life of valuable usefulness on the old homestead in West Brattleboro, devoting his energies and his love to the academy and the church, and smoothing tenderly the declining years of his aged parents. He was a Christian of equable temper, a man of excellent judgment, and a neighbor highly esteemed. He died July 28, 1856.

RUTHERFORD HAYES, JR.,

Born Jan. 4, 1787, early entered the mercantile business and accumulated, for those times, a competent fortune. He was a man of honor and commanded universal respect. He was a Presbyterian. In 1817, he removed with his family to Delaware, O., a journey of 40 days, but only lived about 5 years, dying in 1822. After his death was born his son,

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES,

Who, now in middle life, bears well-earned military and political honors. He graduated with the class of 1842, from Kenyon College, Ohio, studied law and practiced it successfully in Cincinnati, O., up to the opening of the War of the Rebellion. when, in 1861, he entered the army; was promoted repeatedly, and in 1864, was promoted from colonel to brigadier-general for "gallantry in the battles of Winchester, Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek," and at the close of the war to that of brevet major general. He was elected to Congress in 1864, from Cincinnati, and re-elected in 1866; was elected governor of Ohio in 1867, and re-elected in 1869. He declined to receive a nomination for a third term, and retired to private life, returning to the practice of law. He received the degree of LL. D., in 1868, from Kenyon College.

WILLIAM R. HAYES,

The third son of Rutherford Hayes, Sen., was born Dec. 6, 1804, prepared for college under the instruction of Rev. Mr. Hallock, and graduated at Yale in the year 1825. He took a high stand in his class. Closing the three years of his legal preparatory studies at the law school in New Haven, under the care of Judge Dagget, he was admitted to the bar, and opened an office in East Brattleboro, Vt., in 1828; was married to Miss Trowbridge, of New Haven, in October, 1830. He is said to have had a fine voice, and to have been a successful pleader. In his will he left $1,000 for the academy at West Brattleboro.

He, with two other professional men, his daily associates, Mr. Elliot, of his own profession, and Dr. Dickerman, were among the subjects of the revival of 1832. He became thereafter an earnest, active

Christian, and was restrained from preparing himself for the gospel ministry by failing health. Skillful physicians advised him to seek a milder climate. In 1836, he relinquished the practice of law, and moved to Barbadoes in the West Indies. His health was gradually restored, and he then spent the rest of his life engaged in prosperous mercantile pursuits, and in discharging the duties of U. S. Consul for the Island of Barbadoes. He engaged himself heartily in the support of temperance and in the abolition of slavery. He organized societies in his new home, and wrote and labored successfully for the promotion of these reforms.

Quoting from Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, "He was known and honored there and at home as a business man of eminent skill, courtesy and probity, and a Christian gentleman, ready for every good word and work."

His life was suddenly terminated by a malignant erysipelas July 13, 1852.

Of the daughters of Rutherford Hayes, Sen., the oldest one, Polly, married Mr. John Noyes, who became a man of note. He graduated at Yale College in the class of 1779, taught in Chesterfield Academy, N. H., preached the gospel, became a merchant, and represented the southern district of Vermont in Congress. They were the grand-parents of Larkin G. Mead, the sculptor.

Belinda married the Hon. Samuel Elliot, of Brattleboro. Clarissa married Ayer Moody, a graduate of Dartmouth College, a man of influence. She is one of the only two members of the family now living, being in her 80th year, ripening into a gentle and beautiful old age in Delaware, Ohio.

Sarah, now (1870,) living in Chesterfield, Mass., married Dyer Bancroft, a graduate of Williams College. He practiced law many years in Chesterfield, Mass.

HON. LEMUEL WHITNEY,

One of the leading men of his time, in this town, was by trade a silversmith. He was born in Petersham, Mass., in 1764, and came to Vermont in 1785. The first years of his residence in this State were passed at Newfane, where he held the office of sheriff.

It was the duty of that officer to execute the law which made it discretionary with the Judge of the County Court how many lashes should be applied to the naked skin of the convicted transgressor of Vermont laws. Another barbarous act required of the sheriff, was to brand some culprits with a hot iron, sometimes the letter R upon the hand or forehead, to signify rogue. Once during his term of office, as he informed us, he was ordered by the court to whip a woman, at the public whipping-post, for passing counterfeit money. The shoulders and upper part of her person was completely stripped of clothing, that the naked skin might be exposed to the lash. Under this severe trial of his gallantry the lashes, especially two out of three, fell so lightly, she could be hardly conscious of receiving any, but the third lash, that being a gentle reminder that women were, by law, entitled to "their thirds."

He removed from Newfane Hill to Brattleboro East village in 1790, occupying, at first, a low, unfinished house, which stood where now (1869) stands the Revere House on Main street. The next year he bought about an acre of land in the north part of Main street, and built a small house containing but two rooms, where now stands the elegant mansion of Chas. F. Thompson, Esq. Alterations and additions upon his house were made at times, until his place was at one time considered the most desirable one in this village. Here he lived nearly 60 years, and died April 4, 1847.

He was town representative 10 years; from 1801 to '24, clerk of the supreme court; 1801 to '20, clerk of the county; 1817 to '28, judge of probate; 1790 to 1847, justice of the peace.

From personal observation, during the last 18 years of his life, we noticed as a utilitarian or economist he was a worthy disciple of Benjamin Franklin; retentive in memory, frank, free and fearless in the expression of his sentiments, of promptness and fidelity to his engagements, patriotic, but decidedly opposed to wasting powder in firing guns on the Fourth of July. In theology a Unitarian; in politics, a whig to the back-bone, and a warm admirer of Henry Clay.

He was, as compared with most men, of gigantic stature, and his dignified presence, with a good understanding of parliamentary rules, well qualified him to preside at public meetings.

It is with pleasure we recall that sunny day of his long life among us, in the summer of 1840, when the oak grove in the rear of Col. Joseph Goodhue's residence was honored by the presence of Daniel Webster, who there gave a short address to the people of this place. The long cavalcade of citizens for escort duty, the expression upon each face, the elastic step of youth and age, with other indications, told us Brattleboro was proud that day.

Hope for a season bade the whigs farewell, for, since the election of John Q. Adams, in 1824, they had, up to this time, been unsuccessful in every presidential contest.

The great political revival of this year was of such a character as heralded success. The political prospect not only gave great pleasure to our venerable friend, but also to a large majority of the people in this town. All seemed to appreciate the privilege of seeing this oracle of the party, whose fame had gone around the globe,—that great Daniel, who, on the floor of Congress, had shut the lion's mouth as it was about to close upon the blood-bought constitution of 1787.

Of all the men that we saw standing there to greet the nation's orator, none did so impress us as the venerable judge with silvered hair. The companions of his early life, with two generations, he had seen pass on to the silent land, leaving him to experience

"The worst of woes that wait on age,
To view each loved one blotted from life's page."

But youth or early manhood could show no greater interest in the events of the day.

When Mr. Webster was seated upon the platform erected in the grove, Judge Whitney instantly threw off his hat, and renewed vigor came to that time-worn frame and face, as, with clear, untrembling voice, he loudly exclaimed: "Ladies and Gentlemen: The Defender of the Constitution."

It was enough. Surely nothing could be said more fitting the occasion. As died away the cheers of the multitude, the sound of cannon and strains of music, we felt, though all these demonstrations might be proper from our citizens in deference to this distinguished visitor, Judge Whitney, in the use of those last five words, had paid Mr. Webster the highest compliment of them all.

was born in the town of West Brattleboro, April 9, 1793. He was son of one and grandson of another, who, in the war of the Revolution, had done the State service. His boyhood and youth were spent upon a small farm, which his father had settled at the close of the war, and where he learned those lessons of self denial and acquired that stern integrity which served in after life to render him eminently useful. His active mind could not long brook the monotony of a farmer's life; at an early age he entered Middlebury college, supporting himself during his college course by teaching in the winter. He graduated in the class of — and soon after receiving his degree his health failing, he emigrated to Georgia.

A stranger in a distant state, the singular purity of his life and his earnest devotion to his chosen profession, soon gained for him the esteem and affection of those among whom he had cast his lot.

The classical school which, as early as 1818, he established in Putnam, soon became famous, and pupils were attached to it from all the adjoining counties of the State. His fame as a teacher was established on a firm basis before he had reached mature manhood. In a country which at the time was the outpost of civilization, unaided and alone, he built up and maintained a school of which older states might have been proud; began that labor in the cause of education, which ended only with his long life.

Married at an early age to a fair pupil—both sexes were under his tuition—he identified himself at once with the people of his adopted State.

Sincerely pious from his boyhood, he allied himself with the Presbyterian church, and soon after his arrival in Georgia was ordained a minister of that denomination. Deriving from his profession an income sufficient for his modest wants, he devoted himself to the ministry without salary, supplying the pulpit of those poor churches whose members were unable to provide themselves with a pastor. His labors as a preacher were not less earnest than as a teacher, and his success was best attested by the devotion shown him by his humble congregation.

He did not, however, remain long in a subordinate position. His talents and zeal and the skill and prudence he manifested in teaching and in the control and management of youth, soon made him widely known, and in the year 1819, he was elected professor of mathematics and astronomy in Franklin college, an institution which had been endowed by the State of Georgia as early as 1789. This necessitated a change of residence—the last he ever made. For more than forty years he lived in the town of Athens, among the foothills of the Alleghanies, and there beside the Oconee sleeps his last sleep.

For ten years the young professor filled his post so acceptably that at the expiration of that time, upon the resignation of Dr. Waddell, the president of the college, he was unanimously chosen his successor, which position he filled for thirty years, and finally, when broken by the long labor of life, he resigned to other hands his post of honor and of toil.

The regret and affection of all went with the faithful teacher to the modest home which he had prepared for his old age, near the town which had so long known him as its ablest, purest and most influential citizen, and his best eulogy is to be found in the devotion which even now his former pupils show for the memory of their teacher.

Among those who received at his hands instruction are many of Georgia's most distinguished sons. Two of his pupils are now United States Senators. A. H. Stevens was among his scholars, and during his collegiate career was an inmate of his family. Numbers of Georgia's best and oldest men have acknowledged their indebtedness to the wise and good man who directed their education. He was the friend and associate of Crawford and Bowen, of Calhoun and Preston and Mc Duffie, and, although his pursuits were different, he was a peer among them.

The fitness of the man for an instructor of the young was acknowledged by all who knew him. While courteous and kind to such a degree as justly to entitle him to the appellation given him, "the Chesterfield of Georgia," upon occasion he could be firm and decided.

His sense of justice was so strong that he was never accused of partial or prejudiced action.

In his intercourse with others he was ever kind, while his charity covered the follies of youth with its mantle; and, best of all, he was imbued with the spirit of a pure, earnest and consistent Christian. With an intuitive knowledge of his peculiar fitness for the work, he adopted teaching as his profession, and for more than forty years he devoted his life and energies to that pursuit.

He loved with the attachments and strength of his manhood the home and state of his adoption, but never ceased to remember the land of his nativity. In the sunny clime which he chose for his life-long home, his heart turned often to the green hills among which his boyhood was spent, and the friends of his youth were never forgotten.

His Alma Mater conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and, though there may on its alumni be names more widely known to fame, there is not one whose life has reflected more honor upon her teaching.

To him Georgia owes a debt of gratitude. To him more than to any other is due the intellectual developement of her citizens and the silent influence of his teaching.

Dr. Church died May 18, 1862, aged 69.

Vermont may proudly claim him as one of her purest and noblest sons.

[Furnished by a Descendant, Wm. Henry Wells, of N. Y.]

THE REV. WILLIAM WELLS, D. D.

The Rev. Wm. Wells, D. D., first minister of the church of the East Village of Brattleboro, was born at Biggleswade in Bedfordshire, England, in 1744. He was the only son of Richard Wells, who was also the only son of Richard Wells. His father and mother both dying in his childhood, he was brought up by his uncle, Ebenezer Casterson, as his own son.

His thoughts were early turned to the ministry, for which he was prepared in the Dissenting college at Daventry, and he was encouraged and assisted in his purpose by John Howard, the celebrated philanthropist, an intimate acquaintance of his uncle Ebenezer, after whom he named one of his sons, long a resident of this town. Another son was named after Howard.

In the year 1770, he was invited to preach at Bromsgrove, where he was afterward settled as a minister of a Dissenting congregation, a ministry in which he continued to officiate during his residence in England.

In January, 1771, he married Jane Hancox, daughter of the Rev. James Hancox of the neighboring town of Dudley, who possessed what was considered at that time a handsome fortune. Mr. Hancox had been destined to be a clergyman of the Established church, and to hold the living of Kildermminster, which was in the gift of his grandfather. Even as a boy, however, he had formed opinions in favor of non-conformity, and finally declined to accept the living (of £800 a year), although his grandfather declared his intention of disinheriting him in such a case, of his claims as eldest son, a threat which he carried out for a time, but relented in his last illness. Mr. Hancox was admired for his power of pathos in the pulpit, but was in the habit of saying he should do injustice to his people if, while he attempted to move their passions, he neglected to inform their minds. He appears to have been, as one might expect, a champion of freedom, whom anything like the appearance of oppression roused to a noble wrath.

A letter is extant from a friend of the lady, a clergyman, from which we take an example of letter writing a century ago:

"I acknowledge I was not quite ignorant of Mr. Wells's attachment before I received your favor, and I am confident it is as strong as it is reasonable. I do not wonder that a man of his taste should soon be convinced that the half had not been told him. Kindred minds soon attract each other, and we who know both have often thought and said that if any two minds were cast in the same mold they were yours and his. And really, my dear Miss Jane, as to Mr. Wells, mere justice obliges me to say that I never knew a man better formed by nature and grace for being happy and making others so who are most nearly connected with him. His natural temper is excellent, sedate and even, always easy and cheerful, inclined to think well of and be pleased with everybody and everything that is tolerable, obliging, tender and affectionate, yet active, manly and prudent, remarkably free from caprice and affectation and every turbulent passion.

And to these human attributes, valuable as they are, divine grace has added, what you still more highly prize, a rational and warm piety. This, you will think, is saying a great deal; but really, Miss Jane, I cannot in conscience say less. This is the light in which his character appears to me. This is the character his tutor and his most intimate friends universally give him."

In the summer or fall of 1782, as we learn from a memoir written by his son Hancox, a companion of his voyage, Mr. Wells determined to remove with his family to the United States; before leaving England, he made up his mind that he would not take his family to a slave state, and would not establish himself in the wilderness. For many years he had taken a warm interest in the country, and during the Revolutionary war he was decidedly on the side of the colonies. The state of the political world in 1792 was gloomy. The French Revolution caused fear and great excitement in England. The Birmingham riots took place in the summer of 1791. Several dissenting meeting-houses and a number of houses belonging to opulent dissenters were destroyed and openly plundered by a brutal mob, and all this was done with the almost open approval of the High Church party. The watch-word of the mob was "Church and King," and the dissenters felt that they were frowned on by the government, and not protected as they ought to have been by the civil authorities, against a mob who were too ready to suppose that their excesses were, to a certain extent, at least, agreeable to their superiors.

Birmingham was only thirteen miles from my father's house at Bowenheath, his meeting-house was at Bromsgrove, two miles off. The destruction of the meeting-house was openly threatened. He feared at one time that his house was in danger, and he removed some of his most valuable goods. All sorts of absurd reports were circulated respecting the dissenters. Men of the most blameless and benevolent characters were suspected of forming secretly the most wicked and despicable conspiracies. These were some of the circumstances that determined my father to quit his native country and remove to the United States.

In addition to what is said above of Dr. Wells's attitude during the Revolutionary war and his life as an English dissenting minister, we quote from a sketch of his life written by his son, William Wells, Esq., for Dr. Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, Vol. viii, p. 257.

"At the commencement of the movements which preceded the American Revolution, he took a strong interest in favor of the colonies. He exerted himself, with Dr. Price, Dr. Wren of Portsmouth, &c., in collecting subscriptions for the relief of the American prisoners. When Mr. Laurens, upon his liberation from the Tower, passed through Bromsgrove, on his way to Bristol, he inquired for Mr. Wells, stating that he wished to return his own and his country's thanks to him for this service.

My father's health had been affected by his residence in the town, and he removed to a hamlet distant about two miles, where he cultivated a small farm. This was an occupation which he well understood, and in which he much delighted. He had in his house several boys from respectable dissenting families, some of whom became attached friends.

Notwithstanding these laborious avocations, no one thought his people or study neglected. He commonly rose at 4 o'clock, and in the tardy mornings of an English winter his candle might be seen three hours before daylight. At the academy and in early life, he was a hard student, and, though he never claimed the reputation of a learned man, he had read much and carefully. I cannot be mistaken when I state that at that time the education of dissenting ministers, under Dr. Doddridge and others, his contemporaries and successors, was far superior to that commonly acquired at the universities.

My father was always a student. He had in England a very good library, and to the latest period of his life his study was his resort when leisure allowed.

His memory was tenacious. He was well acquainted with ecclesiastical history, that of the Reformation, and especially of the Puritans and Dissenters. He had in his library many of the best writers belonging to the established church. Burnet, Tillotson and Clarke were his favorites. No man was less of a bigot, but the idea of submission to articles of faith he never could endure."

During the ravages of the small-pox, contrary to the prevailing popular prejudice, he inoculated his children. The operation succeeding, he was beset with requests to inoculate others, which he complied with as respects some of his poor neighbors, who could not afford to pay doctors' bills. He carried through the disease 1300 persons, a work which occupied much of his time during two years. An eminent physician at Worcester, with whom he was intimate, used to call him in jest "Brother Doctor."

At the time of the Birmingham riots, and the destruction of Dr. Priestley's church and residence, Mr. Wells's house and church were also threatened, and this persecution decided him to emigrate to America.

In January, 1793, he wrote to his son:

"We design to land at or near Boston, and where we shall pitch our tent it is hard to say. * * * I have, as may be supposed, a good opinion of America, but yet my expectations are not raised unreasonably high. I know, like every other land in this world, it must be subject to affliction, disappointment, pain and death. But let it be remembered, also, that there is the same kind Providence to attend us there as here, and as to government, liberty and the prospect of getting a comfortable livelihood. I think the advantage lies on the other side of the Atlantic."

Dr. Wells set sail from Bristol May 8, 1793,—the ship in which he sailed being towed down the Avon by several boats to get it through at high water,—and after a passage of 32 days cast anchor in Boston harbor.

Eight children came over with their parents, William and Jane Wells, among whom may be mentioned William, his eldest son, who spent two years at Harvard college, where he was afterward tutor, and subsequently the head of the publishing house of Wells & Lilly, in Boston,—among the publications of which house may be mentioned Griesbach's New Testament in Greek, at the time an extraordinary enterprise for America, and which was revised and carried through the press by Mr. Wells's own supervision; James Hancox, long a successful merchant in Hartford; and Ebenezer Casterson, who married Mary Chester of Wethersfield, continued to reside in Brattleboro from his coming over with the family in 1793, at the age of sixteen, until his death in 1850. He was universally esteemed as a man of modest, straight-forward and generous character, and was twice the representative of the town in the State Legislature.

It is remarkable that these eight children were all living in 1834, 41 years after the voyage (the first death was that of his youngest son, John Howard, in 1844, aged 60), and met to welcome their oldest sister, Mrs. Martha Freme, when, after marriage and widowhood in England, she returned, shortly after the death of her father, to settle in Brattleboro. The remarkable character of this lady, the generous hospitality which her means enabled her to exercise, and her tragic end, when the mansion house in which she lived, and which had been her father's before her, was destroyed by fire in May, 1849, are still well remembered in the town.

Dr. Wells had for a long time taken great interest in the history of New England, and had corresponded on that subject with the Rev. Dr. Morse of Charlestown, historian and geographer, and father of the inventor of the telegraph. After visiting Dr. Morse for a few days, he went to a house which the former had taken for him in Medford. With his eldest son, William, he made a carriage tour through Connecticut to the Hudson and Mohawk valleys, to inspect his adopted country, and went as far as the Whitestown country, now called Clinton, where he made a stay with Rev. Samuel Kirkland, missionary to the Indians, and father of John Thornton Kirkland, afterward President of Harvard college.

The next year he purchased a farm of 400 acres in Brattleboro, to which he removed his family by sleighing. He wished to settle where he could occupy a farm and be useful in preaching. In Brattleboro he found both.

For some time the family felt severely the difficulties and discouragements of their situation. He was invited to become the pastor of the society, but declined, feeling that he would be more independent as a preacher than if he were formally settled. He, however, acted as minister, and accepted the remuneration voted him by the town, by which he was annually chosen for about 20 years.

At that time the character of the population was extremely mixed, and the tone of manners rough (notwithstanding the presence of some educated and elegant families), and the moral and religious character of the people as a whole much below that which he had left in England.

When he first preached, the young men of the village were accustomed to pass the hour of service in amusing themselves under the trees, while the young women would wander from pew to pew during the exercises. Dr. Wells made no comment whatever on these liberties, but went on in his duties with the courtesy that was characteristic of him. In three years time the congregation had become remarkable for order and attention. The misrepresentation and prejudice which he encountered he overcame by quiet wisdom and by the influence of a pure life. His salary, which was never regularly paid, was £80 (about $260) of continental currency.

After this time, he sent in his resignation, and the East village people, who had always been his best parishioners, built for him the first meeting-house in that village, where he preached for some years. He went to England on a visit in 1818, and while abroad received very unexpectedly the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Harvard university.

Dr. Wells, although the least controversial of men, was affected by the Unitarian controversy, which began with an article in the "Panoplist" in 1815,—a popular periodical of the Calvinistic sect,—which article was answered by Dr. Channing.

Suspensions of his theological soundness were entertained by the neighboring clergy. He thought proper to deliver an address to his people, on the Sabbath of the first communion, in the new meeting-house at the East village, in which he declared his sentiments and opinions in regard to doctrines. His address was highly satisfactory to his people.

During his absence in England, however, in consequence of intrigues arising from these doctrinal disputes, Dr. Wells having left his parish free to choose another minister, a young man was settled in his stead by the agency of some managing persons. Dr. Wells, by the exercise of great prudence and Christian charity, checked those who were disposed to be indignant on his account, and filled the pulpit without remuneration during the illness of his successor, continuing to the end of his life in peace and friendship with his people. His own religious opinions were what are called Arian, but he considered all doctrinal differences of trifling consequence in comparison with purity of life.

An admirable anecdote is told of this indifference to theological speculations in "Sprague's Annals":

"In those days, when every minister's house was regarded as an inn or refectory by every other minister, whether known or unknown, who wanted rest or refreshment, a young man called upon him and, soon after the introduction, a dialogue ensued much like the following:

Stranger—"Are there any heresies among you?"

Dr. W.—"I know not whether I understand the drift of your question."

Stranger—"I wish to inquire, Sir, whether there be any Armenians, Socinians, or Universalists among you?"

Dr. W.—"Oh, Sir, there are worse heretics than any of these."

Stranger—"My dear Sir, what can be worse?"

Dr. W.—"Why, there are some who get drunk, and some who quarrel with their families, or their neighbors, and some who will not pay their debts when they might do it, and some who are very profane. Such men I think far worse heretics than those for whom you inquire."

Dr. Wells is described by all who have seen him as of a very noble person, uniting dignity and sweetness in a remarkable degree. He was 6 feet in height, well made and very erect. He is the subject of one of Stewart's finest portraits,—presenting a countenance of such benevolent radiance as not to be easily forgotten. He commonly wore a black velvet cap over his flowing white locks, which gave him a priestly and patriarchal appearance.

While he was visiting England, it was currently reported among the populace, anxious in respect to Catholic aggressions, that the Pope of Rome was making a journey through Great Britain. Children who saw him for the first time, even babies, would manifest a desire to sit on his knee, and the elder ones would sit to look at and listen to him. This regard of children he valued highly.

Even at the age of 80 years he would read for two hours in the evening, holding his lamp. His temper, though ardent by nature, was chastened by gravity and seriousness; and he is described as abounding in the thoughts which might serve to mitigate trouble, and as having an especial faculty in prayer. He died in peace of mind, Dec. 9, 1827.

"Although his mind was stored with those rich treasures of theological information which are the products of a long and studious life, he had none of the pride or pomp of education: and, although he was blessed with ample powers of argument, he did not feel it his duty to expatiate in the thorny tracts of controversy, believing that he could better serve the great cause of truth and piety by preaching Christ and Him crucified, by plain and practical illustrations of the pure morality and perfect purity of the Christian system. Sustaining through life the reputation of liberal principles and comprehensive views, he was not understood to adopt, in all their amplitude, the peculiar doctrines of any of the contending sects that occupy the extreme points of the vast field of religious contemplation. While his capacious mind embraced in its benevolent wishes, and in its fervent aspirations, the whole family of man, he acknowledged no human master of the human mind, and still less did he presume to mark out the limits of either the power, the justice, or the mercy of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The daily beauty and moral elevation of his character were of course more peculiarly obvious to his family, his intimate friends, and the circle of his neighborhood. But he had a name and a praise in many of the congregations on both sides of the Atlantic. To the church he was a shining light, and to the world a bright example. It is known that many able and candid men of different denominations regarded him as combining, with a degree very unusual in this late age of the world, the primitive simplicity of the patriarchal, with the paternal simplicity of the apostolic character."

DEDICATION.

TO JOSEPH STEEN, ESQ.,

THE ELDEST NATIVE CITIZEN (1878) OF THE MOST IMPORTANT AND POPULOUS LOCALITY IN THE TOWN OF BRATTLEBORO—THE EAST VILLAGE—WHERE, 154 YEARS AGO, WAS MADE THE FIRST FOOT-PRINT OF ANGLO SAXON CIVILIZATION IN THE STATE OF VERMONT.

Not only are we grateful for his long, useful life in this village—reaching beyond the beginning of its business enterprise, and nearly covering the whole period of its growth to the present time—but for the aid of his retentive memory, whereby we have been able to revive, restore and preserve some rapidly vanishing pictures of the past, for the present generation and the future historian though a native of Brattleboro, is of English parentage. His great-great-grandfather emigrated from Holland to the North of England, where he settled about the year 1700.

James Steen, father of Joseph, was born in Malpas, Cheshire county, six miles from the city of Chester, Eng., May 19, 1761. He was a landholder, and by trade a house-builder. In Dec., 1785, he married Elizabeth Wood, who was a native of the city of Chester, and came to this country in 1795, for the following reasons: In 1793, political troubles caused the taxes to be so much upon real estate, rents were not enough to pay them: the "press gang" also went about the country, enlisting men peacefully if they could, but otherwise forcibly, for the army and navy.

James Steen sold his property, receiving therefor but little more than enough to pay the expenses of his removal to this country. On recommendation from a Mr. Nelson, of London, to Kirk Booth, Esq., of Boston,—whom he luckily found aboard of the ship Galen on the passage—he obtained from Mr. Booth—who was ever after his friend—a letter of introduction to Rev. Wm. Wells, D. D., then but a short time settled in Brattleboro, Vt., as their only pastor.

James Steen settled in this village in 1795, living at first in the old Dickerman house, where now is the house erected by Chas. Crosby, and now (1878) belonging to the estate of F. Harris.

James Steen built the house now owned and occupied by his son Joseph, who was born in this village, March 2, 1797. Joseph worked at house-building with his father until 1814, when he commenced work at the printers' trade, under Wm. Fessenden. After 9 years' employment at this trade as journeyman, he worked on contract for Messrs. Holbrook & Fessenden until 1828. This year he bought of Messrs. Thomas & Woodcock the right to their pulp dresser for the State of New York, and engaged two years in the sale of them and putting them in operation in the paper-mills of that State.

The familiar form of this gentleman, and his present quiet operations in the book and stationery business,—continued since 1830—gives no idea to the present generation—aside from the business aforesaid—what he has been, or what he has done in the long period of 82 years since his birth in this place. The generation now passing off the stage of life have ever considered him an important acquisition—a tower of strength—to any cause his honest convictions led him to advocate, and it is fortunate for this community that his power and influence has been so generally, if not invariably, in the right direction. He has really been a strong man, physically and mentally, often generously exercising these attributes, in times of adversity, advantageously to the condition of those less fortunate than himself. From his aid and counsel the latter have received courage and inspiration to face the ills of life.

In the month of June, 1830, he bought of George H. Peck one half of the book-store and bindery business, but the next year dissolved partnership with Peck, and took simply the book-store and stationary business into his hands. This business he has ever since continued up to the present time.

Though 82 years of age, Mr. Steen has no partner in his business, but he stands daily behind his counter, selling goods as he has for nearly half a century. If there is another instance of this kind we know not where to look for it; the annals of this place cannot furnish a parallel case.

During his mercantile operations, he published 11,000 Royal octavo Bibles, 1,500 pages each, 11,000 Eac. of Religious Knowledge, 1,500 pages each, 2,000 school Bibles and 1,000 pocket Testaments. In the young or early days of Mr. Steen, the publications in this place were of a very different character. His employer published Webster's spelling-book and several of the old novels, now seldom seen. Among them were the works of Jane Porter, "Rasselas," by Johnson, &c.

Printing was hard work in those days, being done by hand power stimulated by alcohol, in the form of whiskey black-strap, rum, or rye gin. For being a solitary exception in a total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, Mr. Steen was ridiculed by his fellow-workmen; but he has lived to see nearly all of them in a drunkard's grave. Near the printing office was a whiskey distillery, constantly sending into the atmosphere a delightful aroma, while the old presses were as constantly sending forth into the same atmosphere, "The Mysteries of Udolpho," "Scottish Chiefs," "Alonzo and Melissa," "Democracy Unveiled," "Paul and Virginia," "Romance of the Forest," &c.

Though fastened with ribs of oak and bands of iron,

Vain were the efforts of Osgood and Gill
To confine the spirits in that old still.

Out they would come at all times and seasons to haunt our houses and mingle with other spirits the ghosts of old warriors, hobgoblins and youthful dreams of ethereal beauty, as they fell like snow-flakes from the press.

Thereby was an air of rum and romance through which our old-time friend passed from youth to manhood, when we heard him, in a public lyceum, declaim against novel reading; and in 1830, he was foremost in organizing a temperance society in this village. The self-reliant, independent character of the man is apparent from the foregoing, and it is also so in every period of his life where decisive action was required.

Mr. Steen has evidently made some approach to obeying the scriptural command: "Prove all things; hold fast to that which is good."

He read Paine's "Age of Reason," but could not become an infidel. Over 60 years ago he joined the Congregational church and Sunday-school. He yet remains the eldest member of those institutions, attending regularly upon the exercises of the same to this time (1878).

In 1838, he tried democracy, under Van Buren's administration, and for a short time was editor and proprietor of "The Windham County Democrat," years afterward conducted by Geo. W. Nichols. This experiment worked upon him as harmlessly as did "Paine's Age of Reason."

In 1840, he was editor of "The Flail," a whig campaign paper, which had a circulation of 5000 copies per week. This paper was published by Wm. E. Ryther, now of Bernardston, Mass.

Mr. Steen has seen and had personal acquaintance with the editors and proprietors of all the old newspapers published here, commencing with the first one, The Federal Galaxy, by Benjamin Smead, first published 1797; Brattleboro Reporter, by Wm. and Thomas G. Fessenden, 1806; Brattleboro Messenger, by Alexander C. Putnam, succeeded by Geo. W. Nichols; The Yeoman, Simon Ide; Independent Inquirer, Wm. E. Ryther, 1833; Vermont Statesman, O. H. Platt; Windham County Democrat, Geo. W. Nichols.

Mr. Steen was the last agent appointed here for paying pensions to soldiers of the Revolution of 1776, having continued that duty until the last one died.

He was appointed assignee in bankruptcy for Windham county in 1844; justice of the peace in 1848, and now holds the office; selectman, 1854 '55; school committee, first chosen to put in operation the graded school system in 1841. He was prominent in advocating the school reform by effective remarks to the assembled voters of the district. He was severely censured by a wealthy man in this place for his action respecting the schools; but neither wealth or position could ever shut his mouth. He has always been ready to sell books, but never his principles.

His early struggles with poverty, his prudence, economy and self culture under difficulties—never having attended school over 12 months—and being by trade a printer, reminds us, in these respects, of Benjamin Franklin. "Seest thou a man diligent in business, he shall stand before kings."

In 1840, Mr. Steen advocated the election of Harrison to the presidency, and remained true to the whig party to the last. When the old flag was assailed by foes without and foes within, he threw his vote and influence for the party which defended it, and is unwilling to trust that flag in the hands of those who sought to destroy it. With him—our eldest, last living relic of a stormy past—the fight is over. When he shall finally lie down on the well fought field, to pleasant dreams, what drapery more fitting to wrap about him than that same old flag?

In compliance with the request of Miss Hemenway of Burlington, and for reasons given in the dedication of this work, we have made this brief sketch of our old friend of over half a century, whose example we deem a fitting one for the mechanics of Brattleboro.

[HENRY BURNHAM.]

HON. RICHARD WHITNEY.

[Brother of Hon. Lem'1 Whitney.]

In the cemetery at Hinsdale, N. H., where Rev. Bunker Gay was buried, we found a monument having thereon the following inscription:

"Here lies the mortal remains of Richard Whitney, counsellor at law, of Brattleboro, Vermont, who departed this life Sept. 9, 1815, aged 39 years. Those who knew him not, may learn from this monumental stone that his virtues have rendered his memory precious to his bereaved friends. The sight of it will excite a tender recollection of his worth in the bosoms of those who knew him, and a tear of sincere regret at his early and untimely departure. Let us humbly hope he has gone where his virtues will be justly appreciated."

Hon. Richard Whitney was born in Petersham, Mass., in 1776, practiced law in Brattleboro in 1808, and was secretary of State in 1806. His character and attainments made him well deserving of the favorable testimonials inscribed upon his monument at Hinsdale.

Near the time of his death he became mentally deranged, and was committed to the care of Mr. Hooker, in Hinsdale, N. H. He was confined in the house—yet standing—built by Rev. Bunker Gay, and then occupied by his son-in-law, Mr. Hooker.

At that time but little, if anything, was known in regard to the proper treatment of insane persons. The faculty were vainly groping in the dark for a potent weapon with which they could meet this mysterious enemy of human happiness called insanity. Many, especially the devoutly religious classes, attributed this malady to supernatural causes. Therefore they considered all remedial efforts vain, and nothing could be done but to confine the unfortunate victim and wait for death.

A council of physicians—Dr. Marsh of Hinsdale has been mentioned as one of the said council—decided upon trying, for the recovery of Mr. Whitney, a temporary suspension of his consciousness by keeping him completely immersed in water three or four minutes, or until he became insensible, and then resuscitate or awaken him to a new life. Passing through this desperate ordeal, it was hoped, would divert his mind, break the chain of unhappy associations, and thus remove the cause of his disease. Upon trial, this system of regeneration proved of no avail, for, with the returning consciousness of the patient, came the knell of departed hopes, as he exclaimed, "You can't drown love."

According to a former version of the story, there was a second application of the drowning process that terminated the life of Mr. Whitney. But Mr. Hooker, grandson of Rev. Bunker Gay, lately informed us that Mr. Whitney did not pass through a second ordeal by water; the physicians, upon mature deliberation, concluded they were on the right track, but had not used the proper agent for the stupefaction of the life forces. The next and last resort was opium, and Mr. Whitney died under the treatment.

The result of the aforementioned experiments for the cure of insanity may have suggested to the widow of Dr. Marsh, the importance of an asylum for the treatment of that class of persons so afflicted, and thereby her will of $10,000, whence originated the Vermont asylum at Brattleboro.

was the first elected of the three members of Congress who were citizens of Brattleboro at the time of their election.

His name, with that of Judge Chapin and others, is recorded as one of the incorporators of the first joint stock company that originated in this place. This company built the first bridge connecting the East village with New Hampshire in 1804, when it is evident Mr. Elliot was a resident of Brattleboro. He was but about 26 years of age at this time, and this, with other circumstances or events, with which he was connected, compels us to believe he was the most conspicuous in early life, and attended to the serious duties of manhood while other young men of his age were "sowing their wild oats."

His intimate acquaintance with Gen. William H. Harrison, and high appreciation of his character, caused Mr. Elliot to say, "I wish Gen. Harrison could occupy the highest office in this nation; if every man in this country knew the General as I know him, he would go to the presidential chair with an overwhelming vote." These remarks were made several years before Harrison was before the public, or thought of, as a candidate for president. To our surprise, not four months had elapsed, after the death of Mr. Elliot, when Harrison received the nomination, and following soon came the "overwhelming vote," which swept the venerable sage of North Bend from his quiet home to earthly greatness.

In politics, Mr. Elliot was a Jeffersonian Democrat and, to some extent, a party man; but he estimated character and ability far above party lines.

After remaining in this town over 25 years, he moved to Newfane. In a Brattleboro paper appeared the following obituary:

"Died at Newfane, Vt., Nov. 10, 1839. Hon. James Elliot, aged 64. He was a native of Gloucester, Mass. He came to reside in Guilford in early life, and enlisted under Gen. Wayne at 18 years of age, and served in the Indian wars three years, quartered most of the time in the west part of Ohio, then a wilderness. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in Windham county, Vt. In the war of 1812, he held a captain's commission. Before he was 30 years of age, he was elected one of the representatives to Congress from this State, and ably discharged that trust for three successive elections.

"His after life was variegated with different scenes and services. Besides his attention to the practice of law, he served several years as register of probate and clerk of the courts, and the past two years had the office of state's attorney for the county of Windham.

"He sustained through life the character of an honest man, with talents and intellectual acquirements of the first order."

His remains were brought here and deposited in Prospect Hill cemetery, where, since 1797, we have placed other of our honored dust and choicest treasures. His widow—a daughter of Gen. Dow—survived him 30 years, and died in New York city. Her remains were brought here and placed beside those of her husband. Their daughter, Mrs. D. Pomroy of New York, is now (1872) the only surviving member of the family.

was born in Gloucester, Mass., Aug. 16, 1777, and died at West Brattleboro, Dec. 10, 1845.

With the exception of Hon. John W. Blake, we believe he and his brother, James Elliot, were the first ones established in law practice in this town, and he spent the largest share of the last 40 years of his life in Brattleboro, East village.

Elliot street is so named because he formerly owned the land and erected the first house thereon, a brick building of two stories, now standing, near the south end of Crosby's block. His one-story, wood law office stood, as late as 1830, on the site of the Revere house. In or near 1835, he sold the site to Ashbell Dickenson. A large share of, if not all, the land upon the south side of Green street was once in his possession.

He was the successor of Hon. John W. Blake as postmaster, but, becoming a federalist, and prominently advocating the principles of that party during the presidency of Jefferson, he was succeeded in 1810 by Asa Green, Esq., who uninterruptedly held the office until after the inauguration of Harrison in 1841.

He was judge of probate for this district, and repeatedly represented the town in the State Legislature, was candidate for Congress, and also associate judge of this county, where he was widely known as a man of marked ability, unquestioned integrity, and not surpassed in his devotion to charity and mercy.

In the summer of 1826, his mind was greatly exercised by the destitution and sufferings of the inhabitants of Greece, caused by the barbarism of the Turks, with whom they were at war at that time. A ship was at this time in Boston harbor waiting for contributions of clothing and other necessities from New England, to carry to that suffering, unhappy people. At a public meeting, Mr. Elliot described the pressing necessities of the case with such eloquence few could listen to his appeal unmoved. One of the wealthiest citizens in this place became so interested it was said he offered to give as many dollars as his wealthy neighbor would give cents for this object.

The Grecian costume, loose fitting, and so simple one garment would suit persons of various sizes, garments were so easily made, quite a large quantity was soon furnished by the organized ladies of this village, and sent to the ship aforementioned.

"Ought the reading of fiction to be encouraged?" was the question before our village lyceum a long time ago. A speaker said, "I know from experience novel-reading is an unhealthy exercise. My lamp has been burning and my tears falling, long after the midnight hour, over accounts of human suffering that existed simply in the mind of the author of the book."

Mr. Elliot replied: "Mr. Chairman—I would not advise the reading of fiction indiscriminately; but no work of this character coming under my observation has, in descriptions of human suffering, ever exceeded the reality. Sentiment must ever precede action, therefore we have reason to hope that the gentleman who has just made so commendable an expose of his emotions will, when occasion shall require action, prove by praiseworthy deeds how valuable are the sources from whence came his inspirations. As I see how needful is the exercise of ideality upon occasions like this, and realize that the most sublime and beautiful sentiments and sentences can be found in works of fiction, I regret that so little of my time has been devoted to this matter, and am therefore unable to give so good an account of my experiences as my friend G. has given of his. I am glad to learn that my neighbor is a man of fine sensibilities, tender emotions, and has a heart that can be moved by the woes and sufferings of his fellow-men."

Mr. Elliot was not destitute of humor, though there was at times a thoughtful, serious expression upon his countenance.

Born at that dark period in our history, soon after the commencement of that almost hopeless struggle against the greatest power, at that time, in Europe, he was old enough to remember that contest and the return from the war of his poor, sick father to a home of poverty, where he soon died from disease, contracted in the service of his country.

Few men were better fitted by past associations, patriotic fervor and oratorical power, to cause the generations growing up around him to properly appreciate their dear bought, priceless liberties. Therefore his services as orator at Fourth of July celebrations were exceedingly interesting, and eminently and universally acceptable.

During the absence of Rev. Wm. Wells, at that time the only pastor of this place, death had come to one of his parishioners, and not a minister could be found in town to attend the funeral. Application was made to Rev. Mr. Beckley, then of Dummerston, sickness preventing his attendance; and Mr. Elliot was called upon to address the funeral assembly, which he did in a manner highly creditable to his mind and heart.

He well knew how to sympathize with his sorrowing neighbors. The beloved partner of his early years went in her blooming beauty to the grave, leaving a child too young to realize the magnitude of his loss; but in after years he wrote the following lines, addressed to his mother:*

[Copied from the Brattleboro Messenger of December, 1824.]

"In childhood's gay and sportive hours,
I reckless play'd upon thy grave;
Well pleased to pluck the sweet wild flowers,
Which o'er thy grassy bed did wave.

I loved to view thy marble stone,
To read the sculptur'd letters try;
But when my father wept thereon,
I could not think what made him cry.

Remembrance cannot bring to light
Thy form, or make thy face appear;
But fancy paints thee fair and bright
As holy, beauteous angels are.

And now I love to think of thee—
Of all thy virtues, all thy worth—
And hope my soul with thee will be
When I am pillow'd deep in earth."

Mr. Elliot married, second, a daughter of Rutherford Hayes, by whom he had seven children. Three sons were collegiates at Yale and Trinity colleges (Conn.). The eldest, Sam'l H. Elliot, became a Congregationalist minister and principal of an educational institution near New Haven, Ct., and was the author of some interesting publications. J. H. Elliot finished his course in 1836† at Trinity college, died in December, 1838, at Savannah, Ga.

*My grandfather copied these verses from the Brattleboro Messenger, Dec. 24, 1824, and from his authority alone do we relate the circumstances, authorship, &c. H. B.

†He was at that time chosen to deliver the valedictory; ill-health prevented.

He was noted as a young man of great modesty and superior attainments.

The death of William C. Elliot, the youngest son, failed after about two years at Trinity college in Hartford, Ct., and he died in Brattleboro, October, 1839. As could be as truthfully said of the other members of this family who have died, he never caused sadness or affliction to his relatives or friends but when he sickened and died. Nothing we could say of our loved schoolmate and intimate friend would give so faithful a picture of him as the following tribute from his sister, Miss Betinda Elliot, who, some years since, married Mr. McClellan and left her native home.

"He was our youngest brother, fondly loved—
Companion, friend, and cherished counsellor.

Sweetly in him did blend
A childlike, simple spirit, with a mind Matured, refined, with knowledge and with grace.

To God he consecrated all he had:
Yes, on His altar freely laid himself.
His worth I cannot speak, for even now
The wound bleeds freshly that his loss has made;

And time, that antidote for grief like this,
Has not yet sealed the fountain of my tears.
Oh, in our hearts, as long as being lasts,
We'll treasure up the memory of his deeds,
And love him still."

The arrival to our shores of Gen. La Fayette, Aug. 15, 1824, gave Mr. Elliot so much pleasure he wrote some papers upon this subject.

In these papers we find an account of the progress of LaFayette through the country, and of his departure. We also learn his views respecting agriculture, the education of the masses, and on legal and moral questions. His writings give evidence of strong patriotism and love of the right. The last time we took the hand of this venerable man, he gave us the productions to which we have alluded in the foregoing.

Reluctantly have we released our grasp upon even the rudest links connecting us with the early times—the morning hours of freedom; but painfully as well as reluctantly have we let go forever of a link like this. Contact with such opens to our vision a pathway through the past, and as

by an electric wire, passing through the long dead years, there comes to us the pulsations of brave hearts, beating time to the march of liberty, well nigh one hundred years ago.

The eloquence of words rarely fall upon the ear in public places. "In America," it is said, "the orator is dying; in England he is dead." Whatever may be predominating influences, never, we trust, will the fashion of the day, or the influences of others, lessen our veneration and admiration for this old orator of Brattleboro.

SALMON BENNET.

Salmon Bennet, son of Noah Bennet, was born in Brattleboro, Vt., Jan. 6, 1790. He studied theology with Rev. Ephraim H. Newton, of Marlboro, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Winchester, N. H., Sept. 10, 1817. Rev. Caleb Burge of Brattleboro (West) preached the sermon. He was dismissed Dec. 25, 1823, preached a year in Roxbury, and was installed in Marlboro Sept. 27, 1825. Rev. Isaac Robinson of Alstead preached the sermon. He was dismissed April 5, 1831, and was installed in East Boscawen as colleague with Rev. Samuel Wood, D. D., Dec. 5, 1832. Rev. J. S. Barstow, D. D., of Keene, preached the sermon. He was dismissed Oct. 25, 1836, and then preached a year at Irvingsville, Mass. He was installed at Wendell May 2, 1838. Rev. Francis Danforth of Winchester, N. H., preached the sermon. He was dismissed Sept. 26, 1844. He then preached a short time in Heath, first to the Congregational, and then to the Baptist church; and afterwards lived in Halifax, Vt., preaching to one or the other of the Congregational churches there for about three years, ending in 1852, when he removed to Chataugue county, N. Y.

HON. JOHN R. BLAKE.

Another of the early residents of Brattleboro, the Hon. John R. Blake, died in Boston, Mass., June 6, 1873, aged 79 years and 4 months. Funeral services were held in the church of the Rev. Rufus Ellis, June 8th; and on the day following the body was brought to Brattleboro by the only son of the deceased, Dr. John Ellis Blake of New York, and deposited in our village cemetery, where prayers were said by the Rev. Mr. Jenkins.

The deceased was born in Brattleboro, Feb. 8, 1793. He was a son of J. W. Blake, a lawyer of distinction and a gentleman of wealth, education and polished manners, who moved to this part of Vermont at an early period of its settlement, from Worcester, Mass. He at one time resided in Guilford; was the owner of a large tract of land in and near this village, which then consisted of a few straggling houses, and he took an active part in the political affairs of the State, being one of its earliest representatives. His name occurs in the early records of southern Vermont, as one of its most prominent citizens. But at the closing period of his life, becoming reduced in circumstances, his son, John R. Blake, was taken from school and compelled to go into business, and commence the battle with the world as a poor boy at a very early age. His first experience as a trader was with the Indians at Onondaga, N. Y., now Syracuse, which was then considered far West, being taken from school at Deerfield, Mass., and sent there to begin life.

Returning to Vermont, he soon entered upon an extensive business as merchant. In company with Francis Goodhue, and also with Grindal R. Ellis, whose daughter he married. He carried on an extensive trade with Hartford, Ct., shipping horses, cattle and other produce by the river, and receiving back West India and other goods. Among his traits of character was a great fondness for fine stock, for horses and cattle. A picture of one of his favorite horses, done by Fisher, the distinguished New England painter, is still in possession of his family. In the days of staging he took an interest in stage lines, and especially in seeing them supplied with fine horses; and he exercised a leading influence in promoting the construction of the Vt. and Mass. R. R., which connected the village with Boston by steam communication. He also took an active interest in establishing the old Brattleboro bank, of which he was for a long time one of the directors. His financial abilities were solid and comprehensive.

During the times when the militia was maintained on a respectable footing, he served as aid-de-camp to Gen. Mann; and in subsequent years he sat for several terms in the legislature, both as representative of his town and as senator. His career as legislator was marked for his usual business-like practical ability, and may be said to have been distinguished by his frank and decided opposition to the Maine liquor law, so-called, which he believed impolitic, and for an eulogy pronounced on the death of Daniel Webster.

The following letter, received by the pastor of the Unitarian Society in this place from the pastor of the First Church in Boston, with which Mr. Blake was associated, will be read with interest by personal friends of the deceased:

106 MARLBOROUGH ST.,
June 14, 1873. }

Dear Mr. Jenkins:—I performed the funeral service in my church on Sunday morning last over the remains of a most worthy gentleman, the Hon. John R. Blake; and as the burial was to be in Brattleboro, there may have been a burial service there also. I hope that there was, for Mr. Blake was born in the town, and long and honorably identified with it; and it was exceedingly pleasant to think last Monday of the beautiful graveyard under the clear afternoon sky, and that they were making his grave in that hill country which was so familiar and so dear to him from boyhood. I have seen much of Mr. Blake, and especially of late, during a long and painful illness. He was a very true and a very thoughtful man, with far more in his heart than ever found expression in word; a Christian of a broad and practical type, with a good leaven of the old Puritanism, to which this country owes so much; a man downright, upright, and forthright, not untouched by the questionings of the day, and yet holding fast the essentials of faith and all "the weightier matters of the law." He was much respected in Boston as a man of his word; but the larger part of his life was passed in Brattleboro, and so I am moved to send to you these few words concerning one whom we greatly miss, although we ought to be thankful that days which had become labor and sorrow are no more. I love to think of him as gathered to his fathers in your beautiful town, where, if anywhere, the body may rest in peace, whilst the spirit is refreshed with the light of the Divine Face.

Faithfully yours,

RUFUS ELLIS.

HON. JOHN NOYES.

(By Geo. W. Noyes, of Wallingford, Ct.)

Prominent among the citizens of Windham county in the early part of the present century, was Hon. John Noyes of Brattleboro. Born at Atkinson, N. H., April 2, 1764, he was fifth in the line of descent from Nicholas Noyes, one of the early settlers of Massachusetts, and inherited the aptitude for learning which belonged to his ancestry. After graduating at Dartmouth, became a tutor in the college, was instructor of the class of Daniel Webster;* his attention turned to theological study, prepared himself for the ministry; finding it unsuited to his health, returned to teaching; had charge for some years of Chesterfield (N. H.) Academy; in 1800, removed to Brattleboro, and engaged in mercantile business with Gen. Mann.

Their store was in West Brattleboro. In those days the country merchant made two trips a year to Boston, by stage, or on horseback, spending three or four days on the road, and carrying a change of clothes, money for his purchases, and perhaps a pistol for his defence, in a pair of ample saddlebags. As the business of the firm increased it drew in other partners, and extended its operations to other towns,—branch establishments, under the name of "Noyes & Mann," or "Noyes, Mann & Hayes,"† were commenced in Wilmington and Whitingham. A principal article of produce in these new towns was potash, exchanged for goods at the store—tea, coffee, tobacco, calico, and plain stuffs,

*Mr. Webster, in the time of his fame, visited Dartmouth College, and held a "reception." Among the students presented to him was John H. Noyes, who was introduced as a son of his former tutor. "I wish," said Mr. Webster, taking the student's hand, "that I could do you as much good as your father did to me."

†General Mann afterwards removed to Syracuse, N. Y. His daughter married Gen. R. B. Marcy, U. S. A., and his granddaughter is the wife of Gen. Geo. B. McClellan, late candidate for the presidency. Hon. Austin Birchard of Fayetteville, Vt., and Mr. Adin Thayer of Hoosick, N. Y., commenced business as clerks in this concern.

together with the "mag of flip," the common attendant of every bargain. Nearly all classes then drank liquor, from the ministers and magistrates down.

At forty years of age, Mr. Noyes married Miss Polly Hayes, by whom he had nine children. After serving two or three terms in the State legislature, he was, in 1815, elected to Congress from the southern district of Vermont, and entered the House of Representatives as fellow-member with Clay, Randolph, and other celebrities, of whom he was fond of telling anecdotes in after life.

In 1817, Mr. Noyes removed to Dummerston, where he continued to reside till 1821, when, having acquired what he deemed a competency, retired from active business to a farm in Putney, and occupied himself mainly thereafter in superintending the education of his children. His eldest daughter, Mrs. L. G. Mead, still lives in Brattleboro. (1869.) The eldest son, John H. Noyes, is the founder of the Oneida Community. Mr. Noyes, the elder, died Oct. 26, 1841.

VALEDICTORY ADDRESS.

Chief Justice Royall Tyler, the author, delivered at an exhibition at the close of Miss Rebecca Peck's select school, in the East village of Brattleboro, in 1823. A son of the author—Rev. Thomas P. Tyler, D. D., then a lad of about 8 years,—was the orator on this happy occasion. This poetical effusion, so characteristic of the fine literary taste of the Judge, after years of search and inquiry we received a copy taken from a scrap-book in the city of Washington, by Miss Amelia Tyler, a granddaughter of the author. According to the best information within our own observation, the Judge gave compliments well deserved, for the little Misses of that school were generally remarkable for their personal beauty and good conduct. The delivery of the address took the school, as well as the audience, by surprise, and furnished a theme of pleasant allusion and reference for a long time in this village. The young orator was quite personal in the application of his theme, causing the whitest of roses to become blushing ones when he pointed his little magic finger toward them. Some of these roses, very well preserved, yet remain in this place, now known as grandmothers; but others, and doubtless much the largest portion of this constellation of the beautiful, are—

"Where are now the birds that sang a hundred years ago."

The orator became a distinguished clergyman of the Episcopal church, and officiated many years in Western New York; but now, advanced to over three-score years, and suffering from infirmities, he is back to his native place, retired from service, to the scene of his first oratorical efforts 55 years ago.

"I dare to say you all do wonder
How our good ma'am, who is so wise,
With taste so pure and judgment nice,
Shall thus commit so sad a blunder,
As 'gainst all reason, rhyme and rule,
To make me mouthpiece of the school.
Perhaps the thought that I might show
How well her very worst might do;
At any rate, shine or not shine,
The praise, or blame, be hers, not mine.
As for myself, in some snug corner,
I'd rather sit, like brave Jack Horner,
And with my thumb, like Jack so sly,
Pluck out the plums from Christmas pie;
For in my mouth plums are much sweeter
Than finest words of prose or meter;—
But ma'am commands, and I obey,
For she holds here a sovereign sway.
Shall I a little rebel prove,
When govern'd by her law of love?
Now, if your patience will prevail,
Indulge me, and I'll tell a tale.
'Oh, dear mamma, pray let me see
What have you in your hands for me—
Some almonds, raisins, nuts, or figs,
Or peppermints, or sugar pigs?'

Thus William to his mother said,
As she her opening palm displayed,
And show'd to his disgusted eyes,
Some shrivel'd things of dwarfish size,
Dark as the sweepings of some room,
Which long had mourned the absent broom.

'I don't want them,' said pouting Will,
'They're neither fit for food nor play;
They look as bad as doctor's pills,
Do throw the dingy things away.'
'Poor simple child,' mamma replied,
'Know you despise the garden's pride?
For from these shrivel'd dwarfish things,
The glory of the garden springs;
True, cast them in the highway,
And they no glory will display:

But plant them in the garden fair,
Beneath the gardener's fostering care,
Nurtur'd and cultur'd each will bloom,
And shed its richest, best perfume;
Not he, so fam'd in Scripture story,
Great Solomon, in all his glory,
Was e'er so deck'd the eye to please,
Or e'er array'd like one of these,
And education is defined
The horticulture of the mind;
The mental buds, by its kind care,
Unfold their petals to the air,
Prepar'd by bland instruction given,
To shine on Earth or bloom in Heaven.'
Thus ends my tale, and now I pray
Let me apply it my own way:
Kind patrons, who here condescend
Our exhibition to attend,
Think not these benches now sustain
Of girls and boys a simple train:
But that within our classic bowers,
You see a rich parterre of flowers,
Of buds and blossoms, tendrils, shoots,
Springing from intellectual roots;
Your fancies, sure, you need not strain
To change to flowers our female train:
See Ellen, there, her bloom disclose;
Say, is she not a blushing rose?
In sweet Sophia, you may ken,
A sister rose of the same stem;
While in Miss Fanny's form we trace
The aspiring tulip's airy grace;
Her little namesake, sure, will tally
With the sweet lily of the valley.
The china aster's varied dye
Bright Sarah's mental powers imply;
And in Elizabeth we view
The snowy lily's virgin hue.
The golden pansy, may I fancy,
Portray our modest, pensive Nancy.
In fair Calista's beauteous face
You may the bright carnation trace;
In graceful Helen's air you see,
The very pink of courtesy.
Do you the rose of Sharon prize,
On our Lucretia cast your eyes;
Would you the pale syringa seek,
Mark gentle Anna's snowy cheek;
The amaranthus well may be
Sweet little Gertrude, named for thee.
And sure the gay, sweet-scented pea,
May typify fair Emily.
Our Marys too, as bright a knot
As ever deck'd a maiden's bower;
One is a jonquil, a snowdrop one,
And one a lovely, sweet wild flower.

Elizabeth, her sister Jane,
Are buds that one day will expand;
Soon as their spring is on the wane,
They'll bloom the glory of the land.

Sweet Lucy is a bright moss pink
As ever flash'd its tints before ye;
And Henrietta is, I think,
You'll all allow, a morning glory.

Our bright Eliza, I'll not name,
But rather wish you'd tax your powers,
Provided you with care select
Her emblem from the fairest flowers.

In our cold, bleak and Northern air,
We have few flowers that may compare
With sweet Belinda's speaking face,
Or Harriet's form, or Julia's grace.

There is a fine, attractive flower,
By botanists called mignonnette,
Which I pronounce, by fancy's power,
Shall give the name to Mariette.

Come, Maia, from thy sylvan bowers,
Queen of gay tints and frolic fancies,
Come, bring thy best bouquet of flowers,
The finest type for brilliant Frances.*

Yet there's one favorite, pretty Miss,
Whose given name I've most forgot;
But you may find her out by this:
Her Linnæan name—forget me not.

Perhaps, within our flowery set,
You'll ask, if we have not some Nett—
No, no, not nettles; that's not right,
We have no plants so impolite.
Perchance we have, if you require,
Some pretty sprigs of sweet sweetbriar.

But what are then your boys, you'll cry,
Have you no flowers to name them by?
Why, boys, as boys, are well enough,
And you may call us garden stuff;
For if with our associates fair,
You should for once us boys compare,
Beside the jonquil, pink and rose,
We dwindle to potatwe blows!

Now, if within our garden fair,
You find aught lovely, good or rare,
To our instructress give the praise:
Our dear instructress crown with bays,
For to her kind, judicious care
We gratefully owe all we are.

*This golden age of female beauty in Brattleboro demanded a tribute—the orator, the singer, comes with the occasion.

Nor would we now forget what's due
Most honored patroness to you:*

To nurse these buds to opening flowers,
Needs genial suns and fostering showers.
All these your favor has supplied,
To you we owe our garden's pride,
You have the seeds of science sown,
And when in life our buds are blown,
Then—then we'll own the generous deeds,
And bless the hand which sow'd the seeds.

And now, kind friends, I pray excuse
My falterings and my stammers—
Respectfully, I take my leave,
And so I make my manners.

Hon. Royall Tyler—elected Chief Justice of Vermont in 1807, and Professor of Jurisprudence of the U. Vt., in 1811, at Burlington, was widely known and had an extensive correspondence with the most noted men of his time in the forming period of our institutions, and the most exciting times in our history, from the Revolution of 1776 to the last war with England, commencing in 1812. Therefore his unpublished memoirs possess a national interest which would, we believe, demand their publication if the public were conscious of their worth. As one of the fathers of American literature, as the date and character of his writings for the drama and periodicals of the time sufficiently prove, we cannot afford to let the waves of oblivion close over the records of his mental efforts as the turf now covers his mortal remains in the cemetery of the East village of Brattleboro. The tragedy, poetry, and romance of his life and family have the charm of fiction. When, with his college friend, on the staff of Gen. Sullivan, their force of 5000 men became scattered by the enemy, Tyler and his friend,

Daggett, lodged over night in a barn, where they discussed the question of where, if they must be hit with a bullet, would be the place of choice. The next day duty called them to the post of danger, and poor Daggett was shot through the lungs. "Ah, Rial," said he, "you see I did not have my choice."

Tyler, when a gay gallant of 20, in scarlet coat and short clothes, entered the house of his friend, Mrs. Joseph Pearce Palmer, of Boston, and took from her arms her infant child (Mary Palmer) and said: "This child will become my wife." Time verified his prophecy, and her children, now venerable in years, and those who have gone, with honorable record, to their final sleep, have blessed her memory. In the varied—in the elevated departments of human effort—in the pulpit, at the bar, mercantile and teachers' desk, her children have proved the character of their maternal parentage. That mother who was little Mary Palmer, when seated in her mother's arms at the dining-table of Gen. Joseph Warren, when he partook of his last dinner, and received the parting hand from his most intimate friends for the last time, before marching to his death on Bunker Hill. This interesting event we learn, not for the first time, from the memoirs. We heard, near 1830, the aged Mrs. Palmer relate the story. She said: "My husband was an early associate and intimate friend of Joseph Warren, therefore we, with other of his friends, were invited to dine with him, as he said, 'for the last time.' Beautiful in her old age, seemingly, as 'Madame Recamier,' with swimming eyes and trembling lips, she continued: 'Joseph Warren was an ardent patriot, an accomplished scholar, elegant in manners, universally beloved, and was the idol of Boston. After dinner, we all and each begged and prayed that he would not go to the battle-field; but vainly did we try to move him; he firmly believed the cause demanded the sacrifice of his life, and he must obey that demand. Amidst the flames, constant roar of artillery, and panic-stricken inhabitants, I fled from the city with my little Mary crying and clinging to my bosom.'"

When a girl of fourteen, Mary Palmer accompanied the family of Elbridge Gerry to New York, where she witnessed the inauguration of Washington, April 30, 1789

The memoirs of Judge Tyler, to which we have alluded, is a work of over 300 pages, legal cap, commenced by his son, Rev. Thomas Pickman Tyler, D. D., but not yet completed. As this was Judge Tyler's last place of abode, and where he lived one-fourth of a century, we extract sufficient matter from said memoirs, as will give an account of his origin, when and why he came to Vermont, college days, etc. :

"Hon. Royall Tyler was born in Boston, Mass., July 18, 1757. His family was wealthy and influential, giving him favorable opportunities for intellectual culture. His father, Royall Tyler, Sen., was a man of marked ability, and a graduate of Harvard College at 19 years, and soon after engaged in mercantile business in company with his brother-in-law, Samuel Phillips Savage. He was a member of the King's council from 1765 until his death in 1771. As such the name of Royall Tyler, Sen., appears upon the most important committees, during the long contest between the General Court and Governors Bernard and Hutchinson, occasioned by the stamp act, the quartering of the troops in Boston, and the removal of the General Court sessions to Cambridge. As the spokesman of the committee, he demanded of the Governor the removal of the troops from Boston. "The people," said he, to the Governor, "have formed their plan for removing the troops from the town, and it is impossible that they remain in it. The people will come in from the neighboring towns; there will be ten thousand men to effect the removal of the troops, let the consequences be what they may."

Amid the excitement, agitation and tumults of this period, his son Royall was growing to boyhood. The fireworks, processions, pealing of bells, and salvos of artillery, which marked the brief intoxication of loyalty, on the repeal of the stamp act, was to him a childish, though vivid memory, and he was a lad already fitting for college at the grammar school, when the same bells sounded the tocsin of alarm on the fearful night of the "Boston massacre." Notwithstanding the political agitation of the times, and heavy taxation, amounting often to more than one-third of their income, the family enjoyed twelve years of prosperity and domestic quiet. The next year, Mary, the eldest daughter, died, aged 18, and in May, 1771, the father, Royall Tyler, Sen., closed his honorable career at 48 years. He was buried in the tomb built by his father in the churchyard of King's chapel. It is situated on the westerly side of the ground adjoining the sidewalk of Tremont street, and is covered with a slab, sculptured with the coat of arms of the family.

At commencement July 15, 1772, Royall Tyler entered the freshman class of Harvard College, being then within three days of his 15th year. Of Mr. Tyler's college days little can be known, after the century since elapsed. His class seems to have been an able one, numbering among others, who afterwards distinguished themselves, Chief Justices Sewall and Thatcher, and Christopher Gore, Governor and U. S. Senator of Massachusetts. The latter was his room-mate, and many years after, Judge Tyler, while driving with his son down into Maine, pointed out a house where he and Gore spent some weeks, having been rusticated by the faculty for an unlucky contretemps in which they had involved themselves. Their room was over the front door of one of the college halls, and from the window they had thrown down a line with a hook properly baited, endeavoring thereon to catch one of a litter of pigs in the yard below. Intently watching the issue of this experiment, they failed to notice the approach of the Reverend and austere President Langdon, until he had ascended the steps, removed his cocked-hat, and was wiping his forehead. The line was pulled up with a sudden jerk, in hopes that he might not see from whose window it came; but alas, swinging across the doorway in its quick ascent, the hook caught the wig of the venerable doctor, and brought it up with a run. Aside from the unlucky result of his fishing for pigs, the only punishment recorded during his whole course was a fine of sixpence for abusing a library book.

Royall Tyler graduated in July, 1776, completing his collegiate course and his 19th year, while the country was in a delirium of hope and fear of its first month of independent existence. No record is known to exist of his comparative standing in his class. His reputation, however, for wit, genius and elegant scholarship had already extended beyond the walls of Harvard. He was recognized in the cultivated circles of Boston as the brilliant scion of a prominent family; and Yale, as a compliment, perhaps unprecedented, this same year, almost simultaneously with his alma mater, bestowed on him the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He commenced at once the study of law with the Hon. Francis Dana of Cambridge. For the three years succeeding he pursued his professional studies, mingled with more congenial literary occupations and the pleasures of social intercourse. A remarkably brilliant set of young men, cotemporaries and intimates in college, formed a club, which met steadily at the rooms of Col. John Trumbull, the young soldier and painter. Among those of this coterie who became distinguished in after life, beside Christopher Gore and himself, were Rufus King, subsequently delegate to the American Congress, U. S. Senator, and Ambassador to England; William Eustis, Governor of Massachusetts, member of Congress and Secretary of War; Aaron Dexter, Professor of Chemistry and Materia Medica at Harvard, and Thomas Dawes, Justice of the Supreme Court of Mass. Such a youthful company must have been an efficient mutual stimulus to intellectual exertion, and we do not wonder that Colonel Trumbull recalls, with pleasure, the evenings when in his studio, they "regaled themselves with a cup of tea, instead of wine, and discussed subjects of literature, politics and war." (Reminiscences, p. 50.) He also mentions (page 62) his having painted, at this time, a portrait 2-3d length, of Royall Tyler. This picture, which would now be so invaluable, both for the sake of the artist and the subject, was unfortunately lost some thirty years afterwards, destroyed by fire. Particulars, Memoirs, page 17. Particulars of Tyler in active service in the Revolution, Memoirs, p. 18.

Mr. Tyler was admitted to the bar in 1779, at the most gloomy period of the war of Independence. The business of Boston had been nearly ruined by the British occupation and the siege; while the presence of hostile fleets on the coast still prevented its revival. Such commerce as was possible had been driven to the more distant parts of Maine, where the building of vessels for the privateering service also contributed to the activities of trade. This seems to have induced him, in the first instance, to establish himself at Falmouth (now Portland) a town which having been burned by the enemy three years before, was rapidly rising from its ashes. His residence there was brief, and would not have been known the writer, but for a notice of him in Willis's "History of the Law, the Courts, and the Lawyers of Maine," which states that "Royall Tyler came to Falmouth in 1779. He was a fine scholar and an accomplished man. He continued but about two years in our State." The author gives a short sketch of his life, and adds the following anecdote:

"An incident occurred during his practice in Cumberland, which was not a little annoying to him. He commenced an action against an officer of a privateer, then lying in the harbor, and went aboard with the sheriff to have the writ served. But the privateer's-man, not liking the process, took up his anchor, and sailed out of the precinct, carrying the attorney and his officer with him, whom he landed on Booth Bay, and kept on his cruise,—acting upon the classical dictum: "Inter arma silent leges."

The improving prospect of peace, and the revival of business, soon made it expedient for Mr. Tyler to return to the vicinity of Boston. (Intimacy with the families of John Adams, Palmers, Quincy, and Richard Cranch, in Memoirs, page 20.)

Mr. Tyler removed to Quincy, then called Braintree, with the intention of identifying himself permanently with the interests of the place. He purchased landed property there, and is mentioned by its local historian as one of the first who endeavored to supply the pressing want of water-power by erecting a windmill on an original plan of his own. Popular as a lawyer, and admired as a wit, his neighbors seem nevertheless to have lacked confidence in his skill as a millwright. They made his undertaking a butt of their ridicule. Meeting one day the minister of the village, from whom he hoped for a more favorable judgment, he asked what he thought of his mill. "Very ingenious," replied the parson, "and in theory undoubtedly correct. When I was young, I built one just like it, and the only fault it had, was that it would not go." Such proved to be the case with Mr. Tyler's also.

(Letters from John Adams and also from Mrs. Adams, and other interesting matters on pages 25, 26, 27, 28, of Memoirs. 1786, courts silenced by armed mobs in the days of the "Shay Rebellion," so called, in Memoirs, page 32. Sad disappointments commencing, Memoirs, page 29).

The measures taken to suppress the Shay rebellion, engaged Mr. Tyler once more in military service. Jan. 19, 1787, Maj. Gen. Benjamin Lincoln took command of the forces of the State of Massachusetts. He appointed Royall Tyler his aid-de-camp, with the title of Major, and in the heart of one of the coldest of New England winters took the field, pressing on with all speed, to save the arsenal at Springfield, and to defeat the insurgents. The result is a matter of history. The fortnight following the defeat of the rebels was spent in vigorous pursuit of them through the blustering storms of winter over the hills of Berkshire, covered with two feet of snow, into New York and "the territory called Vermont." Major Tyler, with a troop of cavalry, was actively employed in this service. He used to relate how, on one occasion, he entrapped a company of the fugitives in a meeting-house, on Sunday. Thinking themselves far out of the reach of pursuit, they had stacked their arms outside, leaving but a single sentinel, who was soon enticed into the shelter of the porch from the biting wind that swept over the common. Their leader, like a Yankee Cromwell, was holding forth from the pulpit to the descendants of his Ironsides, on the oppression and tyranny of the government and its bloodthirsty resolution to hunt down and bring to the gallows every patriot who had taken up arms in defence of the people's rights. Meanwhile Major—as he was usually called, when in command of detached parties, Colonel—Tyler, by a rapid march through cross-roads, had intercepted their route, quietly surrounded the house, seized their muskets and frightened their sentinel into silence. Waiting until the orator had concluded, he then walked up into the pulpit and informed them that they were his prisoners. He then went on with a long and earnest speech in refutation of the misrepresentations and calumnies against the government, by which the rank and file had been led astray; showed them that the evils under which the government suffered were the inevitable results of the exhaustion of the war; that the Legislature had done, and were ready to do every thing possible to relieve the popular distress; and that instead of prosecuting offenders mercilessly, as alleged, only required of the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers among them to surrender their arms, and a renewal of their oath of allegiance. The result was the instant conversion of the whole band into good citizens, their leaders only being committed to trial for treason. By the middle of February the rebellion was suppressed in Massachusetts; but the most prominent of the rebels had escaped into the neighboring States, and still deluded their followers that they would soon return with such assistance as would make them successfully take the field. These promises received some support from the fact that the political party views of Gov. Bowdoin, and his administration, were opposed, as aristocratic and tyrannical, to those in power in the rest of New England. To arrest these ringleaders was very important; and to do this within the jurisdiction of other sovereign States, obtaining the consent and assistance of the local authorities, was a service of peculiar delicacy and difficulty, especially as it was known that the people very generally sympathized with the insurgents. By the act of the Legislature, the Governor of Massachusetts was requested to issue a proclamation offering a reward for apprehending such of the ringleaders, or principals, in the present rebellion, as he shall judge proper, not exceeding £150, for any one of them.

The Governor issued a proclamation, offering rewards for the arrest of Daniel Shay, Elijah Day and John Wiley, as being "principals, aiders and abettors of this horrid and wicked rebellion." When Gen'l Lincoln received this, at Pittsfield, he had information that these persons were in Bennington county, Vermont, making their way through New York to Canada. Whoever should be sent in pursuit of them would be obliged to apply to the Executives of New York and Vermont for authority and aid,—a duty exceedingly delicate, for New York claimed Vermont as a province of her own, while the latter had proclaimed itself an independent State, had elected Thomas Chittenden its Governor, and had chosen a Legislative Council and House of Representatives, then in session at Bennington. It had applied for admission to the confederacy; but Congress had not yet acknowledged its independence by receiving it as a State. He determined to send Major Tyler on this service, furnishing him with this letter of credence:

“PITTSFIELD, Feb. 14, 1787.

SIR:—I have received from the Governor a proclamation for apprehending certain characters therein named, which proclamation you will receive herewith, as also the doings of the General Court, on which it has been founded; and a warrant against a number of persons, all of whom have been active in the present rebellion, and have taken shelter in the neighboring States. I have, therefore, to solicit, Sir, that you would pursue and apprehend these delinquents, and all such powers as you may need in executing this commission, you will please to apply to the Governors of the neighboring States for them, to whose countenance you are particularly recommended as a gentleman to whom the most perfect respect and confidence is due.

I have the honor of being, sir,
with great esteem,

Your obedient servant,
B. LINCOLN.

ROYALL TYLER, ESQ'R.

Major Tyler started on his mission early in the morning of Feb. 15, 1787. On his way he overtook Col. Fay, commander of the frontier post at Williamstown, in the northwestern corner of Massachusetts. The forces at this place, and those at Adams, five or six miles distant, were placed at his disposal, as far as he might need them, for the arrest of the fugitives. They were, in the aggregate, about 500 men. He delivered Gen'l Lincoln's orders to Col. Fay, and dispatched the following by express:

To the Commanding Officer of the Governmental Forces at Adams:

SIR:—I send you the enclosed order from Gen'l Lincoln. You will please to quarter your troops in Adams, as compact as is consistent with the nature of your instructions from the commander of the forces. I could wish that you would, for a few days to come, issue your provisions in such a manner that the troops under your command may have two days' cooked provisions; and that you would engage as many sleighs as will be needed to transport all your troops at a minute's warning. Mr. Jones, a respectable character, will assist you in this, and give you advice in other matters, as may be convenient. If you should be absent, at any time, from your quarters, please to leave a copy of this with the commanding officer on the spot, that no delay may be occasioned if I should call for any number of your troops.

Sir, I am your humble servant,

R. TYLER, V. A. D. C.

Williamstown, Feb. 14, 1787.

That which prompted these stringent orders—to be in constant readiness for instant start and rapid conveyance, was information that was hourly reaching him from scouts, of the whereabouts of the rebels; making it probable that by a sudden dash into the territory of the neighboring States, he might surprise and capture their most prominent leaders, as well as many of the rank and file. To this end, an early move was essential, but accurate and reliable information was equally so. He therefore resolved, with a small guard of picked horsemen, to push on to Bennington, where he expected to receive further reports from his emissaries, and hoped to receive aid from the Governor and Legislature there in session. From a lengthy and interesting report of his proceedings, to Gen. Lincoln, we give the following:

“Upon my arrival at Bennington, I was introduced to Mr. Tichenor—the Governor not being in town, or expected until the next day—to the principal characters in the administration of the government of Vermont; to the Judges of the Supreme Judicial Court; the Secretary, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, &c. We were in private at Col. Brush's house, I there communicated such part of my papers as I judged necessary. They entered fully into our design, but seemed to feel mortified that his Excellency, our Governor, had not wrote to Gov. Chittenden. I mentioned the act of our Legislature requesting the Governor to write to the authority of adjoining governments, and we amicably resolved that his Excellency's dispatches must have been intercepted by the rebels. They said that the "Shays" and "Days"—the two latter only being in company, had passed through the town a few days since—Shays under a feigned name, the two Days publicly with their side-arms. The people here will not, except a few very trusty exceptions, ever serve a warrant, unless the Legislature shall pass an act directing it. I have had a perplexing instance of this: Luke Day was, yesterday, half an hour in this town, and I could not, with the assistance of the first characters here, prevail upon the sheriff or constable to apprehend him. I offered to take a deputation myself, but was no inhabitant. Whilst we disputed he moved off. I know where he lodges, and shall apprehend him this evening.

Gen'l Ethan Allen, in my presence, said that those who held the reins of government in Massachusetts were a 'pack of damned rascals;' and that 'there was no virtue among them, and he did not think it worth while to try to prevent them that had fled into this State for shelter, from cutting down our maple trees,' and the common people flocked around him as though he had a sight to show. The common sentiment was, that they will shelter anybody that applies to any of their houses for shelter; and that our quarrel will be £10,000 advantage to this State."

The opposition of the Governor to any action of the Legislature, and the almost universal popular sentiment against the arrest of the fugitives, effectually defeated the object of Major Tyler's mission. He reports to Lincoln his having arrested Abram Wheeler, but he was soon rescued by forty-odd subjects of New York, who carried him in triumph to a large mob of rebels. 'I have many things to communicate not fit to be trusted on paper. I only say, that there is a certain embryo government, who are as weak as water; and that, in a short time, unless they act decidedly, will be like water spilt upon the ground—not to be gathered.'

Neither Shays, nor any other of the more noted of the fugitives were ever captured. Still, Major Tyler's mission can by no means be regarded as a failure. He had made so deep an impression on the authorities of Vermont, in favor of the cause of order and the government of Massachusetts, that although, as we have seen, they hesitated for the time, yet in a few days after he left Bennington, all the requests he had made were granted, the proclamation against harboring, aiding or abetting the rebels was issued, and effort made to arrest or disperse them, putting an efficient stop to their predatory incursions into Massachusetts. The last of these, indeed, the last effort of the rebellion—the attack upon the village of Stockbridge took place on the 27th of February, the day after Major Tyler left Bennington to report himself to Gen. Lincoln at Pittsfield. Immediately on his arrival there, he was sent to Stockbridge to obtain full particulars of occurrences there; and from thence to Boston, to report to the Governor the state of affairs on the western frontier, and the result of his mission to Vermont. He reached the capital the 5th of March. His first act was to send the following note to Judge Theodore Sedgewick.

"BOSTON, Monday Morning.

DEAR SIR:—I have the pleasure to enclose you several letters from your friends in Berkshire. They contain, doubtlessly, an account of the daring attack and inhuman conduct of the rebels at Stockbridge, and the happy and complete success of the troops of the government. I may have some little particulars, which your friends have omitted to communicate. If your curiosity is excited, pray come and see me at Mr. Palmer's, head of the ropewalk. The fatigues of last night—as I passed the whole of it in an open sleigh—and a variety of avocations, will excuse my waiting upon you.

Sir, I am yours, &c.

R. TYLER.

He also despatched the following note to the Governor:

Boston, March 5, 1787.

SIR:—I arrived here about half-past 4 this morning. Mr. Palmer will hand you the despatches from the Gens. Lincoln and Shepherd. Maj.-Gen. Lincoln's letter refers your Excellency to me for a statement of facts. Whenever you shall please to direct my attendance, I will wait upon you with punctuality. The nature of my communications are such, that I could wish to converse with you previous to your meeting your council.

I am, with the greatest respect,

Your Excellency's most ob't,

R. TYLER.

Governor's reply:

The Governor's compliments to Major Tyler. He would be glad to see him, on the subject of his billet, half an hour previous to the dining hour, which is 2 o'clock, or when it shall be convenient to Mr. Tyler. If his brother, the Colonel, is in town, the Governor would be glad to have his company at dinner to-day.

Tuesday morning, 6th March.

The result of his interview with the Governor and Council, was the resolution on their part to send him on a mission to the authorities of the State of New York. He accordingly started next morning on the long and tedious stage-journey to New York. He addressed a letter to Gov. Bowdoin. Extracts as follows:

"A report prevails here that Shays with several of his officers have been arrested in Canada. I have reason to doubt this. I shall meet with Major Beckwith, aide-de-camp to Lord Dorchester, at New York, and will endeavor, if it can be done with delicacy, to sound him as to the disposition of the British government, as it relates to harboring our rebels."

Major Tyler spent some time in New York, accomplishing the object of his mission. The energetic co-operation of the authorities of the bordering States entirely paralyzed the action of the fugitives. They meekly acknowledged their error and sued for pardon of their crimes. Special terms of court were held for trial of those in custody. Fourteen were condemned to death for high treason, and many more to imprisonment, fines, whipping and the pillory. The submission of the rebels was, however, so complete that the government felt itself strong enough to be merciful. None of the sentences were executed, and before the summer was over, an act of universal amnesty was passed. Even Shays himself was permitted to return home unmolested. He soon removed to Sparta, N. Y., where he died in 1825.

After this stirring episode in his life, Mr. Tyler returned to his law office in Boston. He evidently kept up his acquaintance and correspondence with those gentlemen whom he met at Bennington. The following letter, from one of the most distinguished men of Vermont, we copy:

"BENNINGTON, 28 Aug., 1787.

SIR:—You find, by this time, I dare say, that the government of this State has been very friendly to yours. Such persons as have been criminals, and have acted against law and society in general, and have come from your State to this, we send back to you; and others, who have only took part with Shays, we govern by our laws, so that they do not and dare not make any inroads or devastations in Massachusetts. As to the appendix to the Oracles of Reason, should you procure £18 or £20 by subscription, in ready money, it shall be published next spring.

I am, sir, with respect,

Your humble servant,

TO MAJ. TYLER.

ETHAN ALLEN.

"During the year 1788, our father remained in Boston, engaged in the practice of law, and no doubt in literary pursuits, although no productions of this date can be found. The care of the family property had been left to him, and must have occupied much of his time. An incident connected with this is among the few that can be recalled. Tyler lane or alley had, in a former generation, been opened from Ann street, through the family estate to the town dock, to be held and used by the public for that purpose only. The town authorities, having determined to close the lane, proceeded, against Mr. Tyler's protest, to move a small wooden building upon the ground. Nearly 40 years afterwards, his son, Gen'l John S. Tyler, brought a successful suit for the recovery of this land. An old man was found who remembered distinctly, that when a long line of men and boys were moving the building, by a rope attached to it, Royall Tyler stood on the boundary of this land, forbidding them moving it across the line; that he had an axe in his hand, and, as they did not stop, with one blow he cut the rope, letting those who were pulling at it go headlong, with shouts and laughter, to the ground.

At this period, the wonderful acting of Garrick and Siddons, and the success of Dr. Goldsmith and others as writers of comedy, had revived in England a taste for the drama. In our larger cities the stage was well supported; even Boston having so far overcome the prejudices of Puritanism as to fill the old Federal street Theatre, with its wit and fashion. Mr. Tyler was intimate with the managers and principal actors of this establishment, and became much interested in dramatic literature and art.

No American play had yet been produced on the regular stage, and urged by these friends, he resolved to attempt a comedy which should have the elements of success as an acting drama, and also be strictly national in plot and characters. The field was in good measure clear before him. The typical Yankee, especially now so familiar, had not yet appeared on the stage or in print.

The general plan which he adopted and which led to distinguished success, was to contrast the homely, honest plainness of our native character and breeding with the polished, tinselled hypocrisy and villany of foreign fashionable society. His dramatis personæ naturally disposed themselves in pairs: the two gentlemen and their two men-servants, the two mistresses and their two maids, etc., and each pair being in marked contrast one with the other suggested "The Contrast," as an apt title to the play.

In the preface it is said to have been undertaken and finished in three weeks. This must have been during the winter of 1788-9. The next spring, at the Park Theatre, New York, it was brought out. It took at once, with the public, and had an unprecedented run of several weeks.

That spring of '89 was a stirring one in our country's history, and New York the centre point of its greatest action.

"The Contrast; a comedy in five acts, written by a citizen of the United States, performed with applause at the theatres in New York, Philadelphia and Maryland, and published, (under an assignment of copyright,) by Thos. Wignell. Primas ego in Patriam, aonio deduxi vertice musas."

Such is the title page as printed the following year at Philadelphia. The copy before the writer is the only one he knows to be extant. It belonged to one of the original subscribers, manager of the Boston Theatre, by him given to Joseph T. Buckingham, the editor, and by him given to Gen. John S. Tyler, the present owner.

Wignell, to whom the author gave the copyright, was a comic actor of some celebrity. He sustained the character of Jonathan, both in New York and Maryland.

It has, as was then customary, a list of the subscribers. This is headed by the honored name of George Washington, President of the United States, followed by the names of most of the marked men of that epoch: Aaron Burr, H. Knox, Carroll, of Carrollton, Mifflin, President of the State of Pennsylvania, Chief Justice McKean, Att'y Edmund Randolph, Baron Steuben and others.

The prologue, said to be written by a young gentleman of New York, opens:

"Exult each patriot heart! this night is shown
A piece which we may fairly call our own!
Where the proud titles of "My Lord," "Your Grace,"

To humble "Mr" and plain "Sir," give place,
Our author pictures not from foreign climes,
The fashions, or the follies of the times;
But has confined the subject of his work
To the gay scenes, the circles of New York.

* * * * *

Should rigid critics reprobate our play,
At least the patriot heart will say:
Glorious our fall, since in a noble cause,
The bold attempt alone deserves applause."

Mr. Tyler also wrote a farce under the title of "May Day in Town," which was brought out, at the same time, as an after-piece with unusual success. He was petted, caressed, feasted and toasted, and no doubt lived too freely. After his return he rusticated with his mother again, a widow living at Jamaica Plain, and after a few visits of condolence, we learn no more of him for four or five years. Why it was we could not discover, but his spirits seemed greatly depressed. In the spring of 1790, Mr. Palmer removed from Boston onto a farm in Framingham, Mass., and during the summer Mr. Tyler called upon them there, being on a horseback journey to Vermont, where, as he informed Miss Mary, he had determined to start anew in life, leaving his mother in the care of his brother, John, and relinquishing the Boston property for her use and support.

It seems to us now rather difficult to conceive what sufficient motive could have induced Royall Tyler to leave Boston, where he had family and business connection and a wide reputation, both professional and literary, for the wilds of Vermont. There may have been matters of personal feeling, of which, in the entire absence of any letter, or other document of that date, we cannot judge, but the "new State" certainly presented peculiar attractions at this time. During the war of independence it had maintained a double contest, against Great Britain and New York. It had paid its soldiers mostly 'in kind' and had not, like other States, contracted heavy debts.

Taxes promised to be light, land was cheap and much of it good. The difficulties which had beset the territory for nearly half a century, were all removed by the act of Congress, "that on the 4th day of March, 1791, the said State of Vermont shall be received in this union as a new and entire member of the United States of America."

It had been manifest for several years that this must be the result, and there had been a large immigration, especially from Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Nor did this consist wholly of hard working farmers. Throughout the State were scattered many men of wealth, enterprise and culture, with whom Mr. Tyler was already acquainted. Wherever he attended sessions of the courts, he was welcomed, not only by able lawyers, but by a circle of wits and scholars, with whom his rare gifts of genius rendered him a universal favorite.

In the summer of 1790, Mr. Tyler visited Vermont, probably for the first time since the Shay's affair. This time he ascended the valley of the Connecticut to Windsor, where the Supreme Court was in session. In January following, he established himself in the middle of the town of Guilford, Windham County.

This township had had a singular history. Chartered in 1754, by New Hampshire, it afterwards threw off allegiance to that colony, and refusing submission to Vermont, became in effect an independent republic.

The liberty its citizens enjoyed proved so attractive to settlers, that it soon became the most populous town in the State. So it was when Mr. Tyler selected it as his residence. "Yet," says Thompson, in his Gazetteer of Vermont, "there was not a single village in the township, or rather the whole township was a village, all the hills and valleys were smoking with huts." At the centre, however, in 1791, a small hamlet with meeting-house, tavern, store and shops had sprung up. Rev. Mr. Woollage was the Congregational minister, Edward and James Houghton the merchants, with cultivated families, and here Royall Tyler established himself as the lawyer of the place.

In a small account book, he kept during this year, the first entry is Jan. 15th: from the charges it appears his practice rapidly extended through the county. He attended the courts not only of Windham, but the adjoining counties. In Bennington, during the summer, 1792, he renewed many of his former acquaintances, and after the adjournment of court, drove down into Berkshire County, Mass., to visit at Stockbridge his friend Judge Sedgewick.

Another attraction doubtless led him in this direction, and induced him to continue his journey to New Lebanon, N. Y. His steadfast friend and devoted admirer, Mary Palmer, whom, not improbably, he already hoped to make his wife, was spending the year there with a brother of her mother. She was now seventeen, and unquestionably was a very lovely and beautiful girl. It required much explanation of bygone relationships to convince the uncle and aunt of the propriety of Miss Mary's warm greeting of a fashionable gallant.

Uncle Hunt had heard of Royall Tyler, as a gay young man and author of the "Contrast," a play in which he greatly delighted, and after the visit he seldom sat down at home without bringing out a printed copy and reading from it, till his wife declared she almost knew it by heart.

Mr. Tyler returned to Guilford and attended the fall sessions of the courts. The next winter he made his promised visit to his friends, the Palmers, in Framingham, with a fine pair of black horses, which, with his accustomed facetiousness, he had named "Crock and Smut." He now acknowledged to Miss Mary, who had returned home, that since he saw her at her uncle's he had determined in his own mind that it was quite indispensable to his happiness that she should become his wife. He did not ask for any set time; he must prepare a cage before he took his bird, and he had a prospect of obtaining a house in the spring, but some time must elapse before it could be finished and furnished.

No stage lines were as yet established, and all travel was by horseback in summer and sleighing in winter.

Mr. Tyler left his affianced bride and returned to his clients in Vermont. It appears from his docket at the June term of 1793, he had 62 cases, 32 new entries. November term, 48 entries, 22 new ones. An extensive and growing practice, with a reputation for literary ability already established: gifted with remarkable powers as an orator, overflowing with wit and humor, genial and social, his acquaintance soon extended throughout the State. It is the universal testimony of his contemporaries, that no one ever acquired more rapidly the love and confidence of the people generally, or of the members of the bar.

The intercourse between the towns on the opposite sides of the Connecticut was constant and intimate, and Mr. Tyler's practice extended into New Hampshire. It chanced on one occasion about Christmas time, he was attending court at Charlestown, the Episcopal parish there was vacant, and some of the lawyers, having heard that he had written sermons for the Guilford people on one occasion of the minister's absence, he was strongly urged by bench and bar to conduct church service on the ensuing Sunday, and also on Christmas day. Both his reading of the service and the sermons were greatly admired. In narrating this incident he was wont to say, "After this I was strongly urged to turn my thoughts to the Church and prepare to take orders, being assured that I had mistaken my vocation, that it was my bounden duty to turn my talents that way, etc., and it would have been rest to my soul, at that time, had I dared, but a consciousness of having lived too gay a life in my youth, made me tremble lest I should in some way bring disgrace upon the sacred cause."

It was at Charlestown that he formed the acquaintance of Joseph Dennie, [spicy letters in correspondence between Tyler and Dennie, on 90 to 92 pages of Memoir,] who became his most intimate friend. Thomas and Carlisle had established a magazine at Walpole, which had now taken the name of "The Farmer's Weekly Museum, or the New Hampshire and Vermont Journal," on which Dennie was employed, first as contributor and afterwards as editor. The success of this periodical was unprecedented. "Dennie," says Joseph T. Buckingham in his reminiscences, "was aided in his task as editor, by Royall Tyler, then a lawyer in Guilford, Vt., who furnished all those agreeable and humorous articles, purporting to come from the shop of Messrs. Colon and Spondee. For three years succeeding this arrangement the Museum had no rival. Its circulation extended from Maine to Georgia, and it was more richly supplied with original communications of a literary character than any other paper that had then, or has since, been published in the United States." These contributions to the Museum were to Mr. Tyler a mere amusement of leisure moments, the outcome and overflow of an exuberance of wit and humor. He had however planned and was engaged upon works of a more serious import.

He had secured and furnished a house in Guilford. Twice during the summer he visited his wife and boy. (Royall Tyler and Miss Palmer were married in Framingham.) The young husband at Guilford waited anxiously for the sleighing, then indispensable for the transportation of ladies, children and baggage.

The winter proved mild, nor was it till February that Master Hampden, (Mrs. Tyler's brother, H. Palmer, a law student with Tyler,) drove "Crock and Smut" once more into the farm-yard at Framingham. All was now hurry and bustle to start for home, in horrible dread of a thaw, which might postpone Vermont house-keeping for yet another year. All went well, with bright, cool weather and capital roads, they drove the first day 30 miles, the third brought them home in the evening. They crossed the Connecticut on the ice near the site of old Fort Dummer, and stopped for supper at Squire Howe's, at Vernon. This man was a baby at the time of the massacre by the Indians, during the French war. His father was killed and the whole family carried captives to Canada. They were subsequently ransomed. [See history of Vernon, to follow. ED.] The mother, known in story as "the fair captive," who married Amos Tute, was now once more a widow, and residing with her son, the squire. She was, of course one of the celebrities of the country, and the travelers enjoyed not only a good fire and a substantial supper, but an account from the heroine's own lips of the terrible sufferings of that march through the woods to Quebec. As they made their way over the Guilford hills, Mr. Tyler described to his wife the society to which he was about to introduce her. "Open, hospitable and friendly, they have no distinction among them," he said. "If they have a social party the whole neighborhood are invited. We have two merchants, the Messrs. Houghtons, two physicians, Dr. Stevens and Dr. Hyde, one lawyer, your humble servant, all men of education, and their wives and families well-bred country people. There are several well-to-do mechanics who aim to treat company equally well. In fact, my dear, you will find it a truly primitive state of society and if you have any adequate idea of the heartlessness of the world in general, you will rejoice in the friendly simplicity of these people, among whom I have spent three or four of the happiest years of my life, and I rely upon you to continue and even to add to the high opinion they have formed of me."

Mrs. Tyler was received with open-hearted kindness by the neighbors around her first Vermont home, forming devoted friendships which continued unbroken, till one by one they have all passed away.

It will be noticed that in his comic grammar, [we refer for explanation to the correspondence with Joseph Nancreed, in Memoir,] Mr. Tyler anticipated by more than half a century, the comic histories and comic Blackstones, with which we have been surfeited during the last twenty years.

"You are a thorough grammarian, but did you ever see an amusing, sportive, entertaining grammar? Did you ever laugh over a conjunction copulative, weep over a gerund, and have all your best passions called forth by an interjection? I must tell you about this business.

In the bean pursuits of early life, it was necessary that I should teach grammar to a young lady. But the pretty Miss had contracted an aversion to everything that savored of study and science. She did not lack intellect, and to amuse her into reading was the great object. I accordingly wrote a grammar in usum puellar, and being forwarded in twelve letters, folded as billet doux, she condescended to read. To give you some idea of the work—the fundamental rules were illustrated by examples from the most approved and entertaining English authors, and sometimes by stories of my own. A lover at the feet of his mistress, gave a passionate example of interjection; a lady crowned her favored lover's virtuous wishes in the passive voice, and dismissed an unsuccessful admirer in the imperative mood. Thus every rule of syntax was associated with some pleasing anecdote, brilliant quotation, or quaint observation, which familiarized the stubborn rule to a mind open only to the amusing and pleasing; or, in the style of Fontaine, "thus the thorn of science was decorated with the roses of fancy."

Doubtless this work would need much emendation, but I believe it practicable to edit a grammar which shall be read."

The first draught, retained by Mr. Tyler, from which this copy is made, thus suddenly ends, and with it this entertaining if not important correspondence. With equal suddenness, Nancrede, either by death, or failure, (as tradition states) disappears from our view. (Nancrede was a publisher of books in Boston. As the long correspondence of Tyler with him throws considerable light upon the doings of Mr. Tyler, we regret that we cannot give it entire.) After repeated volleys of wit and argument, some more or less satisfactory adjustment of the old quarrel of author and printer would probably have been reached, between the courteous knights of the pen and of the press.

When Mr. Tyler's location in Guilford was made, it was the most populous town in the State; but already Brattleboro began to give some faint promise of becoming the business place of the county. The following letter describes the new home:

*BRATTLEBORO, March 18, 1801.

* * * * *

Here we are in quiet and complete possession of our new farm,* after a most fatiguing fortnight of moving, and to add to our fatigue, the baby and little Mary have both been very sick. The latter was so indisposed, when we removed, that it was thought to be accompanied by some risque, even by her physician; but the earnest wish of all the family, and the dread of the snow leaving us, overcame all apprehensions, and on the 3d inst. we came here bag and baggage. The children are now so far recovered as to allow us, for the first time, to hunt up our writing materials and address a line to you, who, next to ourselves, we apprehend will enter most fully into our enjoyments. If I had Sophia's tongue, or Mary's enthusiasm, I might give you a description of this farm in some measure equal to their ideas of it; but as the purchasing of a farm is entirely Mary's, and I have some fears of our success in yeomanry, I cannot write with the spirit, the subject, they suppose, merits; so you will look for the raptures and the beauties from them, while I detail you a little homespun fact. The farm we have purchased is in a retired spot, upon the brow of a large hill, about one mile, as the road goes, from the [West] Brattleboro meeting-house; though we have a shorter cut through our own grounds, which reduces the distance half. The farm consists of about 150 acres, the greatest part of which—indeed, upward of an hundred acres is well fenced and under good improvement. We have wheat and rye now in the ground, springing up as the snow leaves it, and promising a sufficiency of those grains for our bread and pies. We have two large orchards, and two smaller ones coming on, and expect to make some 50 or 60 barrels of cider; and, in a few years—as the orchards are young and thrifty—we may reasonably expect to make 100 barrels per year. We have plenty of good pasturing and expect to cut hay enough to winter 30 head of cattle. Our neighbor, Mr. Peck, takes the farm, at present, at halves, and, with his family, has removed to our farm-house, about a quarter of a mile from us.

Mrs. Peck is an excellent dairywoman, and he is a regular farmer. He has a hired man with him, and I have hired a young man, active and stout, who in busy seasons will assist Mr. Peck, so that without reckoning boys and extra help, we shall always have three stout men for farming work. With the farm, we purchased farming tools, young cattle, hogs, poultry and 23 sheep, who have now increased the flock by 8 lambs; and it would amuse you to see Sophia and the children surrounded with sheep, lambs, geese, turkeys and hens, feeding them from their hands.

The house is entirely secluded from a view of any neighbors; though on the crown of a hill it is yet in a hollow, but the necessary buildings around it give it the air of being a little neighborhood: a large barn and shed, corn-barn, chaise-house, smoke-house, ash-house, etc.

The house is somewhat similar to Judge Jones, in Hinsdale, which I think you observed, an upright part with a handsome portico, two handsome front rooms, well finished, papered and painted; and two handsome chambers over them; back, is a sitting room and by the side of it a room for my office, which has a door into the sitting-room and another out of doors, so that ingress may be had independent of the house; back of the sitting-room a good kitchen, from whence you go into two bedrooms, one for the boys, and the other for the maids, and overhead a meal granary; and over the sitting-room an apartment for our hired man and boy; back of the kitchen is a long wood-house, about 20 feet of which makes a summer wash-room, and here stands the water-trough, constantly supplied with plenty of excellent water. In front of the house is a fruit garden, peaches, plums, etc., but the former will not bear until next year.

On one side of the house is a kitchen garden, with a good asparagus bed and plenty of currants, red, white and black, and large English gooseberries, on the other side is a flower garden.

Next the house runs a small brook, on the other side of which is a grass plot set out with young fruit trees, chiefly plums. We have on the place a plenty of common cherry trees and four fine blackheart cherry trees near the front windows. We have also, pear trees and peach trees which bear, and quince bushes. On the place we may gather cartloads of chestnuts, no walnuts, but a sufficiency of butternuts. In a word, if one can love a retired farmer's life, here you may have it to perfection.

For all we live down, or rather up a lane, you will scarcely see three persons pass in as many days. We cannot see a single house, even from our chamber windows, not even our farm-house, but that is prettily situated, there you may see perhaps 30 houses, and if we climb our orchard we can see the country 30 miles around.

I think this place may be made comfortable and even pleasing, but the house can never be made to look handsome, that is, on the outside, within, to be sure, if we shut the windows, or look into the garden, it does tolerably, but the house is in a hollow, and a house in a hole cannot look well from abroad, but then it is a home and has a thousand pleasant things, fruitful fields, and delicious fruits about, thrown together higgledy, piggledy."

By this removal his ten years residence in Guilford ended. They had now four children, Royall, about six years old, John S., four, Mary, two, and Edward, an infant.

Mrs. Tyler's brother, John Hamden Palmer, had been, until now, a member of the family, but was about this time admitted to the bar and settled at Woodstock. Her youngest sister, Sophia, aged 14, had been virtually adopted as a daughter. For a year or more, John Tyler, his nephew, had been a student in his office, but had abandoned the law for what proved a very successful business in Boston. He had also, although secretly, as a student, the Rev. Mr. Wollage, whose temper he had formerly ruffled by invading his pulpit. This gentleman was admitted to practice, and afterwards oscillated once or twice between the two professions, sacred and profane.

Three new judges were appointed for the Supreme Court, October 1801, but they were not selected on account of their political opinions, but on account of their supposed qualifications for the office. Those thus elected by an adverse Legislature were Jonathan Robinson, Royall Tyler and Stephen Jacob—Robinson being the Chief Justice.

As District Attorney for Windham County, Mr. Tyler had been obliged to attend the Legislature, and had thus extended his acquaintance through the State. His practice also had taken him to the courts of nearly every county. His legal reputation and the peculiar charm of his manners no doubt led to this result.

The same judges were re-elected in the fall of 1802. The constant intercourse of a year had already induced between them a remarkable degree of intimacy and personal regard. There seems to be something in the brotherhood of the bench singularly conducive to such sentiments, and in their case there was much previous antagonism and preconceived distrust to be overcome. Jacob, indeed, had long been a friend of Judge Tyler, having often entertained him as a guest when attending courts at Windsor. With the Chief Justice, on the contrary, he had had, before they met upon the bench, but a slight acquaintance, and they were for different reasons, more or less unfavorably prepossessed in regard to each other. Mr. Tyler, probably, shared the prejudices of his friend, Gov. Tichenor. They had, moreover, belonged to the opposing political parties at a time when party spirit ran so high as to be a serious bar to social intercourse and to a just mutual appreciation. Robinson had long known of him as the writer in "The Farmer's Museum," of satirical poems, pointed epigrams and political squibs against the Republicans; but more than all this, being himself a strict religionist of the Calvinistic and Hopkintian school, he had been led to regard Mr. Tyler as a man of the world, unregenerate, and in short, "little better than one of the wicked." When brought together, however, in their present close relations, they found each other as good men often do in such cases, so far from antipathetic, that they coalesced at once, forming a friendship for life. The Chief Justice retained his office until, in 1807, he was elected to the Senate of the United States. While he was in Washington they corresponded constantly, and in one of his letters the Senator refers to their early prejudices against each other, how soon they passed away, and related an incident of the religious discussions into which they fell during their early intimacy. One of the points of Hopkinsianism that had been much debated between them, was the alleged necessity, as evidence of regeneration, that one should be willing to be lost eternally if it were for the glory of God.

Judge Tyler, detained from court on one occasion, wrote to Judge Jacob and requested him to inform the Chief Justice "that he really began to hope that he had made some little spiritual progress;³ for, although he could not honestly say that he was willing to be damned himself, even if it were needful for the glory of the Almighty, yet he believed that by great effort he had nearly or quite attained to a sincere willingness that in such an exigency Bro. Robinson should be damned."

Some two or three years after Chief Justice Robinson was elected United States Senator from Vermont, Chief Justice Tyler received from him the following letter:

"WASHINGTON, Feb. 4, 1810.

Dear Sir:—You speak well of Bro. Fay, as a judge. I had never any doubt either of his honesty, clearness of perception, legal knowledge or patience, so essential for a judge, but feared he might be too legal, in other words, might give too great weight to technical precision, although useful, yet not wholly essential in administering impartial justice to ignorant but honest suitors. But I knew you and Bro. Herrington would stand as a check. I was always pleased with you more than I ever expressed on that account, because it is a bright gem in the character of a court lawyer, not to lay too much stress on the manner of action or of pleading. When we come to be judged for our judgments, my friend, the question will not be whether we pursued legal forms or technical niceties, but have you heard the cry of the poor and relieved them from their oppressors. But I hope that the philanthropy of Bro. Fay and yourself will prevent all unpleasant results because he does not carry the Hopkinsian doctrine to that lofty pinnacle of revelation and philosophy to which you so justly and rationally aspire. In one thing, I fear, he will never be able to arrive to equal resignation, which you once expressed, even willingness to see Bro. Robinson damned. However, good men of all faiths, will, I hope, be accepted if their hearts are but right. * * * *

You need never say anything about nerve in congressmen, for they have none. That spirit of cupidity, the natural offspring of commerce, the cowardice so prevalent in weak minds, and the malice of Federalism, like the three headed monster Cerberus, are too powerful for the pure in heart to overcome.

Of war, let no man speak, for we shall have none, unless Britain invade us, and then I shall have my doubts, since the City of New York has played "God Save the King," at the approach of the Copenhagen Jackson.

Good God, can human nature possess such depravity!

Ask Bro. Fay if this is not evidence of one of the five points—the total depravity of the human heart?

Recollect me to all my friends, and as you will now be on the ground, carry my best respects to Mrs. Robinson, and do her the honor of drinking tea with her on my account, and call on Isaac* for a pipe of tobacco.

Your affectionate friend,

JONA. ROBINSON."

HON. ROYAL TYLER.

When there was a tie vote in the Senate upon the war measures, in 1812, Senator Robinson again wrote to Tyler a letter from which we give extracts:

"WASHINGTON, June 15, 1812.

Dear Bro. Tyler:—Yours of the 5th June is received, and it breathes the same spirit which my heart echoes, but alas, I fear the crown has fallen from our heads. In Denmark, in some late proceedings, I have been informed, they stood on a very important vote 16 to 16. All things were palsied. The responsibility was great. Men trembled, it was believed some person would, on the next vote, join with the Executive, and victory would be obtained, but letters arrived from one of the northern hive, that a certain great Scripture Jester would arrive on the 15th and untie the knot, of course all was delay and the fears of the administration party increased. I drop the metaphor and tell you Gen. Bradley† is expected this evening, and our fate will soon be known. We must sing the sailor's song, "God in

*Isaac Tichenor, elected Gov. in 1808.

†Hon. Stephen Rowe Bradley, Senator from Vermont.

Heaven have mercy on us," none but Him can save us now.

I can say no more. I hope in two days to tell you the fate of the nation."

Again he writes:

"Bradley did not arrive on the 15th or 16th, and on the 17th the opposition were still talking against time, but had exhausted every pretext for delay.

The Senators have been looking to the windows as the stages come in, to see if Bradley was come. All is anxiety. It is four o'clock and the Senate has not yet taken the question. I want a pipe, and I want my dinner, but I cannot start, tack or sheet, until I see, as Bro. Herrington says, "the last dog hung."

Recollect me to Mrs. Tyler, the boys and girls and to Miss Sophia. Keep this letter to yourself. I cannot continue while Gorman is murdering language in an endless speech, which sounds more discordant to my ears than the thundering cannon did 37 years ago this day, when I heard more than 200 of them in my cornfield in Bennington.

I have done.

Your friend,

JONA. ROBINSON."

TO JUDGE TYLER.

At another time came from Robinson, the following:

"No man in Congress has a doubt of my unreserved determination to foster energetic measures, and sometimes when I find of what timber we are made, I am sick of the whole species of man. But why should I wonder? I have always believed them totally depraved as well as very purblind in their mental perception. The last, however, is no further a crime than as it arises from depraved minds which are unfavorable to rational enquiry.

The question, are you in earnest, has been bandied about so much of late, that we are all sore on the subject. It was begun by the Federalists, the grumbling Democrats ask the same thing. Is the Executive in earnest? And now the question echoes back again, are the Senate in earnest; if so, why delay for ten days the appointment of Gen. Dearborn as commander when the President wants his aid to arrange the army? But Mr. Bradley does not like Dearborn, nor Giles, nor several others, and the whole Federal phalanx are against him. This is to paralyze measures and then throw the fault on the Executive.

Such is the sourness of some, and the meanness of others, that it requires more philosophy than I possess to bear it, etc."

On the outside of this letter, the worthy Senator has described his idea of the scene of its reception by their Honors, the Judges of the Supreme Court of Vermont, in these words:

"Bro. Tyler filled his pipe and said, 'Come, Brethren, let us see what Bro. Robinson has to say.' Reads. Bro. Fay spits and says, 'Bro. Robinson is as cross as the devil.' 'Well,' says Bro. Herrington, 'I feel easy about it, it is a pack for their backs, not mine.' Bro. Tyler smiled, and filled his second pipe."

In Hall's history of Eastern Vermont, we find the following narration:

"He," (R. Tyler,) "presided as side judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont, from 1801 to 1806, when he was chosen chief judge. This position he retained until the year 1812. Party strife and ill health combined were the causes which prevented him from being chosen to fill this office for a longer period. From the year 1815 to 1821, he was register of probate for Windham County, and this, it is believed, was the last public station he was called to occupy."

An idea of the originality of his style and manner in arguing a case under circumstances calculated to produce embarrassment, may be gained from the following anecdote:

"At a court held in Newfane, he undertook his first case after he left the bench. He had not practiced for a long time and many of the lawyers at the bar had never heard him address a jury.

At the period referred to, the disease of which he died, a cancer on the left side of the nose, near the eye, caused him to wear a patch of black silk on his face, which did not tend to improve his appearance. The case was one of importance, involving the property of his client, a certain Mr. Richardson.

The opposing counsel in presenting their pleas, made frequent reflections upon the ex-Chief Justice, declaring that his faculties were failing, that he had a disease about him and that he had been turned from the bench for incapacity.

During the delivery of these sentiments Judge Tyler sat within the bar, taking no notes and apparently oblivious to what was passing around him. When the time came for him to address the jury, he rose in his place, and turning his back upon the twelve men whose minds he was desirous of influencing, called out to his client, "Richardson! come here!" Richardson started up in great astonishment, and made his way through the crowded court-room to the railing within which the lawyers sat. "Richardson!" said Judge Tyler, turning to that individual, who was exceedingly surprised at the oddity of the proceedings, "go home! there is no use of your staying here! I thought you had a case, a good case!" He then went on, with his back to the jury and judge, to tell his client all the strong points of his case, making it very plain, or, at least, making it appear that Richardson had been basely abused by the lawyers on the other side.

"But," said he, in conclusion, "I was mistaken in supposing you had any rights that could be maintained. It appears you have no case because my faculties are failing, and what is worse, you have no case at all, because I have this patch on my nose. Go home! go home! I can't be expected to say a word to the jury under such circumstances." With these words Judge Tyler sat down.

The opposing counsel were dumbfounded at this mode of attack, but the jury were only out long enough to make up for Richardson a most satisfactory verdict."

Judge Dan'l Kellogg was a young law-student, at Newfane, with his brother-in-law, Gen. Martin Field, and was one of the audience in the court-room at the time of this occurrence, as related in the foregoing. In relating the affair to us, a short time previous to his death, he said, "the counsel opposing Tyler, undertook to make it appear the case never would have been brought into the court by Mr. Tyler had it been presented to him before the decay of his faculties, but now, in his pitiable dilapidated condition of body and mind, anything he might do was excusable, provided justice to the parties was maintained. Never," said Judge Kellogg, "in all my long experience in court, did I witness so laughable an affair, and one so difficult to properly describe, or in other words, make one see it as I did."

About 52 years have elapsed since the death of Hon. R. Tyler, he being at that time about 68 years of age, according to inscription upon his monument in Prospect Hill Cemetery, in the East village of Brattleboro.

He had eleven children:

Royall Tyler, born in Framingham, Mass., 1794, died in college, young; Gen. John S., born in Guilford, Vt., Sept. 29, 1796, from the age of 14 lived in Boston, Mass., and was in mercantile life; Mary Whitwell, born in Guilford, Vt., June 23, 1798; Rev. Edward R., born in Guilford, Vt., Aug. 3, 1800, of the Congregational Church and Editor of "New Englander," also author of works on future punishment; William Clark, born in Brattleboro, Aug. 28, 1802, passed a mercantile life in Boston; Rev. Joseph Dennie, born in Brattleboro, Sept. 4, 1804, of the Episcopal Church, and Principal of Asylum for Deaf Mutes, in Va.; Amelia Sophia, born in Brattleboro, June 29, 1807, Principal of Female Seminary in 1826; Rev. Geo. Palmer, D. D., born in Brattleboro, Dec. 10, 1809, of the Congregational Church; Judge Royall, 2nd, born in Brattleboro, April 19, 1812, Judge of Probate and County Clerk; Rev. Thomas Pickman, D. D., born in Brattleboro, Nov. 20, 1815, of the Episcopal Church; Abiel Winship, born in Brattleboro, Nov. 9, 1818, died, 1832.

But four of the children are now (1878,) living, viz: Wm. C. Tyler, Judge Royall Tyler, Geo. P. Tyler, Thos. Pickman Tyler.

In the foregoing are made the last extracts from the memoirs, with regret that our limits forbid more extended quotations.

It was not the mission of this old and distinguished family to set in motion the wheels of industry, or to, in any way directly, to any great extent, advance the material interests of this town. In that far off time, in our history, when this family settled here, they must have occupied as exceptional a position in Brattleboro, as does the book of Job in the Old Testament.

So large a family of almost purely intellectual proclivities, furnishing six colleges, four of them ministers of the Gospel, is, we believe, rarely, if ever, found in the past or present history of any town in New England.

As there is no end to the good arising from the cultivation of the highest department of our nature, the beneficial influence of such a family, upon a community almost wholly utilitarian, it is impossible to fully estimate. Their first coming to that high hill overlooking the whole town, seems to us as the morning dawn of intellectual life in this region, or, the beginning of an Elizabethan age in Brattleboro.

It was also the dawn of business in this town. "It is indeed wonderful how imagination rules the world. The poems of a blind old harper, a few crumbling ruins, a few mutilated, battered statues, a few cracked fading canvasses, a few strains of music, and the traditions of a few eloquent words of orators, have proved the most potent forces in the world's civilization."

Before the first year of their advent here had expired, our first educational institution, the old academy, was chartered by act of the Legislature, in October 1801.

Soon thereafter followed in this town the publication of school books, Bibles, etc., which were here and there widely scattered over the land like leaves of the forest, which no man can number.

"Terrible Tractation," "Democracy Unveiled," by Thomas G. Fessenden, and several of the old novels, now seldom seen, were also published here. To this business the East Village owes its origin, and during the whole period of Mr. Tyler's life in Brattleboro it was the business of the place, and in one year publications amounted to $400,000.

The publication of books did not cease until the art was carried to so great perfection, cotton rags and sheep-skin in the morning became, before night, elegantly finished books. William Harris, Esq., who was the principal of the old academy over 30 years, gave us the names of over 40 colleges—including the names of the sons of Judge Tyler—who fitted for college at the old academy. It is a matter of regret that we cannot give full historical sketches of each one of the latter, who have finished their mission on fields more or less distant from their native home. Though our knowledge of each individual career is far from complete, yet, we believe, that the histories of none of the sons of Brattleboro who have gone out from among us would reflect a fairer light on our pages than would the histories of the sons of Judge, Tyler.

GEN'L JOHN S. TYLER,

The oldest son, may well be called the advanced guard of the family. He left his home in Brattleboro in 1810, at the age of 14 years, and passed the long period of over 60 years in Boston, Mass., engaged in mercantile and marine affairs. The city of his ancestry became the scene of his action until the time of his death in 1876. It was there he maintained eminence in his avocations and social position. His magnanimity, as manifested in business relations, and noble generosity to his parents and other relatives, proves his mind was as well worthy of his splendid proportions and such external personal attractions as is rarely, if ever surpassed,—as the diamond is worthy of setting in the purest gold. Forty years ago he was deservedly popular and conspicuous as a commander of the military in Boston.

"How long he has been a citizen of Boston, we do not presume to know; what we do know is, that far back in the lapse of years, when he was General and we were schoolboys, we thought him the greatest man the city contained. And there are, no doubt, hundreds who will read these lines who remember Gen. Tyler, at the head of his brigade, as the finest mannered officer their imagination ever drew. His last service as an officer was that of commander of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, in 1860."—Boston Paper.

He gave universal satisfaction in conducting and in the general management of military and civic processions in the city on great occasions. For a long period of years he was almost invariably selected as chief marshal on great occasions. The facility with which he discharged the duties of that office, combined with his fine personal presence and bearing, made him the observed of all observers. Many years ago, a convent in Charlestown was destroyed by a mob, and there was every indication of mob-violence in the destruction of buildings in Boston as a retaliatory measure. The authorities of the city requested Gen'l Tyler to call out the military under his command. He told the authorities he never should order his soldiers to fire blank cartridges at a mob. If they would consent that every one of his soldiers load his musket with ball cartridge, he would lead them wherever they might direct. The consent was given, and intelligence of the fact was quickly received by every person in the city. All rioters knew that such orders meant business, and it was not a kind of business they felt disposed to encourage. Therefore the mob dispersed and peace was restored without bloodshed.

In Boston papers, published at the time of his death, it was said: "Early in the war of 1812, Mr. Tyler, though under the lawful age for military duty, joined the Boston Light Infantry, and went with the corps to throw up fortifications on Dorchester heights, Governor's and Noddle's islands, and also participated in such other duties as were required of the militia. He was chosen captain of the Suffolk Light Infantry, Sept. 21, 1821, and was the first commander of the City Guards. He commanded the military escort when LaFayette visited Boston. He was adjutant of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company in 1827, and was its commander 4 years—an honor not enjoyed by any other man. He was the senior member at the date of his death. He acted as chief marshal at the Railroad Jubilee, (1851.) attended by the President of the United States, Lord Elgin, and numerous other distinguished guests. The gentlemen who served with him as assistant marshals, on the latter occasion, presented him with a beautiful silver vase and salver, inscribed with the names of many of the leading merchants and professional men of Boston, who were donors, and bearing an engraved likeness of the distinguished defender of the constitution. He has held many civil offices, was a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1853; member of the Common Council in 1859-60-62; alderman, 1863-65-66; Trustee of the Public Library 2 years, and member of the Legislature 4 years. He was president of the Granite Railway Company, engineer of the fire department of Boston, president of the Association of the Sons of Vermont, and of the Burns Club; also, president of the Female Medical College. He received the honorary degree of A. M. from both Middlebury College and the University of his native State at Burlington.

We find several interesting notices of him, in Boston papers, since his death, Jan. 20, 1876:

"No particular disease caused his death, but he yielded to the natural dissolution of advanced years. Few men have been more prominently before the public, and none enjoyed the esteem of a wider circle of friends. The older class of our citizens he knew by long association, and the younger were attracted to him by his kindness of manner. Increasing age did not diminish his interest in passing events, and though advanced in years, he kept, as it were, the freshness of youth."—Boston Journal, 1876

In 1829, he engaged in the business of adjusting averages,* which he continued the remainder of his life. In this branch he had no superior. His industry was proverbial. He devoted much valuable time to the service of the public, and the midnight hour often found him at work. His business mind enabled him to state cases before committees, and as alderman and representative, with great clearness.

At the time he was elected alderman of the 8th ward, we find the following in a Boston paper:

"He will make an excellent alderman, for he is honest and incorruptible—merits which are not always carried into the city hall by those who enter it covered with official velut. The people have done well to elect him. He received the united support of the Democrats and Republicans."

Gen'l Tyler was for many years identi-

"He brought to the discharge of this duty that clearness of perception, candor and fairness of judgment which made him much sought for in the large commercial cities of our country.—EX-GOV. HOLBROOK.

fied with the institution of masonry. He took his degrees in St. John's Lodge, received the Chapter degrees in St. Paul's Chapter, and was an active member of the De Molay Commandery of Knights Templar. In politics, the General was an old line Whig, but early in its history he identified himself with the Republican party.

Gen'l Tyler was the possessor of a happy disposition, and he looked upon the bright side of the shield. He sought the happiness of his family and promoted the geniality of his favored circle. He grew old gradually. It was a pleasure to see how his calm philosophy enabled him to meet without friction the burdens of advancing age.

The Boston Transcript of January, 1876, says of him:

"He was a true friend, an affectionate husband, a doting father, a loving grandparent, and a true man in every sense. It is a comfort that in his last brief illness, he was spared the anguish of parting with his loved ones, and that, like an innocent child, his last sleep was peaceful and calm. At the funeral services of the late Major Gen'l John S. Tyler, there was a very large attendance of friends and acquaintances of the deceased, De Molay Commandery of Knights Templars, the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, the Boston Light Infantry Association and other organizations with which he was connected, were represented. At the head of the casket, in which he was enclosed, was displayed a bust of the General, recently executed by Miss Frazar of Watertown. The services were under the management of Mr. F. Lyman Winship, and were conducted by Rev. Dr. Bartol of the West church, and the choir of the same church furnished the music. At the close the remains were conveyed to Mount Auburn."

when at college or seminary fitting for professional life, visited, in times of vacation, his native home at Brattleboro. His evening lectures, at such times, in the school-house then on the common, caused many of our best citizens pleasurable anticipations of his periodical visits. Though too young, at the time, to be an appreciative listener to his lectures, yet we well remember hearing highly favorable comments upon his youthful efforts, by Dea. David Wood, Francis Goodhue, Esq., and other of our old citizens of that time, who have long since passed away. It has been a pleasure, in after years, to hear him in the pulpit and in the lecture-room, and we are compelled to add our testimony to that of others who have said he was very far above the average of our pulpit orators. He had a loud, clear, commanding voice, and a very earnest, impressive manner. The ideas he advanced, or the position he took never suffered for lack of logic or authority in maintenance of the same.

There was manifested in this man's character a spirit of self-sacrifice for others. Eloquently did he plead the cause of the slave at that early period,* when to do so was to render the advocate a pariah in his own church, "and a man's foes they of his own household." Even in his native place—we blush to say it—the leading citizens encouraged a mob to disturb his lectures, and the Congregational pastor of that period (1837) refused to read, in his pulpit, a notice of these lectures, or even a notification of a "prayer meeting for the oppressed." Some persons can now (1878) remember hearing the calm voice of Dea. David Wood, "there will be a meeting of prayer for the oppressed at Elliot street chapel." &c. It was well understood at the time why the Deacon, instead of the minister, read the notification. The reverend gentleman also recommended the church discipline, or expulsion, of such members of his church who attended said lectures. Our information is from such members now living (1878). The Deacon did not read the notification until after the pastor had finished his benediction. The pastor, before long, became a good anti-slavery man.

From a New Haven paper of September, 1848:

"Died, in this city, yesterday, Sept. 28, 1848, very suddenly, Rev. Edward R. Tyler, editor of the New Englander, aged 48. Thus another true and able friend of God and man has gone to his rest and his reward. Mr. Tyler was born in Brattleboro, Vt., the son of Hon. Royall Tyler, who was chief justice of the State of Vermont.

*Summer of 1837.

He graduated at Yale College, with honor, in the class of 1825. He pursued theological study chiefly at Andover, and for many years, with ability and usefulness, filled the office of Congregationalist pastor; first in Middletown and afterwards in Colebrook, Ct. He was, for a few years, editor of the Congregational Observer, a weekly religious journal published at Hartford, and since January, 1843, he has been editor and proprietor of the New Englander, which, in conjunction with other gentlemen, he originated and established. Mr. Tyler had a sound, clear and discriminating mind, and excelled in the department of moral and theological science. He was remarkably liberal and catholic, though decidedly evangelical, in his views. He was a true friend of his race, and his mind, hand and heart were ever free and open to the claims of every philanthropic principle and enterprise. And in his private relations, he was, in a rare degree, modest, unselfish and amiable," &c.

REV. JOSEPH D. TYLER

was a clergyman of the Episcopal church, but never officiated in that office to any great extent, for he early became interested in the instruction of the deaf and dumb, and was a teacher in the first institution for that purpose in this country; the buildings erected in Hartford, Ct. After several years service in Hartford, he was, in 1840, chosen principal of the Virginia deaf and dumb asylum, in Staunton, Va., where he died Jan. 28, 1852. Wide as is the manifest difference in the Tyler brothers as to tastes, avocations, religious views—as Episcopalians, Unitarians and Congregationalists—there is, in the most desirable features of humanity, a beautiful harmony in their characters. If Joseph D. Tyler deserved censure for anything, it was his excessive modesty, or lack of a proper appreciation of himself. The testimony of those who have been associated with him during the last 12 years of his life, is of more value than anything we can say:

From a Virginia paper of January, 1852:

"When we referred yesterday to the Virginia Institute for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, we little supposed that we should be called upon in to-day's paper to record the death of the accomplished principal of the former department, the Rev. J. D. Tyler, through whose eminent qualifications, peculiar aptness for his post, and untiring energy, this benevolent institution has acquired its present efficiency and exalted position. The loss of Mr. Tyler to the sphere of benevolence which he so nobly filled, to the community in which he lived, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to supply. The writer knew him well, and a nobler specimen of a Christian gentleman, he never has known. He was beyond all question one of the rarest and ripest scholars of our country, and one of the most vigorous and polished writers of the present day. His essays in the leading Reviews of the United States (though his shrinking modesty prevented him from accompanying them by his own name) have been pronounced among the most powerful and beautiful contributions to American literature. His official duties rarely permitted him to preach, except in the language of signs to his deaf mute congregation; but such sermons as we have heard from him were masterpieces, models, and unsurpassed in strength of thought, purity of style, and solid learning, by anything which we have heard or read out of the pages of old English divines.

This man, with powers which would have graced the most conspicuous arena of cultivated intellect in our whole country, was not only content, but joyful to pass his days in the comparatively obscure and humble position of teacher of the deaf and dumb, and devoted to that field of usefulness all the energies of an intellect, which, devoted to another sphere, would have achieved untold fame and wealth for its possessor. Mr. Tyler was a person of real and substantial excellence of character. There was about him no humbug, no cant; none of that pharisaical austerity of demeanor which atones for sins by frowning upon innocent pleasures. A traveling correspondent of the Charleston Literary Gazette remarked, in a letter from Staunton, that he 'had never seen a face so strikingly stamped with the impress of benevolence.' The face was a faithful index of the heart and life,—the noble and unambitious heart which now sleeps so quietly—the life whose record is written in golden letters on high. When we ponder on the character of such a man, we cannot grieve that he has passed away, save for those he leaves behind—for surely there must be in another world some peculiar reward for those great intellects which are content to labor on, almost unknown and unappreciated here, so that they can minister to the happiness and elevation of their fellow-men."

When the expiring breath of a son of Brattleboro, from his distant field of action, wafts to our ears reports like the foregoing, we cannot too highly estimate the privilege of giving his record here. To us, the very soil where was first left the impress of his infant feet, is more sacred. We see the same old trees, and hear the same voices of nature, and her silent teachings, as greeted his earliest consciousness, yet "the latchet of his shoes we are unworthy to unloose." To great heights of moral excellence we may never hope to attain, but we can, at least, love the virtues which we cannot claim. The following beautiful ideal, as expressed in verse, by Rev. Jos. D. Tyler, will, we believe, strike a chord in every bosom for "Who hath not lost a friend?" The more we read it, the more distinctly appears to us the fine, spiritual nature of the author—that spirit only staying in its outward or coarser garb from the necessity of circumstances:

BY J. D. TYLER.

"From the silence of the Scriptures respecting the creation of these spiritual intelligences, and from the remarkable language of the following passages. (Rev. 22, 8, 21, 7,) some have inferred that the whole angelic order is, in fact, composed of the spirits of glorified men."—Bush's Notes on Genesis.

"My father! glides thy spirit near,
From happier mansions come,
To guard the home you lov'd while here,
In airy angel form!

My brother! eldest, earliest dead,
With pale and thoughtful brow,
O'er which bright rays of genius play'd,
Still bends it near me now!

And thou the lov'd, the latest born,
My meek, my gentle brother,
Comes thy glad form in fondness down,
A ministering spirit thither!

Hovers thy radiant spirit here,
My boy, my blessed son,

In angel brightness lingering near
Thy transient earthly home?

Come ye to smooth the couch of pain,
To soothe the aching head,
To cheer the hearts ye loved, again,
Though numbered with the dead?

Come ye to calm the troubled breast,
To guide the erring feet,
To lure along to that sweet rest,
Where happy spirits meet?

We greet you here, each blessed one,
Along our toilsome way,
Till perils o'er and labors done,
We meet in endless day!"

INTERESTING FACT.

"The Rev. J. D. Tyler, Principal of the Deaf Mute Department of the Virginia Institute, states, in his last interesting report, that our own country is the only one in which the question whether the children of deaf mutes are themselves apt to be deaf, has approached solution. Two hundred educated deaf mutes assembled in Hartford, Ct., Sept. 25, 1850, of these 103 were married, some quite recently, and 72 were parents,—the parents of 102 children, of whom 98 can hear and speak. Instances are given of parents, both deaf from birth, having children able to hear and speak. An instance," says Mr. Tyler, "exists in our own institution, in the case of an instructor and his amiable wife, both deaf from birth, but their two bright little boys have all their senses in perfection. So that the apprehension in question is not sufficient ground for denying to deaf mutes the chief earthly happiness, the school and exercise of virtue—the state which preserves nations, fills cities and churches, and heaven itself."

As we have proceeded, our inability becomes more and more apparent to do anything like justice to the Tyler family, under present circumstances. Our first intention was simply to give a few facts in regard to the head of the family, sufficient, if possible, to create an interest in the memoir, to which we have referred, as would cause its publication. Since our attention has been directed to the sons of Judge Tyler who have passed away, we have often been reminded—as we have discovered so much respecting them worthy of high commendation—of a work by Disraeli upon "The Curiosities of Literature." This work we have not seen since 1842, but we remember he gives a reason why the children of great or talented men are almost invariably inferior to their progenitor. The mental qualities of the children depend upon their mother, and more certainly is this so with the sons. Great men rarely use their greatness, or better judgment, when selecting a wife, but are governed by taste or fancy. Our memory of the long vanished years is rarely more happily exercised than when it brings before us the beautiful, the talented, the highly cultured and faithful mother of this distinguished family. When we think of her virtues and sterling character, we wonder not that of so many of her children she could say, as did the Roman matron, "These are my jewels."

We quote the following from an obituary notice of her death, in the Vermont Phoenix:

"While aiding greatly, through the benign influence of high natural endowments, and all the graces of her sex, in sustaining and encouraging her husband in his progress to the Supreme Bench as Chief Justice of Vermont, she contributed much towards imparting a tone of elevation and refinement, and an ambition for literary pursuits, to the new and unformed society around her. In those early times, she was a light and centre to society, giving warmth and enjoyment to all who came within her sphere. She was beloved and respected, a bond of union, a centre of mingled love and authority to the early settlers, as she has ever been since, down to her latest day, to a large family of adoring children and descendants, amidst whose kindly administrations it was her happiness to expire. Devoted to everything that was calculated to elevate, refine and adorn humanity, she ever took a deep interest in the welfare of the country. Her infant eyes were opened, as we have already said, upon the dramatic scenes of the Revolution; and, in the closing years of her life, she watched with the liveliest solicitude and concern every stage in the progress of the rebellion, until she saw the last rebel force defeated and disarmed. Amidst all, she received home a corpse of a grandson, a young colonel, who fell in the battle of the Wilderness, and saw his remains sent to the grave." [See Military History of Brattleboro, sketch of Lt. John S. Tyler.] Mrs. Tyler died in 1866, aged 91 years, 7 months and 7 days.

Mrs. Tyler was the author of "The Maternal Physician," a work published by Riley of New York, in 1811. This work was recommended by the best physicians of the time. The author's name was refused by herself. The work contained many passages of marked literary merit.

In the family of Judge Tyler there were two daughters,

MARY WHITWELL TYLER AND AMELIA
SOPHIA TYLER.

They both lived until past three-score and ten years. Their sphere of action, and in almost everything, they were widely different, yet were they both highly esteemed and beloved, because they were each, in their way, public benefactors.

Miss Mary was, in her earlier years, a natural kindergartener. Over half a century ago, she had as much, if not more, influence over a large portion of the children in this village than their own parents. She was a member of the Episcopal church, but at this time there was no organization of her faith in this place, yet there was no part of this village she did not frequent to gather the children for the Sunday school and meeting, in the old church on the common. If new clothing for the destitute children was wanting, she contrived some way to get it for them. If any poor family was in want, or destitution, or in suffering of any kind, she would interest some benevolent friend in their behalf, so that relief came. Her affection for the little ones, rich or poor, was unbounded. Among our earliest, pleasantest recollections of infantile and juvenile days, is the kindly, happy face of "Aunt Mary," when she was telling a dozen or more of us interesting stories. She would always give an intelligent reply, to the little eager questioners, in language adapted to their comprehension. Parents freely gave their children permission to go on expeditions, in large or small companies, to the woods or fields, no matter where, if they only knew she was going with them. We all knew she was our friend. She was our oracle and sure defence against "bears and codgers."

In the summer of 1821, the inhabitants of the village were aroused to search after two little boys, one of them nearly 6 and the other nearly 5 years old, who had been sent to school, but did not appear in the schoolroom. Vainly did people look through the woods, in every direction, for the missing ones. As twilight was giving way to darkness, "Aunt Mary" appeared leading the two little truants, one of them a D. D. in embryo, and the other a Yankee genius—of the jack knife order—in the bud. The seat of learning, at this period, was at the West village. The two little boys must have been remarkable for their precocity and high aspirations. They had heard of the far-famed academy flourishing somewhere in the region of the setting sun, and had concluded it was just the place for advanced young gentlemen, like themselves, who had outgrown the limited educational facilities afforded in the one school-house of the village.

The little wanderers took the right direction to this goal of their ambition, until they arrived near the western limit of the grounds of Prof. Charlier, when down that steep bank they went, stripped off their clothing, and jumped into the Whetstone brook. They, for the first time, learned it was a more easy thing to take off their clothing than to put on the same. Also, did they find, that it is a much easier thing to go down such a steep pitch than to go up the same. "Aunt Mary" heard their cries of despair, in their vain efforts to replace their clothing. Think of the joy of the besieged in Lucknow, when they heard the distant slogan herald the approach of Havelock, and we can get an idea of the joy experienced by these little ones when they heard a voice which they loved so well. How many little wanderers she may have conducted, or given an impetus, into the right path, which leads to home and happiness, on this side of the river, we may not know.

The present generation have only seen her in life's decline, as with faded eye, shaking frame and feeble, tottering step, she slowly passed away,—

"Her labor done, securely laid
In this her last retreat."

was the principal of a female seminary of a high order, sometime before 1830. Young ladies received instruction from her in the higher English studies, and languages. Music upon the piano forte was also taught by Prof. Hughes of Boston, and we believe her school may be said to be the first one in Brattleboro where such instruction was given. Her school received frequent accessions from outside the town, and also from outside the State. A lady from Connecticut, who attended her school one summer, we heard remark as follows:

"Miss Amelia S. Tyler is the most perfect lady I ever met, and she made use of so choice and perfectly grammatical language in conversation, whether in the schoolroom or out of it, it was one great pleasure of my life to hear her voice."

In the later years of her life, she gave instruction principally to the sons of her brothers, and after they passed on to college, or elsewhere, she gave her attention to teaching boys, up to the last week of her life. It is the universal testimony of all those who had the opportunity of judging, that she performed her duties in the most creditable, faithful manner. And they were duties of a character such as she was eminently fitted by nature and cultivation to perform. As a member of the Episcopal church, she was decided in her convictions, and she had no lack of reasons to give for her decision upon this or any other matter. She died Feb. 28, 1878, aged 71.

Extract from the Vermont Phoenix:

"A life so full as hers has been of every patient and loving sacrifice is rare indeed, but when coupled with the high intellectual qualities and Christian virtues which lent such a charm and dignity to Miss Tyler's character, it becomes, after it is ended, a subject over which one lingers with tender admiration. And to the young what a lesson of unselfish devotion it furnishes. Many of our middle-aged and older ladies remember, with grateful affection, the careful instruction they received at her hands, when her school for young ladies was in existence, while in more recent years, and up to the time of her death, the old Tyler homestead has been a school for boys, in the management and instruction of which Miss Tyler possessed rare skill and tact, combined with an unvarying motherly love."

FESSENDEN BROTHERS IN BRATTLEBORO.

William Fessenden, the pioneer business man of Brattleboro, East village, was son of Rev. Thomas K. Fessenden of Walpole, N. H. He was born at the residence of his father, in Walpole, in 1779, and came here soon after learning the trade of printer, in his native town, where he served his time with Messrs. Thomas & Carlyle. He came to this village about 1803. He was married to Miss Patty Holbrook, daughter of Dea. John Holbrook, Oct. 9, 1807, who was left a widow in 1815, with four children; and she seemed to have a charmed life. Time withered the faces of her cotemporaries and covered them up in darkness forever, while her face, at four-score years, had the smoothness and bloom of youth. Though all her life one of the most attractive, substantial and beautiful women in Brattleboro, no earthly influence, no second love, could swerve her devotion from the memory of the early loved and lost. The character and magnitude of her loss, as well as the loss to the community of that day, the traditions and records of the past inform us.

This was a village of scarce a dozen dwellings, when Mr. Fessenden commenced publishing here a newspaper, called The Reporter, in 1804. Fresh from his apprenticeship, with no capital, but a mind fertile in resources, and active hands to execute his designs, he bravely labored under great disadvantages. Often did he make a journey on horseback, to some distant paper-mill, and return with just sufficient paper bound upon the back of the horse, to issue the Reporter one week. While he was engaged in this enterprise, Anthony Haswell was trying to establish at Bennington the publication of Webster's spelling book. Mr. Haswell did not succeed, and his effects were sold. Mr. Fessenden, in some way, came into possession of the plates and fixtures for the spelling-book. Under his economical, sagacious management the publication of this work caused the land, once called "Governor's Farm," to assume a very different appearance. Houses sprang up rapidly, and the population very soon doubled. Never before was it more fully demonstrated that success in any enterprise depends more upon the character of the man engaged in it, than upon the character of the business.

Between 60 and 70 years have passed away since Mr. Fessenden, accompanied by his wife and infant, was returning to Brattleboro from a visit to his friends at Hartford, Ct. While riding in a sleigh, some miles from any habitation, Mr. Fessenden was suddenly seized with an apoplectic attack. Mrs. Fessenden, with a child in her arms, and a dying husband at her side, drove to Mr. Pomroy's inn at Southampton, Mass. It was here our early public benefactor soon breathed his last. It was not only that he was a man of great business sagacity, and thereby benefiting himself and others, that he was highly esteemed in this place, but it was his integrity, benevolence, moral excellence and social virtues that won all hearts. Only 36 years of age at his death, and only about 12 years a resident of this place, was certainly a short time to obtain such a hold upon the affections of everybody. But a character like his, diffusing light, hope and joy, is not of slow growth. It is when that light goes out—a darkness comes so thick it can be felt by all. Venerable men, who attended the funeral services of Mr. Fessenden, have told us, that never before or since that time, has the death of any person caused so universal sorrow in this place. All business of the place was suspended, and when the head of the procession arrived at Prospect Hill Cemetery, the rear rested on Main street, opposite the entrance to Elliot street.

The following extract is taken from the village paper of January, 1815:

"Rarely does it occur that a person who had so much to do with mankind in the common concerns of life, so universally obtained their good will; no man was his enemy, no one spoke of him but in his praise. He was at the head of a widely extended establishment, that he had himself created, which gave employment and bread to a large number of families and individuals in this village, where his early death will be long felt and deeply regretted. Cut off in the prime life and in the midst of his usefulness, his decease has created a void which we almost despair of seeing again occupied. He was amiable in private and useful in public life; a most affectionate husband, a fond parent, a dutiful son, an affectionate brother and a steady friend; open-hearted and generous, he had nothing selfish in his nature, and apparently lived more for others than for himself."

His eldest daughter, a lady of uncommon brilliancy and personal attractions, married Hon. Elisia Allen. At the time of this marriage, we think about 1828, Mr. Allen was a young lawyer in this village, just admitted to practice. He was afterwards a distinguished member of Congress from Maine, and received some foreign appointment from the Harrison and Tyler administration. We learn he is now (1870) and has been for many years, minister of finance for the Sandwich Islands.

JOSEPH, JOHN, AND THOMAS GREEN

worthy brothers of the subject of the foregoing sketch, have also lived in this place.

JOSEPH,

after the death of his brother William, became associated with his father-in-law, Dea. John Holbrook, in the publishing business and the manufacture of paper. He owned and occupied, at the time of his decease, the estate afterwards purchased for the Vermont Asylum for the Insane, and is now covered by their extensive buildings. Before Mr. Fessenden bought this place, it was owned and occupied by Mrs. Boott, who afterwards became Mrs. Lee. It was a noted place in her time, and some persons, whose "days are now in the yellow leaf," remember with pleasure their joyful festivities and youthful gatherings at the grand old home of Mrs. Boott.

Possession of this place by Mr. Joseph Fessenden was followed by additional attractions to the surroundings. His wife was a great admirer of flowers, and she caused the introduction of plants, trees and flowers never seen before in this town. Her flower garden was at one time the pride of the village, and very few residents here would omit, in summer time, to direct their visitors or friends from abroad to this charming spot. All we could see of the smiles of nature or charms of art were but outward representations or fitting emblems of the presiding genius that reigned within. It was a sympathy with humanity, manifested in action as well as in sentiment, that was the most prominent feature in the characters of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Fessenden. Ripening for the better land with seeming unconsciousness, weeping with those who wept, and rejoicing with those who did rejoice.

At a society meeting of the Congregational church, of which Mr. F. was a prominent member, he was suddenly stricken with apoplexy, and died in Sept., 1834, aged 57 years. His widow, possessing very nearly the same characteristics as her husband, survived this event but a few months, when she passed away Jan. 28, 1835, and very soon after, her garden of beautiful flowers disappeared. Their children were Franklin H., Thomas K., William, Jane, Elizabeth and Mary.

GEN'L FRANKLIN H. FESSENDEN,

the eldest son, received his commission as Brig.-General in 1834. He was one of the partners in the publishing house at the time a re-organization was effected, in 1836, and the business assumed by the "Brattleboro Typographic Company." He married Henrietta, eldest daughter of Maj. Henry Smith. Their eldest son, Frederick H. Fessenden, was killed while fighting for the Union in the late civil war.

Gen'l Fessenden was a valuable member of society, highly esteemed for his many noble qualities, and died in Brattleboro, much lamented, in 1862, aged 51 years.

obtained a collegiate education and fitted for the ministry. For many years he has been a faithful pastor of the Congregational church in New York State and Connecticut.

In the summer of 1826, William, son of Joseph, a promising lad of 6 years, was drowned in the Connecticut river, opposite the village. His body, and that of another lad, Andrew Jackson Shattuck, drowned at the same time and place, was taken from the water by some members of a circus troupe, at that time near the river making preparations for their exhibition.

In 1836, Elizabeth, noted for personal beauty, healthy appearance, and superior mental qualities, died with consumption, aged 18 years.

THOMAS GREEN FESSENDEN,

author of "Democracy Unveiled," and "Terrible Tractoration," was the eldest son of this gifted family. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1796, and soon after removed to Rutland, Vt., where he studied law with Nathaniel Chipman, Esq., and afterwards, if we are not misinformed, was connected in business with Mr. Chipman.

During this period, as well as during his residence at college, Mr. Fessenden contributed articles from his pen for The Eagle, a newspaper of Dartmouth, and the Farmer's Weekly Museum, a well known classic paper of Walpole, N. H. His extreme diffidence produced almost a religious scruple against allowing his name to be attached to any of his productions. Therefore it has not been generally known to whom the public has been indebted for several patriotic songs, and other very humorous pieces of his composition, which have had general circulation and admiration through the country. Like most persons who have ever done anything worthy of note, he passed through the refining furnace.

In 1801,* Mr. Fessenden embarked for London, where he engaged in the construction of a mill, or some kind of machinery, to be operated by the water of the Thames. Several men of rank and influence, among whom was the then Lord Mayor of London, being patrons of the undertaking, and other circumstances holding out a reasonable prospect of great success, Mr. Fessenden ventured on a purchase of one-fifth of the concern; but, being deserted by his associates, before there was sufficient time to give the mill a fair experiment, the whole burden fell upon his shoulders. To use his own expression, in describing the character of his associates, "they were guilty of everything but common sense and common honesty."

Far from home, with limited means and among strangers, amidst vexatious embarrassments and distracting cares with which this engagement constantly harassed him, he undertook, and within the term of four weeks, a part of which was under the influence of severe sickness, which confined him to his bed, executed the first edition of "Terrible Tractoration." This work received high compliments from the English press, and was favorably compared with "Butler's Hudibras." The first American, from the second London edition, was published here in 1804.

How long Mr. Fessenden made Brattleboro his home, we are not able to state; but he was living here in 1816, and was editor of The Reporter for some time after the death of his brother William. After leaving this place, he became extensively known as editor of the New England Farmer, published in Boston, Mass. For many years we saw for sale "Thomas Green Fessenden's Almanac." Before the almanac became a medium for medical advertisements, this work by Mr. Fessenden had an extensive sale. Some 35 years have elapsed since his life closed in the same, apparently, painless and sudden manner as did the lives of his brothers.

JOHN FESSENDEN.

Travelers often look back upon the landscape they have passed over to discover beauties they could never realize or appreciate when too near the vision. As we regretfully look back upon the misused hours, so thickly scattered on that half-century road we have passed over, the memory of "Uncle John," as all made free to call the kind-hearted bachelor, comes to us with the reviving influences of youth and a pleasant Sunday morning in that season of the year when Brattleboro is the abode of fairies. As leader of the choir, we invariably saw him at his post in that old semi-circular gallery of the church, then on the common. Clad in costume, a la Daniel Webster, blue coat, gilt buttons and buff vest, he gave a dignity to that office we have never seen surpassed.

No narrow bounds, no gloomy, dim religious light encircled the form or soul of "Uncle John." His generous heart expanded in the broad, clear, healthy sunlight of Heaven, coming in freely, as it did, unobstructed by the evil devices of modern fashion, into the most properly located church building the people of this village ever saw. With eyes occasionally gazing upward, seemingly, wafting to some distant sphere, wrapped in a sweet tenor voice, his sentiments, aspirations, or devotions, he became a sort of standpoint to us, where has gathered around many and varied recollections.

The form and features of the first minister ordained in the town comes before us. We again hear, in his emphatic tones, "There will be a meeting for prayer, at the school-house, near the residence of Mr. Jesse French, this evening, at half-past 6 o'clock." That "perfect likeness" of his satanic majesty, on the first page of our catechism, looms up again. Navarino bonnets, nearly as large as an umbrella, pass through the broad aisle. The warm sun exhales the perfume of cologne, Day & Martin's sponge blacking, new "Nankeens" and the roses of June, while we listen to the prayers of saints, the songs of birds, the lisps of children, and the loud whispered "hush" of mamma, as the little plump-faced cherub is leaving the house in her weary arms.

The four days' meeting, in the summer of 1831, when 8 or 10 faithful "watchmen from the walls of Zion," residing in the neighboring towns, came to the help of our worthy pastor. There came to the parsonage, each by private conveyance, Revs. Messrs. Beckley, Pitman, Newton, Field, Smith, Foster, Barstow of Keene, and "Father Packard," the "old man eloquent," from Shelburne, Mass. After a sermon of great power, from the last named pastor, he suggested "there be, by all present, a session of silent prayer of five minutes duration, after which the choir will please sing the hymn commencing, 'Oh, there will be mourning at the judgment seat of Christ.'"

Silent indeed was that crowded house, while the face of that venerable man was prostrate on the pulpit cushion. It was but a moment, when again appeared that benevolent face, with tear-drops falling, and grandly solemn, sounded from that old choir—

"Parents and children there will part,
Will part to meet no more."

At his post, calm and serene, though sympathetic his countenance, among that weeping congregation, stood "Uncle John." On his right, at the head of the soprano, was Mrs. S., and like the sad moanings of November, or, as we imagine—

"The cold, odoriferous winds that will blow Over the earth in the last days!"—

sounded a German flute, while Mr. Sikes, then in manhood's prime, was in the rear, sweeping off the heavy notes from his great bass-viol. Mr. and Mrs. S—, after serving in this department of worship thirty years, yet (1870) survive beside their great grandchildren, and they are said to be the most aged couple now living in this town. But "Uncle John" has long since done his work and departed. He served several years, as leader of that large choir, and acted as accountant for the publishing house aforementioned. If he had not so eminent abilities as his gifted brothers, he may have improved his five talents as well as some others have ten. However this may be, the sod now covers all that remains of these four brothers, for whom we do not claim perfection; enough of frailty, and imperfection can be said of the best men.

The moral atmosphere of this lovely, secluded valley, was, at one period, far from healthy. The owls and bats of human society, from distant places, did here gather to carry on midnight gambling, with its kindred vices, until the reputation of this village became such that pastors in towns 30 miles distant, warned the young of their flocks to avoid becoming residents of this place. To the influence and labors of the Fessenden family do we largely attribute a desirable change in conditions here. Though William Fessenden was never the member of any church, he offered $400 to the society for establishing religious worship and constructing the first meeting-house in the East village of Brattleboro.

CHARLES C. FROST, A. M.,

was born in Brattleboro, East village, November 11, 1805. He is, by trade, a shoemaker, and such has been his regular business since the age of 14 to the present time (1878). During the years of his early manhood, he was persuaded to leave the shoe-bench, during the winter months, to act as teacher in the only school-house of this district, then standing in the north part of the village. Mr. Frost was in advance of previous teachers in this school, in his methods of imparting instruction in mathematics, reading exercises, and such branches of study as were then pursued. We remember his use of various forms of blocks for illustration in solving geometrical or mathematical problems. The blackboard exercise was, we believe, for the first time in this village, seen in his school. His government and good management of the pupils under his charge met with general approval. We believe his service in school teaching did not exceed two winters, though he was urged again and again, to continue to take charge of the school; but for reasons best known to himself, he preferred not to do so. We have a right to suppose there was not a sufficient compensation offered in those days for a man of his abilities. Other young men could be found who could make as good a quill-pen and thrash as big a boy, as could Mr. Frost, for less pay. A man must possess the last mentioned qualifications, if he would command $15 per month, as the principal instructor in the district school in this village, at that time.

Near the time of his last service to the district, he married Roxana Sargent, granddaughter of John Sargent,* who was the first English child born in Vermont. By this marriage were three sons, viz.: Charles S., Wells S., and Henry B. S. Frost. Mr. Frost established himself in the shoe business in his present location on Main street, in 1831. Since that time, he has become widely and favorably known to men of science and culture, and by savants is considered the highest authority in some departments of science. Therefore it is he has received the degree of A. M. conferred upon him by Dartmouth and Middlebury colleges; also, that he has become a corresponding member of societies for the advancement of learning in this country. Wise men, not only of the East, but from other directions, have come long distances to his unostentatious presence and humble surroundings. For reasons in the foregoing, a biographical sketch of our native townsman, for the history of Brattleboro, is demanded from abroad, and the historian of the State has especially requested it.

Other men of the same avocation have, without doubt, produced as good mechanical work as has the subject of our sketch; but we know of no other mechanic who has been so in love with wisdom, that not a day could pass over his head without searching for her as for hidden treasure. We learn it has been the daily practice of Mr. Frost, from his youth, to devote a portion of every day (Sabbaths excepted) to attainments in the sciences and languages. Some years ago he had made such proficiency as to pursue scientific studies in four languages. This practice has been no interruption to his mechanical or mercantile pursuits, for he has, in this manner, only occupied the intervals of business hours—the fragments of time—many heedlessly let pass in a manner often worse than wasted. He does not appear to be ambitious, or to make any display of his abilities. We have never known him to address an audience, or speak in public on any occasion, or manifest any desire for office or elevation above his legitimate business. From his youth he has ever been plainly dressed, very prudent, and as economical in the use of money as of time, and never has suffered business embarrassments, or offered less than one hundred cents on the dollar of his indebtedness. Other men of his acquirements usually aspire to some profession, professorship or position their attainments qualify them to fill and maintain. He has been offered honorable positions, such as he is qualified to fill, and the compensation far greater than he ever received in his business life, yet he has as decidedly refused the offers as in early life he refused the professor's chair in that old hipped-roof school-house at the north part of the village.

The why of this unremitting, life-long devotion to study is, it seems to us, a satisfaction to the demands of his nature he can satisfy in no other way. His reward seems to be in the doing; but with most people reward is a consequence of doing. At the time Mr. Frost was 49 years of age, the following was said of him in the Country Journal:

"He received his early instructions at a common school of his native village, and has never enjoyed the advantages of the higher seminaries of learning. Being fond of mathematics, he early excelled in that department of study, and was a fair, though not remarkable scholar in other branches. When he left school, however, he did not lay aside his books. Some mathematical works falling into his hands, when a youth, he studied them faithfully and became master of their contents. And, having studied mathematics for several years, with little or no assistance except from books, he finally made himself familiar with the most important works on algebra, geometry, the calculus, &c. He turned his attention also to astronomy, geology, mineralogy, meteorology, and botany, in all of which branches of science he has made great proficiency, especially in botany, to which he has for the past few years more particularly devoted himself. His researches into that department of botany relating to the cryptogams, are especially worthy of notice, and are surpassed only by those of a few living botanists. He was, for a time, connected with the Smithsonian Institution, as a reporter on storms, and discharged his duties most acceptably. In the meantime, he has kept himself "posted up" on the great moral and political questions and reforms of the age, with most of which he has strong, active sympathies. The Sunday he rigidly devoted to public worship and the reading of works relating to morals, theology and religion.

Mr. Frost has made collections more or less extensive of minerals, insects, shells, grasses, mosses, ferns, lichens, fungi, and plants generally, and arranged them neatly and in a scientific manner. Most of these he has collected with his own hands, not a few of them in early morning, before the usual hours of business; some on excursions made for the purpose, and others whenever business called him abroad, never omitting any opportunity to bring home any rare specimen which his quick, practised eye might discover.

A part of his earnings, which had never been large, he has saved by a simple, frugal mode of living, and appropriated to the purchase of books, so that his library numbers some 600* volumes of valuable works, mostly of a scientific character, selected not for ornament, but for use. Thus by appropriating at times those small sums of money (which might easily have been spent in gratifying the appetite, or in procuring the means of temporary pleasure) in the purchase of books and other instruments of improvement; he has a rich mine of intellectual wealth from which he can constantly draw supplies to enrich and enoble his mind. Those hours and minutes which some men spend in idleness and loitering about places of concourse, or in gossip, or in dissipation, he has wisely employed in study, and thus acquired an amount of knowledge on a variety of subjects, mostly scientific, which but few can boast of, who have been favored with the best advantages that wealth could purchase, or a college or university furnish.

His knowledge attracts to him those fond of science; those who, like himself, desire to improve, and thus he is brought into communion with some of the best minds in the community. Scientific men from abroad, when they visit that beautiful village where he resides, find him out and make his acquaintance. And now and then a kindred lover of nature and of science, like his distinguished friend, John L. Russell, of Salem, so well known among men of science, visit him, and together they explore the mountains and valleys of Vermont, so rich in minerals and flowers and plants of almost every description. This, to him, is a source of great pleasure and of no little profit. The satisfaction of seeing beauties and wonders in almost every object in nature, and which are almost entirely hidden from ignorant or unscientific men, is worth an independent fortune."

After Mr. Frost had received a visit from Rev. Dr. C. F. Deemes, of New York, where he was pastor of the "Church of the Strangers," there appeared in "Baldwin's Monthly," from the pen of the above named clergyman, an article from which we extract the following:

"There is nothing at all striking in his appearance, but he was the man in Brattleboro whom I particularly desired to see. I did not venture to present myself, nor did I adopt the roundabout method of endeavoring to make an acquaintance by means of a little trade, I simply asked another gentleman to present me to Mr. C. C. Frost. When we met, I said: 'I wish to know the man who has more friends among the educated people of Europe, than he has in his native village.' He smiled, dropped his eyes, and replied: 'Well, I reckon I have more friends in Europe than I have in Vermont.' I said: 'I find that there are people in Brattleboro who know no reason why I should desire to become acquainted with you, but I am sure there are a hundred scientific men in various parts of Europe who would be gratified with this opportunity.'

I trust my readers will now wish to know about this Mr. Frost, in whom I was interested. He is a man who knows more about plants, probably, than anyone else in New England,—perhaps than anyone in the United States. He reads scientific books equally well in four different languages. He has, besides, a very great deal of scientific knowledge beyond botany,—in one department of which he is an authority for scientific men on two continents; perhaps the highest authority since the death of Rev. Dr. Curtis of North Carolina. His knowledge is wide and accurate. He has habits of the closest observation and description. He has been honored by being elected a member of different societies in America and Europe. He did not tell me these things—I knew them; but I desired to hear from his own lips the history of his intellectual progress. It was substantially this:

His father—James Frost*—was a shoemaker, and was the first who opened a store for selling shoes in Brattleboro. At 10 years of age, young Frost noticed that the older scholars brought their sums for him to do, and that in mathematics he was up to boys who were five to nine years older than himself. He did not know what that meant, but his friends afterwards told him that they had discovered in him, from his first years, a considerable mathematical genius. When he was fifteen years of age, his father became possessor of "Hutton's Mathematics," which he had taken for debt from some West Point student. Young Frost looked at it with evident delight, and his father told him that it should be his property if he could read it at twenty-one. At 19 he had mastered the whole course. He went into astronomical mathematics, took up chemistry, learned very much of natural sciences in every department, and all the while attended to his business as a shoemaker. From some neglect of his physical habits, he superinduced mucous dyspepsia. No medical skill in his neighborhood seemed able to relieve him. He went to New York to consult Dr. Willard Parker. While waiting in the ante-room, he admired intently a very handsome bouquet of flowers on the mantel, and was examining them when the doctor called him in. Dr. Parker candidly told him he could do nothing for him: 'But,' said the skillful and honest physician, 'you can do very much for yourself. Are you fond of flowers?' 'Very much so, indeed,' said Mr. Frost. 'Then make it a point to walk one hour in the morning, and one in the evening, looking for flowers.'

He did so. His health constantly and rapidly improved. At first he could hardly keep on his feet through the hour, but he soon learned to walk many miles at a stretch. His scientific mind naturally began to study flowers in their scientific aspects. He began to be a botanist. He ordered Fries' book from London, and paid $12 for it. He did not know until he saw it that it was written in Latin, of which tongue he was ignorant. He bought a Latin grammar, devoted himself to the language, and in six months could read his new book as well as if it was written in English. In the same manner he acquired German and French. He has contributed to our scientific periodicals. He still writes. He showed me an unpublished manuscript on the Boleti of Vermont.

On my first visit, which occupied about an hour, we were interrupted six different times. He went to the counter to cut pegs out of the shoes of a factory girl, to sell a pair of slippers to a gentleman for his wife, to ply his trade with one or two countrywomen, etc. He never asked to be excused, but went to his business and came back and resumed just where he left off. He made no pretences. He did not play the part of a learned cobbler; he simply plunged into the things he and I both wanted to talk about. I asked him how he could be content to spend his days in that little shoe-shop, with these capabilities and acquirements?

'Why,' said he, 'it is the business of my life. Whatever I have acquired of science succeeded Dr. George Holmes Hall, a physician in regular practice, in the sale of drugs and medicines. The inhabitants of this place had, up to this time, purchased their drugs from a medical practitioner, therefore they came to regard the occupations of druggist and physician as one and inseparable. It was on this account, we believe, the subject of our sketch was compelled to bear a title to which he had no claim, and was always known and spoken of here as "Dr. Clark." He came here from Northampton, Mass., in 1809, and during the time he resided here, some 10 or 11 years, was the only druggist in Brattleboro. About 1820, he moved, with his family, to Hartford, Ct., where, from that time until near the close of a long and successful life, he was an extensive iron dealer. N. B. Williston, his former clerk, became his successor in this place, and, in copartnership with E. Hunt, purchased, excepting the building, the entire stock and fixtures of Dr. Clark. The building remained in possession of Dr. Clark over 20 years after his removal to Hartford, but the drug business therein was successfully continued by Messrs. Williston & Hunt, until the time of rival establishments.

Some years ago, we heard frequent mention of Dr. Clark in connection with the events of his time in this place; and at the present time some of the oldest inhabitants now living here find a welcome place for his memory in their reminiscences. With his well-known capability and integrity, such as caused responsible offices to seek his acceptance, but were almost invariably declined, he had some reputation as a wit, and in his conversations and social relations was manifested his ability as well as his approval of instructions found in Proverbs, chap. 25, verse 11.

During the time of his life in this town, the malignity and bitterness of political parties subsided and became greatly mollified under the administration of James Monroe. The way in which Dr. Clark made use of the aforementioned circumstances to give one of his friends a pleasant hit, can best be told in the words of Dr. John

P. Warren, who was present on the occasion:

"On a 4th of July celebration of our national independence, which took place at the East village in this town, in the year 1817, and during the halcyon period of President Monroe's administration, a little incident occurred, the history of which by an eye-witness of what he relates, may perhaps serve to amuse some of the readers of the history of the town.

It was an occasion then, as now, fitted to call out a large concourse of all classes of citizens, of this and adjoining towns, to celebrate the day in a style appropriate to the occasion. The venerable John Holbrook of this town was chosen president, and John Phelps, Esq., vice president of the day. A bountiful repast was provided at the American House, of which a large number of citizens partook. Patriotic toasts were read and drank at the table, after the repast was discussed. Among the distinguished guests at the dinner were Dr. Ezra Clark of this village, a vivacious, quick-witted man, and Jeremiah Greenleaf, Esq., of Guilford, the reputed well-known author of 'Grammar Simplified.'"

We will here interrupt Dr. Warren's narrative a moment in regard to the grammar. Mr. Greenleaf claimed that this, to many, dry, uninteresting study, was by his new work relieved of the objectionable features, rendered not only more attractive, but the science made comparatively easy of attainment.

"Mr. Greenleaf had but recently published his book, and transmitted to each of the ex-Presidents of the United States a copy of the same, and from whom he had received complimentary letters, which he had shown to the citizens of the village, for which he had manifested a just pride and no small share of vanity. After the regular toasts had been disposed of, volunteer toasts were called for by the president. Dr. Ezra Clark was the first called. He promptly arose, when all eyes were fastened upon him, and said: 'Mr. President, I give you for a toast, James Monroe and Jerry Greenleaf—one has mollified party spirit and the other grammar.' The shout and cheering which burst forth, at the announcement, can be better imagined than described."

In what manner this complimentary toast affected the pacific President of the United States, we cannot say, but all authorities we have consulted declare that our Guilford author was considerably irritated and quite unpleasantly affected.

Several years after the family of Dr. Clark removed to Hartford, his sons came back to Brattleboro, and by their business enterprise assisted materially the growth of the place. The eldest son was the proprietor of a manufactory of "mother-of-pearl" as early as 1833, we think. This material was converted into articles of beauty and utility, such as pearl slides, buttons, etc. He married a daughter of G. R. Ellis, Esq., and returned to Hartford, Ct.

S. M. Clark, who has for a series of years past rendered important services to the United States, in the currency department, established in this place, in 1834, the manufacture of boxwood and ivory rules. His personal attention was given to every department of the works, which for beauty and efficiency were deservedly admired. The rooms in which moved the most approved machinery, and mechanics of great excellence, were models for neatness and cleanliness. No efforts were spared on the part of the proprietor to obtain a high reputation for the articles coming from his manufactory. This business was continued many years by E. A. Stearns. After the death of Mr. Stearns, Charles Mead became his successor in the business, but was compelled to cease operations soon after, by the great fire in 1857. Not only has this business been an important financial benefit to this place in bygone years, but the accuracy and general good character of the work has been highly creditable to all concerned.

Hon. Ezra Clark, Jr., was, in early life, employed as a clerk by Messrs. Williston & Hunt, in this place. Several years after his return to Hartford, Ct., he was elected Representative to Congress from that city.

ELIPHALET JOHNSON.

Born in Chesterfield, N. H., about 1781, he spent the last 50 years of his life mostly in the east village of Brattleboro. His parentage was respectable, but he was partially blind and so unfortunate in his general organization, he had not the ability to properly take care of himself. The labor he engaged in was generally for those the least able to reward him. He found lodgings in some barn or out-house, and during his last years depended mainly upon charity. If any boy insulted him, as they frequently did, Johnson always felt certain the father of that boy would in some way come to grief, by failure in business or some family affliction. We heard him state: "Hon. James Elliot and his excellent wife always treated me well; they were the best friends I ever had in Brattleboro, but I am sorry they are Universalists. Why, if that doctrine is true, there is no hell for them Shaddocks."

But notwithstanding his menial occupation, lack of culture, and unprepossessing externals, he often attracted attention by his quaint remarks and ingenious poetical compositions. Returning disgusted from Nauvoo, whither he was enticed, by a Mormon brother, he encountered a fearful storm on Lake Erie, and wrote:

"As o'er Lake Erie's boisterous wave,
I fearfully was driven,
I thought each billow was my grave,
And pray'd to be forgiven.
"Then did I promise to my God,
If safe again on shore,
I'd be submissive to his rod,
And leave the land no more,"

Johnson was not a sot, but like many sons of genius that have preceded him, had a fondness for liquid sources of inspiration and yellow snuff, that may have been indispensable to his peculiar mental exercises. The great orator of Kentucky never made a brilliant display of oratory until he had inhaled the aroma from his gold snuff-box. But however much the artificial aids may have assisted our poet, no voice came to his inspiration until he had for some moments intently gazed upon his wrinkled right hand. When urged, as he often was, to produce verses applicable to circumstances, he would sometimes pound his head with his fist, and a suspension of this exercise would be followed by bringing the inside of his expanded hand in contact with the end of his nose. After seemingly writing with his nose upon his hand, he, on one occasion, enlightened his audience upon the history of an individual who urgently requested a rhyme about himself. From fear of offence, the poet refused to comply, but the individual boisterously insisting he would not and could not be offended by anything he could say, and offering a reward, Johnson thus laid him out:

"Daniel ———, so they say,
To State's Prison he has been;
And if I could have my way,
He would be there again."

Slightly personal as was this production, the person poetized was with difficulty prevented from laying violent hands upon our author, and it was not long before it was made known there was more truth than poetry found upon the wrinkled right hand on this occasion.

Johnson wished for independence, and once tried to improve his fortune by peddling. He made several efforts before he could find any one who would furnish him goods on commission. His success and failure can best be given in his own language:

"John Leavitt let me have a basket of clothes pins, almanacs, and some other articles, that I was to sell or return. I went as far north as Putney, and had very good luck selling my stuff, but when I got back I hadn't got quite money enough to pay for the goods I had sold. I couldn't always tell when I got the right money, and no doubt some folks cheated me. Mr. Leavitt was very kind to me and said, 'Johnson, don't give it up so; perhaps you will do better next time.' He fitted me out with another stock of goods, but I didn't do so well as I did the first time. If the devilish boys would let me alone, I guess I could do something. One boy hit my side with a hard snowball, and you have no idea how it hurt me. I fell down and bruised my bones to all intents.

"I had four dozen clothes pins
And but fifty cents in cash,
When I fell upon my basket
And broke it all to smash."

"Parents are more to blame than their boys. When I do find out the name of a boy who has insulted me, it is no use to tell his father, for when I have done so the answer generally is, 'Guess he didn't hurt you much; he only wanted a little fun; you'd better go on the town and get away from the boys.'"

But his happiest efforts were reserved for New Year's or Fourth of July. He was ever seeking for some sin with which to charge the Democratic party. From the days of Jackson, in 1829, to President Polk's administration, in 1847, we frequently heard his denunciations. Soon after Van Buren became president, Johnson gave him the following compliment:

"Martin Van Buren—designing man,
With Andrew Jackson laid the plan
To make retrenchment but a sham,
And stain our country black as Ham."

In 1847 we were fighting Mexico. News came of the bombardment of Vera Cruz. Invited, on July 4th, to give his toast, his bent, aged frame shook with emotion, tears flowed down his withered face, and from quivering lips came feebly forth his first four lines. Warming with the theme, firmer and firmer rose his voice as he proceeded, and when he recited the last line his upraised right foot came down with a vengeance to the floor:

"This glorious day has come again,
The proudest day for freedom's son,
For then a tyrant's galling chain
Broke on the soil our father's won.

"But now the cries of Mexan daughters,
With mangled limbs at Vera Cruz;
They tell how freemen's hands can slaughter,
How Independence they abuse.

"Go, Democrat! bow low your head,
Heaven may forgive you this disgrace,
But history's page you've made so red,
All hell and Polk cannot efface."

If all our Johnsonian works had been preserved they would probably be enough to fill a good-sized volume. We give one specimen of his efforts on the first of January, 1847:

"Though little, now, this world can bring
To cheer my pathway to the grave,
Nor early love nor Cupid's wing
Can brace my heart life's scenes to brave.

"Yet I can say to rich and poor,
To old and young, to grave and gay,
Accept my hand, I have no more,
A Happy New Year to you this day.

"Improve this time your alms to give—
First day of eighteen forty-seven—
For you this year may cease to live,
And your reward be hell or heaven."

Enwrapped in cast-off clothing, Johnson felt his way about these busy streets nearly half a century. From him came to us often the first intelligence of the advent of joys or sorrows to the homes of near or distant neighbors, and, ever on some errand for the sick or well, he considered himself indispensable to the welfare of others. He believed his mission to this suffering world of great importance, and the many gilded flies of fashion, high in the world's regard—but nobody could tell why—had less apology for living.

It was one satisfaction of his life to think an aching void would be occasioned and sadness, like a cloud, come down upon this people, when it could be said of poor, abused, unappreciated, neglected Johnson: "For thy bent form we look in vain, No more we hear the echo of thy cane; On thee no more boys play mischievous tricks, For thou hast crossed the fabled river Styx."

His last song ceased, his feeble life went out, as liberty was buckling on her armor for the last great deeds of '61-'65, and peacefully he sank to sleep in his native town.

FRANCIS GOODHUE, ESQ.

We first learn of this gentleman as an active young man living with his wife at Swanzev, N. H. He was born Oct. 26, 1768, married Polly Brown, daughter of Rev. Joseph Brown, in 1788. He moved from Swanzev, N. H., to Wethersfield, Vt., where he came into possession of the famous "Bow Farm" of about 1,000 acres, being of the most fertile and desirable meadow lands of the Connecticut river valley. In 1810 he sold this valuable farm to Hon. William Jarvis, soon after he resigned his office as United States Consul, and who was ever afterwards known as "Consul Jarvis." Soon after selling this farm, Mr. Goodhue settled in Brattleboro—in 1811—and this place was his home the remainder of his life, which closed in 1837. At the time of his death but two of his five children were living, viz.: Col. Joseph Goodhue and Wells Goodhue. Joseph Goodhue was born in 1794, married Sarah Edwards, of Northampton, Mass.,—a descendant of Rev. Jonathan Edwards,—in 1815.

The then small settlement in the part of this town, known as the east village, having extensive meadows north and south of it, attracted the attention of Mr. Goodhue, and he made purchases of said lands north and south, and also a large portion of the lands on Main and other streets of this village, containing, in some localities, buildings thereon.

Hon. John W. Blake, who was living here before 1790, was a large owner of real estate in this village at that time, and he conveyed his title to the same to Mr. Goodhue in 1811. About the same time, Dea. John Holbrook sold to Mr. Goodhue the water-power and buildings east of the south bridge on Main street, containing a saw and grist mill and some machinery for other purposes.

Mr. Goodhue was not a dreamer or builder of air castles. No man in this place better heeded the scriptural injunction, "work while the day lasts." With him every moment was improved in advancing the growth and general prosperity of this little settlement on the western bank of the Connecticut river. Though diligent and attentive to the many small and needful details of life and business, he was ever awake to great occasions. About 14 years had passed, after his settlement here, when an enterprise of great importance aroused the public attention. The great Erie canal, so often called in derision while in progress of construction, "Clinton's Ditch," was universally allowed to be a grand success. A canal was made from New Haven, Ct., to Northampton, Mass., and it was proposed to extend the same to the town of Brattleboro. G. C. Hall, Mr. Goodhue, and other of our business men became interested in the enterprise. Surveyors and civil engineers were put on the route, and while performing their duties in this vicinity they were accompanied by Mr. Goodhue, whom we well remember seeing hold of one end of the chain, measuring through the forest. While the public mind was discussing and deliberating upon this matter, a little noisy steamboat came screaming up the Connecticut to tell the people, "you have a canal, a natural one, leading to the ocean, and all that is needed to make Brattleboro a seaport is to apply the heat and put on the steam." The canal project was laid upon the table, and Mr. Goodhue, with others in this place, gave their attention and money to give the experiment of steam navigation a fair trial. Mr. Goodhue lived to see this enterprise a failure, and not until about 11 years after his death was the grand success of transportation accomplished by railroad, and his son, Col. Joseph Goodhue, and his grandson, Francis Goodhue, Esq., have acted from the first on the board of directors of the Vermont & Massachusetts Railroad.

This intensely practical man seemed to receive a new inspiration in this his last home, for he became everything this village needed at that time. He paid no regard to the old adage, "Don't have too many irons in the fire." He threw in hammer and tongs, shovel and poker all at once. He carried on wool-carding, cloth-dressing, saw and grain mill, cotton spinning, distilling, and a large store of such goods as were sold from country stores at that time. He was also erecting a building of some kind every year, and largely, at the same time, engaged in farming, yet his note was never worth less than 100 cents on the dollar.

Like the most of our successful men, his first lessons came from the hard school of necessity, thereby acquiring a discipline and valuable experience, with natural shrewdness and sagacity, which made him, as he walked these streets in the prime of manhood, nearly 70 years ago, an important and valuable acquisition to this community. He was not one of those half-cent men, who dare not trust a dollar out of their sight, and get all their money concentrated where they can sit down upon it over night, but he confidently spread out his capital to the winds of Heaven, or "cast his bread upon the waters to return to him after many days."

We know of no man of property who has settled here who manifested more real confidence in our future than did Mr. Goodhue. He completely identified himself with our private and public interests, and was ever ready to listen to and assist in any project presenting a reasonable prospect of tending to the public welfare. His hopefulness and cheerfulness was a constant inspiration to those with whom he came in contact, and the encouraging grasp he gave the hand of honest industry can be seen, in its effects, at the present day. He was generally successful, and he was always gratified to learn that others were so; and was a young man unfortunate in business, instead of accelerating his misfortunes or downward course, he had a hopeful word to say, and could generally find some employment for him until he could do better. His public liberality was apparent in several instances. He gave valuable locations upon his lands on Main street for the old Brattleboro Bank, chartered in 1821, and the Unitarian and Congregational church buildings.

The old-time, open-handed hospitality was not lacking at the house and home of Mrs. Francis Goodhue. Old people who, in their youth, had rendered service to Mr. Goodhue and lived in his family, we have heard speak in high praise of the kind treatment and good fare they invariably received at the hands of Mrs. Goodhue. The ladies of the village, who gathered on certain occasions around her dining-table, ever considered her a model housekeeper in the selection of refreshments, the manner in which they were served, general attractiveness and neatness of surroundings, and the cordial welcome with which all were received.

George B. Blake, Esq., of Boston, indulged in pleasant reminiscences of his boyhood, when he, a particular favorite of Mrs. Goodhue, assisted her in her entertainments. To a Brattleboro friend he said: "No ladies of the present day so command my reverence as did those of the olden time who composed the Ladies' Benevolent Society of Brattleboro. In summer time each one of them wore a green silk calash, covering a lace cap, white as the new fallen snow. When they entered the house of Mrs. Goodhue, the calash was removed, but the cap remained, giving a uniformity and neatness to their appearance. There was a stateliness and dignity in their manners not surpassed by the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. Never have I felt a more weighty responsibility devolving upon me than when, under the direction of Mrs. Goodhue, I assisted her in the entertainment of the ladies of this society, and no food I have since partaken had such a relish or gave me so complete satisfaction as, in the long ago, came from the table of my dear old friend in Brattleboro."

The memory of Mrs. Francis Goodhue, who, by some years, survived her husband, has not perished; it yet lives in the minds of many in this place, as of those long removed to other places. Her visits to the homes of the afflicted were not simply visits of condolence. She was ever seeking a way whereby some real benefit, some tangible good might be effected, and if there was any apparent possibility of human aid to the suffering she was capable of rendering, her efforts in this direction were never lacking. Her hired help were often summoned to her assistance, with needed supplies, on her errands of mercy to the sick and destitute, and she has often passed the whole night in her ministrations, performing the humblest offices in the abodes of poverty, by the bedside of the sick and dying.

Her only daughter, Lucy, was remarkable for her external beauty, and universally admired for her many virtues. She became the first wife of John R. Blake, Esq., who for many years, until his death in 1873, was of the banking firm of Blake Brothers, of Boston, one of the most reliable financial houses in New England. The members of this firm were the sons of John W. Blake, Esq., and were both natives of the East village of Brattleboro.

Her son, Col. Joseph Goodhue, soon after his marriage, came into possession of the large meadow farm, occupied in early times, before the war of the Revolution, by John Arms, one of the earliest settlers. Col. Goodhue was a model of industry, and during a large portion of his life occupied various town offices, and was the chief in command of the regiment in this vicinity. Being one of the most economical, successful, cautious men in this town, yet he was one of the largest investors here in the first railroad enterprise—the Vermont & Massachusetts railroad—and was one of the board of directors during the remainder of his life.

At the time of his death, in 1861, his children were all married, settled mostly in this place, and constitute, with their families, a very important and influential part of this community.

Mary Ann was married to William P. Cune, now president of the old bank, chartered here in 1821 and renewed in 1863. Harriet was married in 1835 to Ex-Governor Holbrook. Lucy married Dr. Hall, of Northampton, Mass., in 1836. Sarah married first, Albert H. Bull, Esq., of Hartford, Ct., who, before 1860, gave $2000 to the Brattleboro Library Association. Her second husband, Dr. E. R. Chapin, was, for 15 years, superintendent physician of the Asylum for the Insane, at Flatbush, near the city of New York. Francis, the only son, married Mary Brooks, daughter of Capt. William Brooks.

the only brother of Joseph, was 10 years of age when he came here with his father in 1811. He fitted for college and continued his studies about a year after he entered college, and came back to Brattleboro to engage in trade with his father. He was married to Laura Barnard about 1828. They had three children—Lucy, Charles and Julia. Lucy married Rev. George Draper; Julia, Thomas Walter, of New York; Charles B., a lady from Pomfret, Ct.

Mr. and Mrs. Wells Goodhue are not living, and the only survivors of the family, Charles and Lucy, are not (1879) residents of Brattleboro.

Mr. Wells Goodhue passed the most of his life in Brattleboro. He was a careful, prudent man, and never manifested any desire for office, though he was a man of excellent administrative ability and sterling honesty. His quiet, sagacious comments and remarks to those with whom he was familiar, respecting public movements and passing events, gave evidence of much reflection and discrimination. Above all things he dreaded contention, and rarely would discuss exciting questions. His wealth constantly accumulated by real estate transactions and judicious management of his capital. Late in life he was elected president of the first bank here, chartered in 1821, and reconstructed in 1863. Much to the regret of those most interested in the institution, he could be retained in said office but a short time. A few months after his resignation he died, in 1874, at the home of his only daughter, Mrs. Draper, near the city of New York.

EPAPHRO SEYMOUR.

The subject of this sketch was the youngest son of Major Moses Seymour, of H

Litchfield, Conn.; born July 8, 1783. He received a good academical education at the Morris Academy, South Farms, Conn., and afterwards was thoroughly trained in the business and duties of a merchant's clerk in a mercantile establishment at Brooklyn, Conn.

Horatio Seymour, the eldest brother, was educated for the legal profession, and settled in Middlebury, Vt. He became a distinguished lawyer in western Vermont, and for twelve years represented the State in the United States Senate. Near the close of the last century, Henry Seymour, an older brother of Epaphro Seymour, came to Guilford and was extensively engaged in mercantile business. Subsequently Henry Seymour, about 1802, induced his brother Epaphro to come to Guilford and engage in trade, although he was less than twenty years of age when he commenced business. At this time Guilford was the most populous and prosperous town in Vermont.

Zadock Thompson, in his Gazetteer of Vermont, published in 1820, speaks as follows of Henry Seymour and others, formerly residents of Guilford:

"Among the early settlers of Guilford, since 1796 was Hon. Royall Tyler, Hon. James Elliot, Hon. Micah Townshend, Hon. John Noyes, Hon. Henry Seymour, and others of lesser note, who were identified with the history of the State, but who have since removed from the town."

After Epaphro Seymour was established in business in 1802, Henry Seymour removed to Pompey, Onondaga Co., N. Y., and engaged largely in trade, accumulating a handsome property. Subsequently, in 1819, he removed to Utica, N. Y., and was appointed one of the canal commissioners of that State, and while supervising the construction of the canal, he acquired a large fortune by successful investments in real estate.

Epaphro continued in mercantile business in Guilford until 1814, when he removed to Brattleboro, and was associated with Geo. F. Atherton in mercantile business. He continued in trade in Brattleboro some three or four years, after which he resided alternately at Guilford and Brattleboro. He spent the winter of 1820 at Middlebury, Vt. He was regarded as a discreet business man of most excellent judgment, and could readily and correctly estimate the value of all kinds of property that passed under his observation, and while sojourning in Brattleboro, Guilford, or elsewhere, he was constantly investing his money in a great variety of enterprises, which uniformly proved productive.

In the fall of 1821, the Legislature of Vermont chartered a bank at Brattleboro, which was organized the following year, and Mr. Seymour was chosen cashier thereof by the directors in March, 1822, and continued to hold the office until Jan. 1, 1837, when he was elected president of the bank to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of John Holbrook. Mr. Seymour continued to hold the office and faithfully discharge the duties thereof until his death, June 10, 1854. By reason of his early and careful training, and his long experience in mercantile business, he was exceedingly practical in his method, and had acquired a perfect familiarity with all the details and complications of the most intricate business transactions, and was enabled to conduct the business of the bank profitably and successfully during the time of his official connection therewith, either as cashier or president. He settled the estate of Hon. Jonathan Hunt, as executor, without excuting bonds for the faithful discharge of the trust which the testator had reposed in his integrity and fidelity, and the estate inventoried at a sum exceeding $150,000. During the year 1837 and from 1837 to 1840, inclusive, he was associated with his nephew, Horatio Seymour, of Utica, N. Y., and O. S. Seymour, of Litchfield, Conn., in settling the estate of his brother, Henry Seymour, who died at Utica, N. Y. The estate was very large and widely scattered, exceeding $250,000 in amount. He was greatly respected for his honesty and integrity and unflinching fidelity in the discharge of his fiduciary engagements. While connected with the bank his time and energies were almost exclusively devoted to the maintenance of its reputation for soundness and solvency. His example, method and manner of conducting the business of the bank has since been strictly followed by his successors, and, at this day, it is regarded as one of the soundest in the State. He was a great admirer of a fine horse, and manifested a deep interest in the improvement of the breed of horses in Brattleboro and vicinity. At his death he was keeping in his stables eight brood mares with colts, that were sired by the celebrated Gifford Morgan, which was his favorite horse. Some of its descendants are now owned in Windham county, and old horse fanciers readily detect in them the symmetry and prominent characteristics of the sire which was always regarded as the noblest horse in New England, forty years ago.

Mr. Seymour was eminently practical in all his views and opinions, and of most excellent judgment. The public, particularly those who were about to engage in new enterprises, reposing great confidence in his superior financial ability, uniformly consulted him in relation to their proposed investments and were always controlled by his opinions. His advice was always eagerly sought and adopted. He constantly warned all who were inclined to engage in speculations against the folly and danger which was so alluring to a man with a greed for wealth, and so dangerous to him when the money of others is under his control. He begged of his friends to make no investments but those that were perfectly legitimate and promised a safe return.

The community reposed the most implicit confidence in his integrity. Before the adoption of savings banks and trust companies in this State, large sums of money were entrusted to his care and keeping, and in many cases with a simple minute noting the amount, yet for the period of more than forty years not a whisper was ever breathed against his fidelity in the discharge of any fiduciary engagement he had assumed. He was a generous-hearted man to the poor and unfortunate, and kindly aided young men who were struggling against adversity and poverty to obtain an education and qualify themselves for professional pursuits. He married Miss Mary Root, an estimable young lady, sister of Mrs. Judge Whitney, of Brattleboro. He had but one child, a boy, who died Nov. 23, 1830, aged two years and six months.

CAPT. SAMUEL ROOT.

Samuel Root was the son of Moses Root; born at Montague, Mass., Oct., 9, 1788; came to Brattleboro when he was about 20 years of age, and worked for Samuel Dickenson and learned of him the trade of a blacksmith. After laboring for Dickenson a few years and completing his engagement, he bought of him his shop, tools and good will and commenced business for himself.

He married Catherine Sargeant, Feb. 6, 1817, by whom he had five children, only two of whom survived him—Frances E. and Catherine. Frances E. married Geo. C. Lawrence, who is still living. Catherine married Samuel H. Price, who enlisted in the Union army and died in the services of his country in 1863.

Frances E. Lawrence left three children—Elizabeth, Richard and Henry R. Elizabeth and Richard died some years ago, and Henry R. is still living. Catherine had two sons by her husband, Mr. Price, Francis and Edward, who reside with their mother in Chicago, and are engaged in trade.

Capt. Root was a man of great industry, of an indomitable will and always exercised the most rigid economy. Forty years ago New England and New York were chartering banks by the score, and the prudent captain invested his surplus gains and accumulations in bank shares, and his investments uniformly proved productive and added largely to his wealth. At the time of his death he owned a large amount of stock in some 10 or 15 banks in New England and New York.

His stern unflinching honesty and practical good sense rendered him exceedingly popular with his neighbors and townsmen, and he was annually elected to responsible offices in town, the duties of which he discharged with great fidelity. He represented the town in the General Assembly of the State; was oftentimes chosen one of the selectmen of the town, and was for many years trustee and keeper of the surplus money, a large fund sequestered and set apart for the support and maintenance of common schools in town. The fund was large and great care was required in obtaining ample security for loans that were made of portions of the same. He was for a long time a director in the old bank, and was elected president thereof after the death of Mr. Seymour, in 1854, and continued to hold the office until his own death in March, 1869.

For the last fifty years of his life he had filled the most important municipal offices in town. As a citizen, he discharged all his duties faithfully, and distinguished himself by the zeal and energy with which he entered into all the enterprises which were calculated to promote the growth and prosperity of the town. Faithful to all with whom he had dealings, honorable and upright to all employees, and in all his relations, social or financial, his conduct was characterized by the utmost frankness and sincerity. He followed closely the policy adopted by his distinguished predecessor, Mr. Seymour, in the management of the bank. He never invested his money in wild speculations, and while president of the bank he uniformly declined loaning any of its funds to its officers, or to those who applied for loans for mere speculative purposes. He condemned the speculative mania which prevailed during his official connection with the bank, and which was urged as a partial justification of various and illegitimate investments, such as cutting up farms into house lots, running up prices beyond reason, and expecting every purchase to yield a profit. The world regarded this as legitimate and justified by the business necessities of the country. Not so Capt. Root. He resisted the policy and denounced it as vain and delusive, and flatly refused to approve any loans for such false and delusive purposes. Time has exposed the folly of the speculative mania which prevailed during the currency inflation, and fully justified Captain Root in denouncing it as a sham and a blunder. He died March 15, 1869, sincerely mourned and regretted by a large circle of relatives and friends.

FREDERICK HOLBROOK.

Ex-Governor Frederick Holbrook was born Feb. 15, 1814. He was the youngest of ten children, who constituted the family of Deacon John Holbrook, and is now the only representative here of this family, which formerly occupied a large sphere of usefulness and effectually exercised a creative power in the forming period of the East village of Brattleboro. The head of this family was so identified with the building up of this place, that it is found impossible to give a history of the same without the association of his name with our account of the causes of the existence and early progress of this village.

The mother of Gov. Holbrook, a lady of genuine christian graces and strength of character, was the daughter of Hon. Luke Knowlton, of Newfane. She moulded to a forming degree the young life of the future governor, who manifested on the very threshold of manhood a love for theoretical and practical agriculture. There was an increasing neglect of this important avocation, upon which our national greatness depends, which so aroused the subject of our sketch that he brought all the powers of his mind to bear upon the subject. His early culture, observing qualities and travels in Europe, enabled him to furnish valuable and interesting articles on the subject of agriculture for the leading journals of the science in the United States; they possessed a charm to a class of readers heretofore indifferent to such matters, and were extensively copied by the local press through the country.

Mr. Holbrook was wary and cautious in advancing new theories. All positions he assumed were thoroughly examined and considered before being submitted to the public. The reflective department of his mental organism and love for truth being largely predominant in his nature, he avoided hasty conclusions; therefore, he seldom, if ever, had occasion to alter or retract any statements he had committed to the hands of the printer. Being a practical as well as a theoretical agriculturalist, his theories were well tested before publication. It does not require superior discrimination to discover in his writings a patriotic animus, a truthfulness and honesty of purpose. He loved to practice as well as to preach, and gentlemen farmers, so-called, were often surprised to find the man, who could so effectually and gracefully wield the pen, holding the plough or reaping his fields.

district of Marlboro, and in 1850 he was elected president of our State Agricultural Society, and held that office eight years. In 1849-'50, his fellow-citizens sent him as Senator from Windham county to the State Legislature, and during his term of office, as chairman of a special committee on agriculture, he projected a petition to Congress for the establishment of a national "Bureau of Agriculture." During the next legislative session at Washington the President of the United States commended the measure proposed, and soon our national department of agriculture became a reality.

His foreign tour, to which brief allusion is made in the foregoing, was in early life, soon after leaving his studies and a short time before steamship navigation of the Atlantic. Over fifty days confinement in a sailing vessel, on his return home, beating against adverse winds, did not give him a rose-colored view of a life on the ocean wave. He suggested to the captain of the ship the employment of steam power in crossing the ocean, but, with a wise shake of the head, the veteran mariner declared the thing impossible.

In this brief presentation of incidents in the life of Mr. Holbrook may be found some of the causes of his elevation to the chair of State in 1861. During his term of office was the darkest period of our national existence. Upon no governor of this State ever rested so grave responsibilities, or of whom was required so arduous, unremitting labors as devolved upon Governor Holbrook and his able cabinet. When gloomy croakers and defenders of rebellion were making every possible effort to weaken the already bleeding hands sustaining our old national ensign, the utterances of Vermont, through her executive, had no uncertain sound to the ear of Lincoln or to his foes. Over 30,000 Vermont soldiers, for the Union army, confirmed those utterances and formed a living wall of steel in protection of that "Star Spangled Banner," which, in the long ago, had so often waved successful defiance to the enemies of liberty, and became a worshiped emblem of our nation's glory. The proclamations of our governor, in that period of peril, were resolute, calm and hopeful, with no sign of flinching or cessation of heavy blows at the active enemies of our government, so long as they continued such. Official declarations of this character from the northern frontier at that time, tended in no small degree to dispel the gloom oft-times surrounding the President and his cabinet. While life was in the extremities of the nation, there was reasonable hope of soundness in the body of the same. The clear light of patriotism, from the distant heights of freedom, pierced through the dark cloud of thieves, spies and assassins infesting the home of Lincoln from the beginning of the rebellion to its close.

Before assuming, and since leaving the chair of State, Mr. Holbrook has declined several invitations to official position, including appointments from the general government. He has never been an office seeker, but when induced to accept of a position, or to commence the accomplishment of any duty, however humble, his consideration, first and last, has been for thoroughness and such action as, in his judgment, would secure the best results.

As chairman of the board of trustees of the Vermont Asylum, he has ever been awake to the best good of the patients and the general welfare of that institution. As a director of the agricultural department, for which he is eminently qualified, his position would be difficult to fill.

In confirmation of some statements in the foregoing sketch of Gov. Holbrook, we give the following extract from his message in the dark hours of 1862:

[Extract from a Vermont paper].

"We should gratefully remember the patriotic devotion manifested by those who, unable to bear arms and endure the hardships and fatigues of the soldier, have nobly aided and encouraged others to do so, contributing liberally of their means to provide for the brave volunteers. The lasting thanks of every patriot are due to the women of Vermont, for so freely giving up their husbands, brothers and sons for the struggle, and their sympathy and zeal in furnishing, in such variety and abundance, the articles of their handiwork, and the delicacies indispensable to the comfort of the camps and hospitals, and to the alleviation of the sufferings of sick and wounded soldiers, lonely and far from kindred and home.

Thus will it ever be with Vermont to the end of the war; she will never falter nor look back, but will press forward, until, if need be, her last dollar is expended, and her last son falls upholding in his dying grasp 'the flag of our Union,' and with his latest breath ejaculating a benediction upon his country."

A large portion of the document is necessarily devoted to the finances of the State. He then reviews the work of raising and equipping the several regiments, and with brief allusions to the several State institutions, to which he has been able to give but little attention, owing to the pressure of other duties. He thus concludes:

"It is an occasion for renewed congratulation that the people of Vermont have again shown their devotion to the cause of the Union, by laying aside, almost unanimously, all considerations of a partisan character, and uniting in earnest support of the National Government, which is charged with the high duty of defending and maintaining that sacred cause. The position of Vermont in this great life struggle of the nation, can neither be questioned nor misunderstood. The blood of her sons has reddened many battle-fields, and their valor and endurance have vindicated her historical renown. Her people admit no thought of concession to, or compromise with, the causeless and wicked rebellion now striking at the vitals of the nation, and their determination is fixed to endure and fight, and sacrifice, till the government, established by the wisdom, the patriotism, and the blood of our fathers, is restored in its beneficent and rightful sway over every portion of the Union.

"The struggle in which the nation is engaged is clearly one of life or death. Even though the scenes of blood and the night of calamity through which we may be called to pass, shall shake the land to its foundations and try us to the utmost, yet, trusting in the God of our fathers, we will not doubt that life is to be the result, and that the nation is to be purified by its trials and established and exalted beyond the expectations of its founders. Our fathers found a great evil, which they deplored, but could not separate from the good. Current events are tending to produce that separation, by uprooting the evil. The rebellion, if persisted in, may be the means, under Providence, of annihilating the institution of slavery, which all acknowledge to have been its cause. The territory of the United States must be preserved in its integrity.

"Neither foreign power nor domestic insurrection can be allowed to establish a rival government within any portion of that territory, and, therefore, all means justified by the ultimate law of self-preservation and compatible with Christian civilization, must be applied to the permanent suppression of the present rebellion. The recent Proclamation of Emancipation by the President of the United States, is a logical result of the slaveholders' rebellion, and as such it is accepted, and will be sustained by all loyal men. It is a 'military necessity,' and has the recommendation to our people of according with both justice and humanity.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"Grave and weighty responsibilities rest upon us in this great crisis. Let us show ourselves equal to our duties. Whatever we have to do, let us do it with one heart and one mind. However humble, we are a part of the American Union, and have a vital interest in its preservation. It is a Union consecrated to Freedom, and it falls to our lot and that of our generation to prove the ability of freemen to defend and preserve our birthright. Our institutions are passing through a baptism of blood. They must and will be maintained at whatever sacrifice; and in the momentous issue which is upon us, neither temporary reverses will discourage, nor partial successes unduly elevate us. Relying upon the incontrovertible justice of our case, the bravery, patriotism and intelligence of the soldiers of the Union, the unconquerable determination, and the spirit of American Liberty actuating the loyal people of the country, we may confidently look forward to and patiently wait the time when our beloved Republic, under the providence of God, shall be re-established in unity and power, and afford a triumphant vindication of the ability of a free people to govern themselves.

FREDERICK HOLBROOK."

HON. SAMUEL CLARK.

[We are indebted to the Rev. Joseph Chandler, of West Brattleboro, for a copy of this sketch, prepared by him for, and read before, the Vermont Historical Society, at its meeting in this village].

Hon. Samuel Clark, a member of this society, whose death at the age of 84 gives occasion for this notice, was for many years a prominent and highly respectable citizen of Brattleboro. He was born in Lebanon, Conn., in that part of the town which is now Columbia, Feb. 28, 1777. His father was Samuel Clark, of Lebanon, son of Timothy Clark of the same town, whose father, with a Mr. Dewey, purchased a tract of land of the Indians, which tract was called, down to a late day, the Clark & Dewey purchase. There is a tradition that the first ancestors of these Clarks in this country came from England in the ship Ann, in the year 1622.

Through his mother, Sarah Cushman, the subject of this notice was a lineal descendant, in the seventh generation, of Robert Cushman, who came to Plymouth, Mass., in 1621, and who, though not a clergyman nor even a "Teaching Elder," prepared and delivered a sermon on Wednesday, Dec. 12, the day before he sailed for England. This was the first sermon delivered in New England that was printed. The main facts of his life, with a list of his descendants in this country, are recorded in the volume of "Cushman Genealogy," prepared by Hon. Henry W. Cushman, of Bernardston, Mass., to which volume we are indebted for the main facts of this sketch.

The family of which our deceased friend was the ninth, consisted of seven sons and four daughters. After the death of his brother Eliphas in 1850, who died at Tolland, Conn., at the age of 82, he was the sole survivor of the family. Till 18 years of age, he labored on his father's farm in Lebanon. Then, after attending a high school for about four months, he went to Massachusetts, and for about three years was engaged in teaching school and as a clerk in a country store in Bernardston, Greenfield and Leyden. He then removed to Dover, Vt., where he resided for some six years, engaged in mercantile business. Sept. 1, 1800, he married Susan Johnson, who was born in September, 1778, in Ellington, Conn., daughter of David Johnson, of Dover, Vt. In 1804, he removed to Guilford, where he prosecuted his business successfully for nine years. In 1813, he went back to Dover, which town, in 1814, he represented in the State Legislature. In 1815, he took up his residence in West Brattleboro, and for about 15 years carried on mercantile business there. In the years 1820-21, and also 1825-26, he was the representative of the town in the Legislature. For three years, commencing with 1827, he was a member of the Council of this State. In 1833 he was first assistant judge of the county court for this county. In 1836 he was a delegate from this town to the convention for revising the Constitution. While in the Legislature, he was chiefly instrumental in obtaining the charter of Brattleboro Bank, of which he was for 20 years following a director. For 13 years he was one of the trustees of the Hospital for the Insane, in this town, and for 35 years was an active member of the Board of Trustees of Brattleboro Academy, ever manifesting a lively interest in the institution by his large contributions for building and other purposes, and by his faithfulness to promote the welfare of the school.

His religious life is supposed to have commenced during the year 1833, at which time, in company with many others, he joined the Congregational Church in West Brattleboro, then under the pastoral care of Rev. Jedediah L. Stark.

He was, in his sphere, a strong man; fitted by nature, and by the wise and diligent use of his energies to exert an influence in society. Though possessed of strong feelings, his judgment was sound and his opinion was much valued by his neighbors. Prudence and sagacity were marked traits in his character. Another pleasing trait was his readiness to make amends for anything done under the impulse of excited feelings, which he was led afterwards to look upon as wrong. He was not one of those men, of assumed infallibility who make it a point never to take back anything, and never to acknowledge themselves mistaken. In many instances where he was called upon to express his opinion and to give his vote, he seldom hesitated to declare himself faithfully and frankly upon the point in question; and almost as often he would express his willingness to acquiesce in the decision of the majority against him. In all matters, however, involving moral principle, or that seemed to him of superlative importance, he was firm and unyielding; and he brought all the energies of his strong and impetuous nature to bear upon the business of maintaining and carrying out his convictions.

His interest in the welfare of the church with which he was connected was deep and unabated to the last. His place in the sanctuary was seldom vacant while health and strength were given him. He was a conscientious, not a captious hearer of preaching. Before the infirmities of age prevented, he was quite regular in his attendance upon the prayer meetings of the church, particularly the monthly concert in which he manifested special interest, and in which he seldom failed to take a part. While he ordinarily gave something to all the ordinary objects of christian benevolence, he felt more deeply the importance of the foreign missionary enterprise than of any other, and his contributions for that object were regular and freely tendered.

His bequests for charitable and public purposes were as follows: To the A. B. C. F. M., $5,000; to the Vermont Dom. Miss. Society, $3,000; to the Am. Colonization Society, $1,000; to the Eccl. Society of the Cong. Church of West Brattleboro, $1,000; to the corporation of Brattleboro, Academy, for maintaining a school for boys, $1,000.

Admonished by the infirmities of age and by several slight attacks of paralysis, that the end was drawing nigh, he arranged his worldly affairs accordingly and "set his house in order." His last illness was short, and he fell asleep April 9, 1861.

EDWARD CROSBY.

Among the enterprising men who have increased the business facilities, public conveniences and beauty of modern Brattleboro, is Edward Crosby, who was born in this town in 1815. Soon after this event his father, Godfrey Crosby, removed with his family to Marlboro in this county. His father was also a native of this town, and was born in 1784. He was of English ancestry, and received what was then called a good education. Beginning at the age of 17, he taught school several terms in succession in the West River district. After serving several years as a clerk in the store of Dea. John Holbrook, he married Sylvia Cune and commenced trade in Dummerston, assisted by Mr. Holbrook, who held him in high estimation. Persons now living heard Mr. Holbrook say, "Godfrey Crosby was a man of superior talents, energetic and faithful in the discharge of trusts, with few equals in penmanship and as an accountant."

The business venture of Mr. Crosby in Dummerston proving unfortunate, he again resorted to school teaching, but died at the early age of 33 years, leaving his family in destitute circumstances. The family at this time consisted of his widow and three children, viz.: Enos, Fanny and Edward.

How well Edward improved the stern lessons of poverty and deprivation of early life, the history of his life in Brattleboro since 1847 will testify. While about half a million of dollars have been annually passing through his hands in the flour trade, requiring unremitting care and responsibility, he has erected three large brick blocks in the heart of the village, the larger building, known as "Crosby Block," containing banks, stores, &c., and the others for mechanical purposes, with steam power and the best of modern conveniences.

In 1879 he finished and opened, for the public accommodation, a large and beautiful hall, known as "Crosby Opera Hall." In 1870-71, he was elected to represent his native town in the State Legislature, thereby giving evidence of public estimation and approval. As he is yet a live, progressive man, in practice as in theories, his future may be even more interesting than the past.

JOHN BURNHAM.*

He was born in Brattleboro, Vt., March 16, 1816; the son of John Burnham and

*"The Yankee genius in the bud," when rescued by Miss Mary Tyler, in 1821. See concluding pages of the Tyler papers.

By J. H. Ball & Co. Boston

John Burnham

Rachel nee Rossiter, both of whom were natives of Connecticut. He is a descendant of Thomas Burnham, who emigrated from England and settled in Hartford, Conn., about 1640. John's educational advantages, very limited in extent, were such as the common schools of his native place would afford. He early developed a fondness for the reading of philosophical works and kindred subjects, but at an early age was obliged to close his studies and assist his father, who was a worker in gold and silver, also a brass founder and coppersmith. Three years he traveled through New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Maine selling and fitting trusses. Going to Ellington, Conn., he there engaged with Mr. Henry McCray in the pump business, and soon began the sale of the now well-known "hydraulic ram." He continued in this business until he was nearly 30 years of age, and during that time found so many who wanted running water, where they had not fall enough to use the ram, that his attention was diverted to the wind as a motive power. Here was the power of millions of horses, sweeping through the heavens over every man's farm throughout the known world, and might be utilized to the saving of human, the dearest of all labor. It was this thought that inspired him and urged him on to the prosecution of that invention which has more than met his most hopeful expectations.

There was at that time no manufactory of small wind mills in this country, and probably none in the world, the reason Mr. Burnham divined to be the difficulty in producing a machine that could stand the strong winds, and he felt that if this difficulty could be obviated, the success of such a machine would be certain. Feeling that he had but limited abilities as an inventor, he applied to Mr. Daniel Halladay, then conducting a small machine shop in the village, and after several times calling his attention to the subject, received from him the following reply:

"I can invent a self-regulating wind mill that will be safe from all danger of destruction in violent wind storms; but after I should get it made, I don't know of a single man in all the world who would want one."

Being assured by Burnham that he would find men who wanted them, he began and soon produced a self-regulating wind mill. The two now united in the enterprise, and soon organized a joint stock company in South Coventry, Conn., with Mr. Halladay as superintendent and Mr. Burnham as general agent. The wonderful growth of the enterprise is abundantly shown in the following fact: When the machine was first entered at a State fair for a premium, it had to be entered as a miscellaneous article, as no such thing had ever been entered on a fair ground for a premium. To-day they are seen at every State and County fair throughout the country, while millions are invested in their manufacture, and they have become a common article for pumping at railroad water stations, on farms, and also for running farm machinery, and during six or eight years past they have been successfully used for flouring mill purposes, a single machine being sufficient to run three sets of burrs. The flour produced is, in quality, equal to that manufactured by steam or water power, and is furnished at a much less expense.

In 1856, Mr. Burnham removed to Chicago where he resided eight years. He there made the acquaintance of John Van Nortwick, Esq., a noted western capitalist and railroad manager, who, after examining Mr. Halladay's invention, induced some of his friends to join him in forming a joint stock company, entitled "The United States Wind Engine and Pump Company," with himself as president and general manager, Daniel Halladay as superintendent, and Mr. Burnham as general agent. Up to the present time, (1876), $3,000,000 worth of the Halladay Standard Mills have been sold.

Since the beginning of railroads, civil engineers have deemed the tank house, fuel and attendance, at water stations in northern climates, indispensable, and it is estimated that over $20,000,000 have been expended for this purpose. This became a serious objection to the use of the wind mill, as large tanks had to be provided to hold water sufficient to last through unusual calms; and to remove this objection, Mr. Burnham began experimenting, with a view of producing a frost-proof tank. For some time he met only with discouragement, as he could not induce a road to allow him to even try his experiment, and finally accomplished his purpose through a director of one of the railroads, who was a stockholder in the wind mill company. The first frost-proof tank has now been in use during five winters without house, fuel or attendance, and the road which adopted the improvement has already made a saving of more than $150,000, and the universal use into which this improvement is now coming, will, in the next quarter of a century, produce to the railroads of this country a saving of $25,000,000. Mr. Burnham attributes the success of his life not only to perseverance, untiring industry and an extensive business acquaintance throughout almost every State in the Union, but also to the superior mechanical and financial abilities of the men with whom he has been associated in business. Of the four patents which he has obtained, this last he considers by far the most important."

This native of our village, whose name has found creditable record, as will be seen by the foregoing extract, commenced his wandering from home at a very early age. To restrain his natural inclination for traveling, when about two years of age, he was fastened at one end of a long rope, but he would keep the rope straitened, and his constant cries obtained his liberation. His infantile journey, in 1821, was towards the western prairies—the arena of his fame to-day—when he was discovered and restored to his parents by that good angel of all the little ones—Miss Mary Tyler.

HON. GEORGE NEWMAN.

Mr. Newman was, in his younger days, one of the early efficient mechanics of Brattleboro. When a boy he learned the trade of carriage making of Capt. Adolphus Stebbins at the West Village. We first knew him in 1828, when he was employed by Elihu H. Thomas in the manufacture of fanning mills at the south part of the East Village. In 1830 he was employed by Messrs. Thomas & Woodcock, near the time, or at the time, they commenced the manufacture of pulp dressers and other machinery used for paper making. He was one of their principal workmen, and in a few years thereafter succeeded them in this business, connected with which was an iron foundry, blacksmithing, clothier's shop, saw-mill and grist-mill. In this important business, for the time and place, he was in co-partnership with Col. A. J. Hines and Roswell Hunt, Esq. At one period, Lewis Newman, Gouverneur Morris, Esq., and Brinsmade, of Troy, N. Y., were interested in the business. Until a recent date, Mr. Newman continued at the head of the business, which finally all came into the possession of himself and family, under the name of George Newman & Son. Without pretension or apparent effort for popularity or office, he became eminent and office was thrust upon him. However much people differed in opinion about other matters, all believed in George Newman. He died Sept. 11, 1872.

In the Vermont Phoenix, of Sept. 13, 1872, appeared the following obituary notice of him:

"DEATH OF GEORGE NEWMAN.—Geo. Newman, one of the oldest and most respected citizens of Brattleboro, died at his residence, Wednesday morning, of heart disease, after a brief illness, at the age of 74. Mr. Newman had been a resident of this town for more than 60 years. Born at Seekonk, Mass., he removed with his parents, at an early age, to Marlboro, Vt., whence he came to this place a mere lad. The history of his life is in large measure identified with that of the town of which he has so long been an honored resident. He served many years as lister, town treasurer and selectman, and for two years represented the town in the Legislature. As proprietor of the machine shop, engaged in the manufacture of paper machinery, with which he was associated from 1837 to 1865, his name was familiar to many people in various parts of the country, and the respect with which he was regarded was universal. Evidence of this may be seen in the frequency with which he was called upon to settle estates. Probably no man in the county has administered upon so many estates as he. For more than 20 years he was an officer of the Windham Provident Institution for Savings, and for the last two years was its treasurer. He was also one of the original members of the Unitarian Church in this village, of which he ever remained a prominent and liberal supporter. Ever ready to oblige a neighbor or assist the needy, kindly in all his relations, and without an enemy in the world, the influence of his genial life will not soon pass away, nor his memory be forgotten."

HON. EDWARD KIRKLAND.

He was the son of Samuel and Dorcas Kirkland; was born in Warwick, Mass., June 24, 1808, graduated at Amherst College in 1831, studied law in Worcester, under the direction of Judge Merrick, during the first three years after graduation. He then located himself in Templeton, Mass., where he practised successfully in the legal profession until 1838. He undertook a business agency for the Brattleboro Typographic Co., and removed to Louisville, Ky., where he remained till 1842, when he returned to the East and resumed the practice of law in Brattleboro. The last two or three years of his life were marked by a gradual decay of his bodily and mental powers, owing to repeated attacks of paralysis, which terminated his useful and Christian life, Jan. 6, 1866.

Mr. Kirkland was successful in his profession, and useful as a citizen and public spirited man, always ready to lend his hand and heart for the promotion of good objects, whether political or religious. He was several times elected a member of the Legislature of Vermont. For two years he was a member of the Vermont Senate. He was often active in the labors of political campaigns, and was a good deal in demand as a "stump" orator.

In answer to a letter from the class committee, Rev. Dr. George P. Tyler, of Brattleboro, writes: "During 12 years in which I was his pastor, he was a prompt, useful, faithful member of the church. In the various causes of Christian benevolence, he was energetic and generous. He was thoroughly acquainted with the great foreign and domestic missionary enterprises and promoted them with constant effort and success. As a lawyer, he stood among the first; as a citizen, he was often intrusted with public duties at home, and represented his town in the State Legislature with great credit. Beyond his professional studies, Mr. Kirkland was a man of much literary culture, fond of historical studies and belles-lettres. He left a considerable library of carefully selected books of this character. He devoted a good deal of time to biblical research, and always taught a Bible class, and for several years superintended four Sabbath school. Such a man could not fail to be missed from the bar, the church and the community. As a Christian, he felt deeply his unworthiness, but while his mind remained he exercised a full, and I believe, a saving trust in his justification through faith in the Lord Jesus."

His life was marked repeatedly by sad scenes of desolating bereavement, which put in requisition the supports of a Christian faith and which he met as a Christian. Mr. Kirkland was married to Miss Catherine P. Robinson, of Templeton, Mass., May 24, 1836, who died in Louisville, Ky., April 15, 1840. He was married to Miss Frances S. M. Robinson, of Templeton, Mass., Oct. 31, 1844, who died in Brattleboro, Vt., Oct. 12, 1858. He was married to Miss Mary Slate, of Bernardston, Mass., in October, 1859. He left three children, the eldest, bearing his name, was born in April, 1861. His widow and three children now (1879) live in this town.

An obituary notice of his death says: "He died at his residence in Brattleboro. He was a native of Huntington, Mass., and a graduate of Amherst College, and has been for 24 years a resident of this town. He was an able and successful lawyer, and held in high esteem by all who knew him. Was a State Senator in 1863, and was a member of the House from Brattleboro. He was well known throughout the County and State, and was reckoned on the list of the late Senator Collamer's intimate friends. His age was 58 years."

GEORGE C. HALL.

George Chandler Hall was born in this village on the spot now occupied by the Baptist Church, Feb. 17, 1828; died at his residence on Clinton avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., April 26, 1872. He was the son of Gardner C. Hall,* of this town, who was also born here, and who for nearly 40 years

*Gardner Chandler Hall was born in Brattleboro, Oct. 12, 1795. Julia Ann Leavitt was born in Suffield, Conn., Jan. 27, 1806. The persons above named were married Oct. 6, 1823, and there were born to them eight children, of whom George C. Hall, the subject of this sketch, was one.

occupied a prominent business and social position in this community, and won for himself a state-wide reputation for enlightened enterprise and sterling integrity, which he transmitted, not in vain, as it but too often happens, to his sons. Up to the commencement of his sixteenth year, George was kept constantly in the village schools, then recently remodelled on the improved system now existing, and no better illustration of the thoroughness of the training therein prevailing can be afforded than by young Hall.

In 1844, his father placed him with the firm of Carruth & Whittier, Boston, wholesale dealers in drugs, oils, paints, &c., where he served a long apprenticeship, and commenced to form those habits of system, energy and strict personal attention which marked his after life and led to fortune.

In 1851, Mr. Hall, then about 23 years of age, removed to New York and soon engaged in the manufacture and sale of paints, dealing mainly in white lead, and subsequently established the now well known firm of Hall, Bradley & Co., than which no business house in the city enjoys a higher reputation for liberality, commercial integrity and financial soundness. He continued in this firm, as its senior partner, until his death.

In 1868, after much solicitation on the part of the late Col. Fisk and his associates in the management of the Erie railway, who had personal knowledge of his especial fitness for the place, Mr. Hall consented to accept the responsible and laborious position of purchasing agent of that road, wherein his strong will, personal independence, thorough knowledge of men and business, and especially his eminent executive ability, found full scope, and soon made themselves felt in results so favorable to the financial condition of the company as to render his services a necessity thereafter, and to compel him to continue in the position, despite his repeatedly expressed wish to retire, up to the time of his death. He had also been a director of the road for nearly three years; but, fully occupied by the special duties of his own department, he gave little attention to, and assumed no responsibility for, the general management and policy of the company. These, it was well understood, were in the exclusive control of an "inner circle" of the directory, to which Mr. Hall and several of his associates neither sought nor obtained admission, and of whose intentions and plans, until disclosed and developed by acts, they knew nothing. In the final overthrow of Jay Gould and the late notorious "Erie ring," however, Col. Hall played an important part, and was one of the three directors in the old board who commanded the full confidence of the rightful owners, now in authority in that corporation, and was consequently retained by them, both in his position as director and purchasing agent. It was, however, his firm purpose, at a near period in the future, to withdraw entirely from his connection with the company, with a view to devote the leisure thus secured to duties and pursuits more congenial to his personal tastes.

Though avoiding all active participation in public life, Col. Hall occupied a prominent social position in Brooklyn, where he resided, and took a lively personal interest in many of the enterprises intended to improve and adorn that city. He was the most active projector of the Prospect Park Association; was a member of the Art Association, and of several other clubs and associations.

Funeral services were held at his late residence in Brooklyn, the officiating clergyman being Rev. Dr. Buddington, (Congregationalist), assisted by Rev. Dr. Farley, (Unitarian), and were attended by a large concourse of prominent citizens, all testifying to the high esteem in which he was held in the city of his adoption. In the absence of Rev. Mr. Jenkins, the funeral services at Brattleboro, the following Sunday, in the Congregational Church, were conducted by Rev. Mr. Noyes, Unitarian clergyman, of Northfield, Mass. The church, the largest in town, could not hold the people, and his remains were borne tenderly to their final home in the beautiful grounds on Cemetery Hill, by his life-long associates and friends, and placed beside those of his three children, who had preceded him on the journey whence there is no return. He left a wife, two daughters and a son; also his mother, two brothers and a sister. He had accumulated an ample fortune, which he disposed of by will.

He was moulded on a large scale. His physical structure—large, compact, powerful—was a type of the whole man, and was the fitting abode of a head and heart of like proportions, all obedient to a will that yielded to no common obstacle. Endowed thus bountifully with all the strong elements of manhood, he did nothing weakly. Earnest and tenacious in the pursuit of desired ends, he rarely failed in attaining them. To his great strength was joined a remarkable quickness of perception and promptness in execution, qualities seldom found in one of his mould. He was essentially a fair-minded and just man, hating all shams and all forms of hypocrisy and meanness with a hatred that knew no bounds. Like most men of strong feeling and will, he was often impatient and sometimes imperious; but his strong sense of justice restrained him, even then, from serious wrong doing, and those who knew him best realized that his occasional brusqueness of manner seldom had a rough purpose, and not unfrequently concealed the kindest thoughts and intentions. His open-handed liberality is known to all, though but few of his constant acts of kindness and generosity have been heralded abroad. His tender affection for his family—for wife, children, sisters, brothers, and especially for his widowed mother, from whom he inherited many of his marked physical and mental traits, was deep and enduring and found constant expression, more in deeds than words. To his younger brothers and sister, on the death of his father many years ago, he acted a father's as well as an elder brother's part, and their preparation for and establishment in life, as their circumstances required, was his especial care. Among the strongest characteristics of his strong nature were his remarkable local attachments and his never-changing affection for his friends. Though he went out from among us while yet a boy, he never ceased to regard the place of his birth and the scene of his youthful trials and pleasures, as the one spot on all the earth most to be desired and cherished. No project having in view the interests and welfare of his native town, ever appealed to him in vain. He had already done much for her material advancement, but it is within the knowledge of many, that he looked forward with peculiar pleasure to other and greater benefits he might bestow. In his death Brattleboro has lost a dutiful son and a most hearty and generous friend.

HON. B. D. HARRIS.

COL. ARNOLD J. HINES

Was born in Guilford, Vt., Jan. 28, 1805, married Sarah, daughter of Ezekiel Gore, of Bernardston, Mass., in 1827. Two daughters of this union are still living—Mrs. Mary J. Cutler and Mrs. Sarah A. Morrill—a son having died in infancy. His wife died March 14, 1835. In 1837, he married Maria L. Brown, granddaughter of Gamaliel Arnold, of Dummerston Hill, who still (1879) survives him. The result of this union was a daughter, Mrs. Julia M. Wilder, and a son, George A. Hines. His father, Thomas Hines, was by trade a millwright and the favorite right hand man of Dea. John Holbrook in establishing his first mechanical operations in this village, and in 1829, Arnold and his father removed to this place, where the remainder of their lives was passed.

Arnold J. Hines, as captain of the old artillery and colonel in the old Vermont State militia, in the declining days of our military organization, proved worthy to lead a "forlorn hope." He was prominent in the fire department, in securing the first village charter, and was one of the original members of the Prospect Hill Cemetery Association. As a principal or important actor in establishing and sustaining the only religious organization in this village south of Whetstone Brook, he will be long and gratefully remembered. In religion he was a firm believer in the final restoration of all mankind to holiness. In politics he was a strong anti-slavery Democrat until the christening of the Republican party, of which, it may be said, he was one of its original members. His last days, which were days of suffering, were characterized by the heroic resignation and tender patience which might be expected from a man of his large and generous nature, and his last effort, just as he was entering the valley of shadows, was a pleasant word and smile to a ministering friend.

[From the Vermont Phoenix.]

"He was for twenty-five years the senior partner of the well and widely known firm of Hines, Newman & Co.,

iron founders and machinists. In the responsible and too often thankless labors of the fire department, village and school offices, he was often employed, and his efforts therein were largely instrumental in giving character to this village. He was a man of excellent judgment, of good business habits, and his advice was frequently sought and highly appreciated by his townsmen. In all the relations of life, he was a man of integrity of character, combined with a geniality of disposition that commanded the respect and affection of his fellow-citizens no less than of his more intimate associates and friends. The existence of an internal tumor, which was rapidly developing, led him, about a year before his death, to retire from business and close up his worldly affairs. The tumor terminated his life April 6, 1862. An examination disclosed the fact that it was a fleshy, fibrinous substance, with several attachments to the abdomen. "It weighed 78 pounds. All the other organs of the body were in a sound condition, except as they were displaced by this monstrous tumor."

It seems that a large share of his nutriment was, in some mysterious way, diverted from its legitimate purpose to increasing the size of this formation. This sad case, so remarkable and without precedent here or elsewhere, so far as we know, is deemed worthy of record.

DR. CHARLES CHAPIN

Was born at Orange, Mass., July 10, 1803, but his father, Judge Oliver Chapin, a soldier of the Revolution, removed to Brattleboro almost directly afterwards, where he continued to reside and to act a prominent part in business and public affairs during the remainder of his life.

Dr. Chapin was fitted for college by Rev. Dr. Coleman, and graduated from Harvard University in 1823, when 20 years old. He went through the usual course of studies for the medical profession under the direction of the celebrated Dr. Bigelow, of Boston, and commenced the practice of medicine in Springfield, Mass., in 1826. In 1827, he married Elizabeth B. Bridge, of Charlestown, Mass., by whom he had one child, Elizabeth Alice, who married Joseph Clark in 1846 or '47.

In 1830, his first wife having died, he married Sophia Dwight Orne, of Springfield, by whom he had five children—Lucinda Orne, Oliver Howard, Mary Wells, William Orne and Charles Jones—all now (1878) living. In 1831, Dr. Chapin removed to Brattleboro, and soon after gave up the practice of medicine and thereafter devoted himself to business and public affairs, filling many public offices with credit and fidelity. He was a member of the legislature in 1833, and was for a long time deputy sheriff and the most active officer of that kind in the county. He was United States Marshal during the administration of President Pierce, and for many years was one of the efficient directors of the Vermont Mutual Insurance Company. He was one of the first members and organizers of the Unitarian Society of this place, and for 25 years was a favorite moderator and presiding officer at town meetings and other public gatherings, and his services were in frequent request to conduct funerals. For many years, and until infirmities forbade, he was the very acceptable and efficient chief engineer of our fire department; also a director of the Vermont Valley Railroad Company when their road was being constructed, in 1850, and at the same period a clerk of the company.

Dr. Chapin was an active, energetic, influential and useful man in this community for nearly 40 years, and whatever was given him to do was always well and faithfully done. During a period of several years after resigning his medical practice, his advice in council was deemed of importance by the profession. Nature had indeed been lavish in giving him excellence of form and feature, a good constitution and a commanding presence; high spirited, quick of apprehension, honorable and just in his dealings with all men, possessing all the advantages which education, wealth, social culture and position give, his influence was wide and enduring. While not without faults, his virtues were of the manly sort which command universal esteem. Suffering about seven years from paralysis, he died on the 47th anniversary of his second marriage, Jan. 6, 1878.—Extract from the writings of Chas. K. Field.

HON. ASA KEYES

Was born in Putney, Vt., May 30, 1787. His father was Deacon Israel Keyes. He fitted for college in the then somewhat famous Chesterfield, N. H., Academy, and graduated at Dartmouth in 1810. He engaged in teaching for a couple of years, then studied law with Judge Phineas White, of Putney, and one year with Ebenezer Rockwood, of Boston. He was admitted to the Windham County bar in 1814; married Sarah Britton, of Chesterfield, N. H., Jan. 7, 1815. He practiced law at Putney until 1833, when he removed to Brattleboro, where he has ever since resided. He early became a Mason and was for a time W. M. of Golden Rule Lodge in Putney.

He has held, and what is better, filled many official positions; he represented Putney in the lower branch of the legislature in 1826 and 1827, and Brattleboro in 1835. Was a senator of Windham County in 1855 and 1856, and both years a prominent member of the judiciary committee. He was Judge of Probate for the Westminster district while residing in Putney, and that position gave him the title of "Judge," which he has since borne. He was also, for a number of years, Register of Probate for the Westminster district, and for 15 years preceding 1879, Register of the Marlboro district. He has been a Justice of the Peace "since a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Was a trustee of the Windham Provident Institution for Savings from its origin, and of the Vermont Savings Bank since the change of name. He drew the will of Mrs. Marsh, the founder of the Vermont Asylum, and was for 35 years a trustee of that institution. He framed the charter for that institution and secured its passage through the legislature.

Judge Keyes early stepped into the front rank of his profession and always stayed there. The bar of Windham County has always been an able one, and he did his part for more than half a century to keep the standard of excellence high. Though not eminent as a jury advocate, he was a successful practitioner; he was a good draughtsman, a skillful pleader, and the best equity lawyer in Southern Vermont, if not in the whole State. His Supreme Court briefs are models for other practitioners; he was always listened to attentively by the courts, for he never talked unless he had something to say. He was studious and painstaking, faithful to his clients and honest with the court. He was a good husband, a kind father, and always faithful to every trust; he never attained to wealth. The income arising from the practice of his profession he spent freely in his family, and gave generously to the church he attended, to public objects and to the poor and needy, as many among them can testify.

He is now, (March 22, 1879), nearly 92 years old, but still a healthy, vigorous old gentleman; he is the oldest living graduate of Dartmouth College, the oldest lawyer in Vermont, the oldest Mason and the oldest justice of the peace. His good, vigorous old age is due in part to a healthy constitution, but mainly to his temperate and methodical habits. Though never a "total abstainer," he has ever been temperate and abstemious in both eating and drinking. He always loved his pipe and a game of whist. To those who know him best, his conversation is still entertaining and instructive.

Of his four children, one is the wife of Judge Royall Tyler of this village; another, a faithful daughter, who cares for her father in his declining years; a son, Judge George B. Keyes, died in California two years since, and another daughter, deceased, was the wife of Dr. F. N. Palmer, of Boston, Mass.

CHAS. N. DAVENPORT.

HON. JONATHAN DORR BRADLEY,

Son of Hon. William C. Bradley, of Westminster, Vt., was born in Westminster, Vt., in 1803; was a graduate of Yale College and fitted for the legal profession; was married to Susan Crossman in 1829, and first practiced law at Bellows Falls, but the most of his professional life—about 30 years—was passed in Brattleboro, where he died in September, 1862. His widow and four sons are now, (1878), living. William C., a graduate of Harvard in 1851, and Richards now reside in this place. Stephen Rowe lives in New York and is of the firm of Hall, Bradley & Co., extensive manufacturers of white lead. Arthur C. graduated at Amherst, class of 1876.

The subject of our sketch was a grandson of Hon. Stephen R. Bradley, who was one of the foremost men of Vermont a hundred years ago. Before our State was a member of the Union, he rendered important services in resisting her enemies, and was highly fitted by nature and cultivation to advocate our claims—the right to exist as a State in the Union—against the determined opposition of New York. How grandly and triumphantly he assisted our infant State in her early struggles, has long since been recorded in history. [See Hall's History of Eastern Vermont]. During, and years before, the declaration of war with England in 1812,* he was United States Senator from this State, and his son, William C.,—the father of J. Dorr Bradley—was elected Representative to Congress a short time after the close of said war.

Hon. Jonathan Dorr Bradley, in some specialties, had no equal in his profession in this county, if in the State. His knowledge of mechanics—extensive scientific attainments and willingness to impart the same to others—rendered him an almost inexhaustible source of information upon matters often imperfectly understood by the learned, as well as those of more ordinary attainments. To thoroughly understand the laws governing the production of the natural and artificial, or the discovery and bringing to light a hidden or obscure truth, seemed to be the greatest pleasure of his life. Pecuniary motives had but little if anything to do with his scientific labors, so far as he was personally concerned, but he gladly and freely furnished theories for the practical. Those who have met him, in controversy at the bar or elsewhere, have learned that his mental exercises in the sciences did not render him a less formidable antagonist in debate.

In the days of Andrew Jackson he acted with the democracy, but he was not a radical, or so governed by prejudice as not to candidly weigh and examine the views of his opponents. His devotion to truth was ardent and unremitting, and he was always ready to "Seize upon truth where e'er 'tis found,

On Christian or on heathen ground;
The plant's divine where e'er it grows,
Amongst our friends or 'mongst our foes,"

It became so apparent that the Democratic party had lost all claim to that name, by following John C. Calhoun to death and destruction, Mr. Bradley early left the sinking ship, and ever after acted with the dominant party in this State in sustaining the old flag, and shortly before our civil war—in 1856–57—he represented this town in the State Legislature. It was there he became noted by his able action in the State House question. There was healing in his presence before tumultuous assemblies and heated clashing of opinions. He was on the first board of directors of the Vermont & Massachusetts Railroad Co., and no one in this place exerted so powerful an influence in forwarding the construction of that road to Brattleboro. His simple presence at railroad meetings in towns on the route was to all a harbinger of success; but when came forth in earnest tones his arguments, honest convictions and prophecies, all doubts of success vanished. Difficulties or opposition only aroused him to greater efforts, and those efforts did not cease until the occasion for them passed away.

As memory calls up the early days of his advent here, we see him, as if but yesterday, at the Village Lyceum. From his inexhaustible mental resources came forth telling arguments, with playful sallies of wit, compelling a general laughter of the audience, more beneficial to the dyspeptic portion than all the patent medicines ever invented. Nor can we ever forget, when addressing a juvenile assembly, how he held the attention of little boys and girls, who would seem to see nothing but his genial countenance, and hear nothing but his words of wisdom, so attractively and ingeniously adapted to their comprehension. Upon one such occasion, in the Goodhue oak grove, in July, 1842, a stranger to Mr. Bradley, from Ohio, remarked, at the conclusion of Mr. Bradley's address, as follows:

"The gentleman who gave the last address has uttered the fewest words, but he has really said more than the five gentlemen who have preceded him. He is certainly a Christian, for he has given us the whole law and gospel. Who is he and what is his business?"

We replied: "He is a lawyer by profession, and his name is J. D. Bradley. If he is a Christian, I think he is not conscious of it, for he belongs to no church, and is rarely seen in attendance upon religious exercises."

"Real Christians," said he, "are the last ones to know it of themselves, but their light may so shine that others may know it. When you find a man who is quite positive he is a Christian, you may well be on the lookout for him. There never was a face like Mr. Bradley's on a bad man."

Perfect master of the science of adaptation to all grades of intellect, Mr. Bradley's remarks always found attentive listeners. The countenances of the hod-carrier, mechanic, scholar, farmer and merchant all assumed a more happy and elevated expression so long as the sound of his voice could be heard. His young professional brethren will ever gratefully remember the information imparted to them by him, in so modest and inquiring a manner, as to make it seem he was the learner and prevent, so far as possible, a feeling of obligation from his inferiors. After some 25 years practice of the law, his friend Roswell M. Field, a noted lawyer of St. Louis, reproved him for not giving the Yankee proof of success in life.

"Roswell," said he, "I have laid up my treasures in Heaven, where moth and rust doth not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal."

Several instances could be given where he, in his intercourse with mankind, faithfully obeyed the instructions in Proverbs, chapter 25, verse 5. We will give one instance of his ready wit:

Coming hastily into the law office of Mr. F., he enquired for Chitty on Contracts.

"What do you wish to know?" replied Mr. F., placing one finger on his forehead, "I carry my book here."

"I see," said Mr. Bradley, "bound in calf."

Near the close of a warm day in July, 1837, a prominent citizen of the village became highly excited in denouncing a lecturer upon slavery. Wiping the perspiration from his brow, he said to Mr. Bradley:

"A man who will lecture about the country, forming abolition societies, deserves a coat of tar and feathers, and I hope Tyler will be ridden out of town on a rail before to-morrow night."

Mr. Bradley calmly replied: "I think among our societies we need one more, and I would suggest it be a keep cool society."

In conversation with a neighbor, upon the cultivation of plums, Mr. Bradley said: "I know the curculio is considered a formidable obstacle to the culture of plums, but to a certain extent they are needful to prevent a too great abundance of fruit. When they appear in excess, we must fight them, and if they are smarter than we are they will get all the plums, to which they are entitled, by the same rule governing in transactions of far greater importance."

[The following we received from Wm. C., eldest son of Mr. Bradley]:

"The late J. Dorr Bradley, soon after he entered on his professional career, received the gift from a friend of a noble mastiff, named Jowler, to which he became much attached. About that time a motion was made in the legislature to tax dogs, which gave rise to the following jeu d'esprit from his pen. The effect was to defeat the motion, and it was laid aside for many years; indeed, until he became a member himself, when it was again introduced, and he recited, at the request of a colleague, the lines to Jowler, with the same effect as before. Since his decease it has passed into a law. There is a likeness of Jowler in the possession of J. D. Bradley's family, painted by his friend Fisher."

TO MY DOG JOWLER.

Jowler! they have taxed you, honest friend!

Assessed you, put you in the roll,

To exile every dog they'll send,

Unless some friend will pay his poll.

By all that's good, the rascals meant

Betwixt us two to breed a strife,

And drive you into banishment,

Or bribe your friend to take your life.

But Jowler, don't you be alarmed!

If politicians do neglect you,

Confound their tax! you shan't be harmed,

I know your worth and I'll protect you!

But taxes by the constitution
 Convey the right to represent,
 So, dogs, by this same resolution,
 Might just as well as men be sent.

Now, dogs and men and voters hear!
 That Jowler's put in nomination
 To go, upon the coming year,
 And aid in public legislation.

Jowler, avoid the demagogues,
 Keep out of the minority;
 Take care to smell of other dogs,
 And vote with the majority.

How he was regarded by his most intimate friends and members of the legal profession in this State, may be learned by the action of a meeting of the bar of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, holden at Rutland, on the 3rd day October, 1862. Hon. Lucius B. Peck was called to the chair.

On motion of H. E. Stoughton, Esq., E. J. Phelps, A. P. Lynian and Horace Allen, Esqs., were appointed a committee to report appropriate resolutions relative to the decease of Hon. J. Dorr Bradley, of Brattleboro. On motion, Mr. Stoughton was added to the committee. The committee reported the following resolutions:

Resolved. That the members of this bar have heard, with profound sensibility and regret, the announcement of the death of Hon. J. Dorr Bradley, since the last term of this court.

Resolved. That it is due to his memory that this occasion should not be allowed to pass without placing upon record, as the unanimous and deliberate judgment of his brethren throughout this State, that the profession to which his life was devoted loses in his death one of its most valuable members and most admired ornaments.

Resolved. That we shall cherish an un-failing and grateful remembrance, which none who knew him would willingly forget, of his distinguished abilities as an advocate, his varied and elegant acquirements as a scholar, his genial and attractive qualities as a man; and shall recall with a sad pleasure, in the scenes from which he has departed, those professional labors we shared with him, enriched on his part by learning so complete, by wit so rare and sense so full, and inspired always by so thorough an appreciation of what belonged to the lawyer and the gentleman.

Resolved. That these resolutions and the proceedings of this meeting be presented to the court, with the request of the bar that they be allowed to be entered on the minutes, and that the clerk of the court be desired to transmit a copy to the family of the deceased, and to furnish copies for publication.

E. J. PHELPS, for Committee.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the meeting adjourned.

LUCIUS B. PECK, Chairman.

CLERK'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES }
 CIRCUIT COURT, DIST. OF VERMONT. }

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true copy of record.

B. B. SMALLEY, Clerk.

[From the Vermont Watchman of Sept. 19th, 1862:

"It is with great sorrow that we record the death of this distinguished gentleman, at his residence in Brattleboro, on the 9th inst. We learn that he was taken severely ill with fever some three weeks since, and that his disease made rapid progress, until it quenched one of the most cultivated intellects and genial hearts that our State has produced. He had a discerning, rapid and comprehensive mind, an elegant and varied culture. He was quick and ardent in his sympathies, a lover of truth and justice, and a fervid hater of all shams and hypocrisy. He was a member, for Brattleboro, of the House of Representatives for two years, in which the State House controversy was waged, and distinguished himself as leader in debate in that most brilliant conflict.

"If it had not been for his deafness, which prevented his hearing all points of discussion, no man that Vermont has produced would have surpassed him in the debate in the halls of legislation. But whatever might have been the qualities that fitted him for a public career, he was most eminent in social and private life. His rare store of information and culture were open to his friends, and he had few equals in the genial exchanges and conversations of social life. His reading was extensive and recherche, his memory was retentive, his style of conversation was playful and captivating and always appropriate to his theme, his perceptions were quick and vivid, his illustrations apt and beautiful, and his whole air and manner reminded us of the school of elder times in which he had his training. The death of such a man is a public calamity, and in common with his nearer associates and neighbors and friends, we would lay a small tribute of our high appreciation of his worth upon his fresh made grave."

We omitted to state that Hon. Stephen R. Bradley was the first U. S. Senator chosen from Vermont.

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT,

The eldest son of Hon. Jonathan Hunt, of Vernon, Vt., and Jane Maria Leavitt, of Suffield, Conn., from whose maternal side he inherited his genius for art, was born in Brattleboro, Vt., March 31, 1824.

Upon the death of his father, in 1832, his mother removed from Brattleboro with her family to New Haven, Conn., where William was placed at Mr. Skinner's school. He very early showed skill in drawing, and several finely drawn sketches and even small cameo heads are preserved in the family, done by him previous to his tenth year.

In New Haven, Signor Gambadella, an Italian gentleman who had fled from Italy during the troublesome times of Silvio Pellico, was engaged to give William his first regular instructions in drawing.

In 1839, he was prepared for college by Mr. William Wells, of Cambridge, Mass., and was matriculated at Harvard in 1840. Owing to a pulmonary difficulty during his senior year, a change of climate was recommended by his physicians, and Oct. 9, 1843, he accompanied his mother and family to Europe. As his life henceforward was devoted to art, a sketch of his career as an artist will best define the limits of this paper.

The winter and spring of 1843-44, was spent in Rome, where he applied himself to the study of drawing and sculpture. During the summer, he traveled through Switzerland on horseback, visited Paris and many places of interest in England, and in the spring of 1845 went to Athens and Constantinople. In 1845 he entered the Art Academy of Dusseldorf, where he devoted himself exclusively to anatomy and drawing, and not liking the style of this school, he did not join the class in painting. While in Dusseldorf he lived in the family of Leutze, the artist, and held most friendly relations with Lessing, Sohn, Schrödter, and other notable men of that school.

At this time Lessing was painting his picture, "The Martyrdom of John Huss," and selected the head and figure of his friend Hunt as a model for the martyr.

He passed the summer of 1846 in America, then returned to Paris. Preferring the French method in painting, Mr. Hunt entered the studio of Thomas Couture in the spring of 1848. Here for a year or more he worked in the scholar's room, when, at the suggestion of his master, he took a large studio with Couture in the "rue de la Tour des Dames," formerly occupied by Horace Vernet. While working here he made his first exhibition in the French "salon," and his pictures of "The Prodigal Son" and "The Fortune Teller" received very favorable public notice. At the next annual exhibition he sent to the "salon," amongst others, his picture of the "Marguerite." This picture was marked for purchase on the private list of Napoleon, but owing to political troubles no paintings were bought by him that year.

At this time he became acquainted with Jean Francois Millet, then living in the hamlet of Barbison in the forest of Fontainebleau. Between them a strong friendship was formed that resulted in Hunt's going to Barbison to study near his friend. Here or in Paris he continued to work for several years, purchasing, meanwhile, many of Millet's pictures long before the latter had acquired his pre-eminent European reputation. The genius of no living artist seems to have impressed Hunt so strongly as the grand simplicity of Millet.

To the first Universal Exposition, held in Paris in 1855, Mr. Hunt sent several pictures, "The Violet Girl" and "Girl at the Fountain," which were pronounced by Theophile Gautier the best in the American department.

Returning to America in 1855, he married Miss Perkins, of Boston, and passed a year in Brattleboro, Vt., and thence went to reside in Newport, R. I., spending, however, a winter with friends in the Azores—1857-58.

A ludicrous incident occurred at this time, when several of his pictures, that had received praiseworthy comments from the Parisian press, were sent to our National Academy. These were mentioned by the art critics of New York, of that day, as decidedly the worst specimens of art in the exhibition, with the exception, perhaps, of a small painting by a Mrs. X * * ! Since 1861, Mr. Hunt has resided in Boston, with the exception of two years in Europe, and two winters in Mexico and Florida.

In Boston his time has been devoted chiefly to portrait painting, and among the best known are those of Chief Justice Shaw, John Quincy Adams, William M. Everts, Gov. John A. Dix, and one of himself. About 1868, he opened his studio to scholars for two or three years, and when some of his scholars formed classes of their own, he continued deeply interested and has ever maintained over them a constant personal supervision. It is to his devotedness and untiring efforts in assisting the younger artists that the healthy impulse to art in New England is largely due and recognized.

It was during these lessons that one of his pupils wrote down daily a few of his remarks to the different scholars, which were later, (1875), published under the title of "Talks on Art." This little work had a great success in England as well as in this country. John Millais, the English artist, wrote the preface to the English edition, and the reviews in England, and the press generally, had very complimentary notices on the work, besides most flattering letters were written about it by distinguished persons, among others by the poet Browning.

But figure painting alone has by no means absorbed the whole of Mr. Hunt's time. While in Europe, he modeled, restored and put in marble the beautiful head of the Neapolitan Psyche. He also cut many fine heads in cameo, (1847), and lithographed and published, about 1859, a series of his own paintings. Besides, he has devoted considerable time to landscapes, and among the most memorable are his views of Niagara, painted in the summer of 1878. His last great work was an order by the State of New York for two large allegorical pictures for the new capitol at Albany. The subjects of these paintings, each 45x16 feet, were "Anahita," or "The Flight of Night," and "The Discoverer." These grand paintings, on stone, finished in 55 working days, in December, 1878, were hailed by the artists as making a new departure in art, and they have received unqualified approbation from the press, as the most important works of their kind in America.

In personal appearance, Mr. Hunt was about five feet 11 inches in height, slender, but sinewy. He had a compact head, aquiline nose, keen gray eyes, and long gray beard. He was of a very nervous temperament, a most serious worker, but off his work overflowing with vivacity. There was no brighter wit, and he could tell a humorous incident to the life. Very sensitive not to ruffle the feelings of others, yet he had, perhaps, the one fault of being over-absorbed in art, and we may add in fine horses.

Since the above was written it has become our sad task to record the death of Mr. Hunt, which occurred Sept. 9, 1879, at the Isle of Shoals, off Portsmouth, N. H. In compliance with an often expressed desire, he was buried in Brattleboro, Vt. A deep public as well as private interest was taken in Mr. Hunt's death.

In the fall of 1879, a loan exhibition of many of his paintings and charcoal drawings opened at the Boston Art Museum, and was visited by 60,000 persons.

In conclusion, a word may be added concerning the two great mural paintings at Albany. Although they were finally executed with great rapidity and by methods of unsurpassed durability, yet both the subjects, "The Discoverer" and "Anahita," or, "The Flight of Night," cover, in their conception, partial treatment at long intervals and final rendering, almost the whole of his artistic career.

Of "The Discoverer," a sketch exists made by Mr. Hunt many years ago; while the idea of "Anahita" as a pendant to Guido's "Aurora," was first suggested in 1847, by the writer of this notice in the following lines:

ANAHITA.

Enthroned upon her car of light, the moon
Is circling down the lofty heights of Heaven;
Her well-trained courses wedge the blindest depths

With fearful plunge, yet heed the steady hand
That guides their lonely way. So swift her course,

So bright her smile, she seems on silver wings,
O'er-reaching space, to glide the airy main;

Behind, far-flowing, spreads her deep blue veil,
Inwrought with stars that shimmer in its wave.

Before the car an owl, gloom sighted, flaps
His weary way; with melancholy hoot
Dispelling spectral shades that flee
With bat-like rush, affrighted, back
Within the blackest nooks of caverned Night.
Still Hours of darkness wend around the car,
By raven tresses half concealed; but one,
With fairer locks, seems lingering back for Day.

Yet all with even measured footsteps mark
Her onward course. And floating in her train
Repose lies nestled on the breast of Sleep, While soft Desires enclasp the waist of Dreams,

And light-winged Fancies flit around in troops.

MURAL PAINTINGS.—Mr. Hunt's mural paintings in the assembly chamber at Albany, N. Y., could be approached, a week or two ago, by a scaffolding, which is now removed. These paintings were, of course, made with the intention of their being seen from the floor or galleries; but the view from the scaffolding was full of an interest of its own, as it was there possible either to examine the most delicate details of the artist's work, or to look at it across the great hall it completes. Some account of such a view may, therefore interest even those friends of Mr. Hunt who mean to see his last and best work for themselves.

We are told, and it is easy to believe, that the assembly chamber is the largest and most beautiful room in this country. Its general effect is cheerful, but grave; it is built entirely of stone, much of it of a warm, yellow gray; the ceiling is vaulted, and some slight decorative use of deep red and deep blue relieves its carved work. Mr. Hunt's paintings, "The Flight of Night" and "The Discoverer," occupy arched compartments on the south and north walls, each 45 feet long by 16 high. The first glimpse which one caught of these pictures, in going upon the scaffolding, was Hope's extended arm, as she points the way across the sea for the Discoverer. He stands in his dark boat, his arms folded, a serious figure full of resolution; he, too, is looking forward, but there is no wild joy in his steady face; he has not seen the country for which he is looking, and his voyage is a long one. He has no company but his own Fortune and Science and Faith and Hope. But he can want no better friends than these. The Fortune raises the sail behind him, and holds the rudder with a firm hand. She is young and strong, as the Fortune of a New World ought to be; she is wonderfully beautiful, and, though she has broad wings to fly away with, her face shows that she is not the Fortune to desert the man who has trusted her. Hope is leaning on the bow of the boat and pointing forward; her's is a strong maidenly figure, too, with a lovely, hopeful face. Beside her Science rises from the water, and holds out her charts to the Discoverer; her face is turned toward him, and her white shoulders and proud head and gliding motion are what impress you. And far to the left, before all, swims Faith, looking down away from the bright afternoon sky and all her sisters, but sure in her heart of the New World. This picture is bright, both in key of color and of light and shade, though not in the least gaudy. The sky is that of late afternoon, with the beginning of sunset in the west, to which Hope is pointing. The sea, as well as the sky, is full of soft, bright color. The Discoverer stands dark, not black, against the sky; the sail which Fortune holds is ruddy in the shadow, and her own figure, though fair and delicate flesh and blood, sends the distance behind it miles and miles away. The whole composition is full beyond description of the life and motion of the sea.

There is as much color, life and motion in the picture on the opposite wall, but of a far different kind. Any one who has seen just before sunrise the slender crescent moon pale in the eastern sky, with all the mists of the night flying away before the dawn, can form some idea of the general feeling and color of this picture. But it is not in every morning sky that one can see, as here we do, the Goddess of the Night herself against the crescent, rushing down with her three wild horses into the abyss of darkness. She does not try to restrain them, though she sees over her shoulders the coming day; a dark spirit is laying his hand on one of them to keep them back, but there is no stopping such horses as these. Below the Moon-Goddess, and apparently under her protection, are a sleeping mother and her little child; the morning light might wake them too soon, fast though they are carried from it, and a flying boy is screening it away. The noble and beautiful figure of the goddess, seated on the clouds, her right hand extended toward the darkness, is relieved upon bright light all about her. But her own crescent shines mysteriously brighter than all; her three wonderful horses, one white, one gray and white, one bay,—horses to whom rest seems impossible,—come plunging out of the faint mists on their way to darker places. The figure who is trying to restrain them holds an inverted torch; whether it be against his will or not, he is going as fast as they. The beauty of the two sleeping figures makes one wish they were never to be awakened. But behind all, down in the east, stretch the level lines of the irresistible sunrise.

Both of these pictures, admirable as are their composition and general effect, are equally admirable in grace and precision of detailed drawing and modeling. Everything is treated with the noble simplicity proper to decorative work and to all work, but it is the simplicity of deep knowledge; all is there, but nothing obtrudes itself. To the observer, within two feet of these paintings, there is nothing unfinished or sketchy about the drawing; the heads, the hands and feet, the wonderful outline and modeling of the figures, all are firm and decided and complete. The gods see everywhere; it is to be regretted that they should monopolize a near view, which would help so many young painters and sculptors. Strongly individual as these pictures are, they fulfill exactly their leading part in the general decoration of the hall. That key of color and of light and shade was chosen by the artist which would best carry out the conception of the architect, however difficult that key might be, and this sacrifice, if it were one, has brought its own reward. Mr. Hunt's work has helped Mr. Eidlitz's hall, and this as well helps the painting.

Much as we may wish those paintings were in Boston, we cannot wish them elsewhere than in a place which so well deserves them in every way. In fact, a visit to the unfinished assembly chamber gave one an impression of generous confidence between workers of different kinds, which cannot be easily forgotten. Very fortunate is the building committee which has such a head as Governor Dorsheimer. But next Tuesday, when the building is formally opened, will be a day of triumph to not one or two men only, but to many. Mr. Hunt's paintings are in the best sense historical, for the story they tell is not only true, but is going on now among us all, and every one has his part in it. He has brought to this work the thought and study of years, the experience of all his life, and his own high powers. Those who admired his work before, will find him a greater painter even than they thought. Those who disliked it before, cannot fail to change their minds in some degree before pictures so admirable. They form a new departure in American art, and a new departure worthy of the most serious recognition, thankfulness and congratulation.

HON. JACOB ESTEY.

Now universally known as one of the foremost business men of New England, was born in the town of Hinsdale, N. H., Sept. 30, 1814, but has been a resident of Brattleboro the last 43 years. Though deprived of parental care and training at a very early age—thrown upon the mercies of the world when not quite five years old—his life has been remarkably successful. Shifting about from one place to another, meeting indifference, selfishness, neglect and ill treatment, from which there was no relief or escape but by flight, his after career seems so wonderful, and if not so exceptional, we should be inclined to doubt the propriety of Solomon's injunction in Prov. 22: 5. Brattleboro abounds in instances of the strictest compliance with the instructions of the wise man, and the results may be seen and compared with the results of a course exactly opposite.

We know but little of his early wanderings from place to place, to obtain fair treatment or desirable conditions where he could be free in the untrammelled exercise of his native capacity, yet we cannot for a moment doubt that the trials and difficulties he successfully encountered had much to do in shaping his future destiny. Another subjected to the same conditions as was Mr. Estey, might have become dissolute, improvident and wretched, but with his powerful vital organization, iron will, self control, and great variety of mental resources, opposing influences, perhaps, proved more beneficial than otherwise, like sprinkling water on a blacksmith's fire, to produce a greater desirable effect. From the time he first began to act in his business life, he manifested a sagacity in discovering ways and means, unthought of by others, to improve natural resources to the best advantage, not only for himself, but to cause the world to be beneficially affected by his action. Hisequal in administrative ability, power of organization and prudential management of a large business, cannot be found in this region.

Wm. F. F. & Co. Boston

In 1848, he erected a large building near the south bridge on Main street, where for many years stood the old wagon shop owned by Eleazar Farnsworth. The upper stories of this new building were devoted to the manufacture of melodeons, as the instruments were then called. This business had been carried on here in a small way several years previous to the time Mr. Estey engaged, with others, in the manufacture of these instruments. The demand for instruments rendered more room needful, and another larger building was erected south of the bridge, in that locality known in early times as "Squabble Hollow." The early names of some of our village localities are not very attractive. The neighborhood of the "Omnibus" was known as "Polecat," and at the north, where is the Park or Common, "Toad Hill." How the name of "Squabble Hollow" originated we have not been informed, but we know there was a deadly squabble in one of the old low buildings of this locality in the summer of 1850. There and at that time, Peter Moore, in a quarrel with a French Canadian, received a fatal stab in the abdomen. By removing the old unsightly buildings and wiping out "Squabble Hollow," Messrs. Jacob Estey & Co. made an important improvement in this part of the village.

In the fall of 1857, the manufactories were burned down, but very soon rebuilt, to be again destroyed in 1864, and two firemen—Messrs. Nichols and Kittredge—in their labors upon this occasion lost their lives. The manufactories were again rebuilt, and also a much larger one was erected on Frost's meadows, bordered on the south by Whetstone Brook, where was ample room for the large amount of lumber required constantly on hand. The sudden rise of Whetstone Brook in 1869, drowned one of their workmen, carried off several thousand dollars worth of lumber, and so endangered the safety of the manufactory, other and higher grounds were obtained on Birge street, where the company erected eight organ shops, each of three stories, 100 feet in length, where the whole business is now carried on. Large reservoirs of water, constantly supplied, on grounds high above the buildings, render it possible, at a moment's notice, to deluge any part of the premises. They have also two steam fire engines, in readiness for emergencies in any part of the village, and on several occasions they have rendered highly important service in extinguishing and preventing fires from spreading over the village.

Several hundred men have been in constant employ a large share of the time, all through the general business depression, commencing in 1873, down to the present time.

The field upon which the financial resources of this company is gathered, reaches beyond the United States; therefore, local conditions or circumstances, adverse or destructive to many other enterprises, is not sufficient to stop the profitable operations of this company. It may be considered fortunate, not only for the town but for the world, that such important interests are controlled by men of high moral aims, public spirit and liberality.

Mr. Estey was one of the first and principal actors in organizing the Baptist church and society in this place, in 1840. Benevolent, educational and Christian institutions, in various parts of this country, have received pecuniary assistance from this company, which, in its beneficial effects, will be felt to the remotest time. The two junior members of this firm, Capt. J. J. Estey and Col. L. K. Fuller, have been mainly instrumental in organizing, equipping and sustaining the infantry and artillery of this place. Never, even in the most palmy days of old military times, have we seen, in this town, military companies so apparently efficient and warlike as the battery or flying artillery company under the command of Col. Fuller. We have often heard it said there is nothing of the kind superior, if equal, in the State of Vermont.

A large portion of a new department of this village has been built up and is sustained by this manufactory of cottage organs. Encountering so many difficulties—trials by fire, water, unpropitious times for business—this company has shown a courage, enterprise and perseverance that compels the admiration of friends and enemies.

We make the following extract from "New England Manufacturers and Manufactories," 1879.

"Prominent in the manufacture of parlor organs is the firm of J. Estey & Co., of Brattleboro, Vt.

The families of the name of Estey, are descended from three brothers, who came from England and settled in Massachusetts, early in the seventeenth century. The great-grandfather of Jacob Estey, founder and present head of the firm, also named Jacob, was a farmer in Sutton, Mass., but moved early in life to Royalston.

His son Jacob owned and managed a farm in that town, and also kept a public house.

Of his seven children, but two attained maturity. The eldest, Isaac, having married Patty Forbes, of Royalston, went with his brother Israel to Hinsdale, N. H., where they built a saw-mill and engaged in the manufacture of lumber. This enterprise was a failure.

Israel Estey left the town and State, and went to Ann Arbor, Mich., where he engaged in farming.

His elder brother, Isaac, remaining with his family, was arrested for debt and thrown into the county jail. He remained there thirty days, at the end of which time he took the poor debtor's oath, and was released from his liabilities. He then engaged in farming.

Jacob Estey was one of eight children, seven of whom, five sons and two daughters, still survive. He was born September 30, 1814, and was, when four years of age, adopted by a wealthy family in the neighborhood. After remaining with them seven years he ran away, and walked to Worcester, Mass., where a brother lived, and where he went to work on a farm. During the next four years he was employed on farms in Rutland, Millbury and other places in that vicinity. At seventeen he engaged with T. & J. Sutton, of Worcester, as an apprentice to learn the trade of a plumber, including the manufacture of lead pipe, and remained with them four years.

In February, 1835, he went to Brattleboro, Vt., with two hundred dollars, and there purchased the business, tools and real estate of a plumbing and lead pipe concern, and hired a shop on premises opposite the present Brattleboro House. In 1850, the proprietors of a small organ factory, which occupied a part of his building, being unable to pay their rent, he accepted in settlement an interest in the business, and two years later purchased the whole establishment, which then employed six hands, for $2700. Mr. Estey now turned his attention especially to the organ manufacture, and a few years after devoted himself exclusively to it. He continued in successful operation until 1866, when he received into partnership, Levi K. Fuller and his son, Julius J. Estey.

Mr. Estey was married in 1837, to Desdemona Wood, of Brattleboro. Their surviving children are Abby E., born Sept. 21, 1842, and married to Levi K. Fuller, and Julius J., born Jan. 8, 1845, and married to Florence Gray, of Cambridge, N. Y. Mr. Estey represented the town of Brattleboro in the Vermont Legislature in 1868 and 1869, and the district, including that town, in the Senate of 1872 and 1873. He is a director in the Central Vermont Railroad. Mr. Estey is still in the prime of life and retains his business activity. He is a member of the Baptist Church, and has contributed freely to religious interests.

Levi K. Fuller was born in Westmoreland, N. H., Feb. 23, 1841, and at the age of about eighteen, engaged with Campbell Chubbuck, of Roxbury, Mass., in learning the trade of machinist. The next year he went to Brattleboro, and entered, on his own account, upon the manufacture of cylinder Planers and Mowing Machines.

*Yours truly,
Lionel R. Fuller*

He was successful, and continued in this business until April 1, 1866, when he became a partner in the firm of J. Estey & Co. Since 1866 he has superintended the manufacturing department.

His inventions had reference to new devices and adjustments, and are protected by patents. He has also made improvements in machinery specially adapted to a variety of the processes of manufacture.

Julius J. Estey spent two years in the Military Academy at Norwich, Vt., and at nineteen entered his father's office, where he received his training for the position."

ADDISON BROWN

Died May 11, 1872, at his home in this village. He closed, in quietness and peace, "with eye undimmed and his natural intellectual force unabated," his earthly career, useful and honorable, at the age of 73 years. For the greater part of the past forty years he has made Brattleboro his home. Here he began his public service in the ministry of the gospel. And to the furtherance of the highest interests of this, his adopted home, and through it those of the State and the nation, he gave the devoted effort of a long and laborious life.

Born at New Ipswich, N. H., March 11, 1799, the last year of the eighteenth century, his education, life and spirit were emphatically of, and kept pace with, the nineteenth. His collegiate and theological education were furnished by Harvard College and the Cambridge Theological school. A graduate of the class of 1826, and of the class of 1831 from the Theological school, he became minister of the newly established Unitarian church of this village in 1833. As its first minister, he continued in its pastorate nearly 14 years, and on dissolving his official connection remained, with brief interruptions, until his death, one of its most devoted members. His successors in its pastorate will bear warm testimony to the friendliness of his relations to them, and the steadfastness of his endeavors to forward their labors for its prosperity.

His connection with the Brattleboro Unitarian church terminated Dec. 1, 1845. Though continuing to preach as occasion offered during the greater part of the remainder of his life, Mr. Brown formed no new pastoral connection. With the deepest interest in the advancement of the general good, which he always held to be the great aim of the church and the ministry, he turned his attention to other methods of promoting it. The cause of education especially interested him. To it he gave increasingly his thought and energies. The condition of the public schools in this region excited his deepest concern. He saw they were far behind what the public need and the possibilities of the case required; he sought to remodel the schools on a higher and more effective plan, and he aimed to bring a more direct relation between the parents of the pupils and the teachers and schools entrusted with their education. In 1841, he had the gratification of seeing a response to his efforts, in the introduction into the schools of the graded system. But aware that not even the best system can dispense with that "eternal vigilance" which is the price of all worthy attainment, he labored to the end of his public life to deepen the sense of responsibility in the public mind for the efficiency of the schools, and he rendered an inestimable service. He held office as superintendent of the schools in Windham county from 1846 until that office was abolished, after which, for several years, he acted as superintendent of the schools of the town of Brattleboro. To his care and faithfulness, which never relaxed until his physical powers failed, the schools of our village were greatly indebted for the efficiency which they have attained. Well do Brattleboro's teachers know what a wealth of sympathy and efficient help in all their efforts to improve the schools under their charge was given them by Mr. Brown, by his personal interest and care, and by his efforts through the public press.

With the press he became connected in 1862, when Dr. Charles Cummings, summoned from the editorial chair to the battlefield, relinquished the charge of the Vermont Phoenix. Mr. Brown became editor and one of the proprietors, which post he held until March, 1871, when failing health compelled his retirement. Loyally, in the bitter days of civil war, he stood by the flag of our Union; ceaselessly he identified and toiled to induce others to identify the fortunes and significance of that starry flag with the broadest and most generous ideas of liberty and the rights of man, his works attest, and not only they, but a son and son-in-law cheerfully surrendered to his country's service, and who being dead yet speak of his loyal and tender sympathy with them in their brave young consecration. He realized the importance of his post as editor of a newspaper, and sought, in every way that opened before him, to make the journal in his control powerful for good. He labored to identify his paper with all that was true and good. He made it a journal whose columns could bring a blush of shame to no pure mind. One of the best among the prints of the Green Mountain State it was his pride to have it. With a special interest he advocated the cause of woman's elevation. He set no bounds to his claim of rights for her. To her largest aspirations he lent a faithful, helping voice. Not alone her pleading for a higher education, not alone her assertion of right and opportunity to labor in other spheres than those heretofore at her command; not alone her right to the possession and use of her own earnings, but, besides and beyond, her right to enter on every sphere to which she felt a divine call, a native fitness, and to the enjoyment of full political rights, found in him a devoted, and, so far as was possible to a mind so finely balanced and so judicial as his, an enthusiastic advocate. Indeed, wherever oppression was, there was he to be found exposing and withstanding it. In the days when slavery's night brooded over the land, he stood one of the lights of liberty that prophesied the coming of the dawn. At the side of the slave he placed himself to recognize in him a man and a brother, and demand for him the full possession of his rights. And the slavery of strong drink found no more steadfast enemy than he. In his own person, in his home, in all his public teaching and writing, he was the advocate and exemplar of temperance. To devoted advocacy, to a constancy that could not by pelf or argument be turned aside from its noble purpose, he joined a quietness, a candor of temper, a disposition to do justice to all sides, which nobly illustrated the practicableness and the beauty of a true temperance.

As an editor, he illustrated in his own modest way some of the highest qualities of a true journalist. He would not for any consideration stoop to anything debasing. No chance of making a striking point would move him to be unjust. He would speak the truth, the broad, careful, just truth. He would speak it kindly and calmly, and "with malice toward none." If he missed the brilliance which many affect, he gained the reality which they miss. So he could be utterly trusted, and was a safe and helpful guide. His mind was clear, his principle high, his purpose honest, his spirit pure. To be good and do good were his life's great aims. When he quitted his editorial post he went forth to his retirement without reproach.

Of him is it emphatically true that he was good. His religious creed was broad and simple. It could be all summed up in love to God and love to man. His life was devoted chiefly to others' good. He believed in personal righteousness rather than in profession of piety. To do justly, love mercy and walk humbly with God, formed his great aim. It is safe to say that he left the world without an enemy, but not without many a friend by whom his memory will long and tenderly be cherished.—From the Vermont Phoenix.

WILLIAM H. ROCKWELL, M. D.

William Haydon Rockwell was born in East Windsor, Conn., Feb. 15, 1800. He was the fourth child and only son in a family of eight children, of Charles and Sarah Haydon Rockwell. His father was a farmer, as were several generations of only sons before him, a fact that rendered him especially desirous that his only son should succeed himself in the cultivation of an estate that had been long in the family. But though not inclined to adopt this for his permanent pursuit, the knowledge of farming here acquired was afterwards of great service in aiding him to advance the interests of those whose welfare became the chief concern of his life.

A rather precocious fondness for the study of mathematics enabled young Rockwell to early master the science of surveying. This proficiency gained him, at the age of 17, the position of leading surveyor in the neighboring towns, and by the time he had attained his majority, he was appointed surveyor-in-chief of Hartford county. During the intervals that occurred between this and other engagements, he found time to aid his father when his work pressed more heavily, and also to prepare himself to pass the first three examinations, and to enter the junior class of Yale College. From this institution he was graduated with distinction in 1824. He received soon after the appointment of principal of the Nichols Academy at Dudley, Mass., and remaining there two years, he then entered on the study of medicine in the office of Dr. Thomas Hubbard, a professor in the Yale College Medical School. While yet an undergraduate, he was appointed assistant physician in the Retreat for the Insane at Hartford, then under the charge of the noted alienist, Dr. Eli Todd, where he remained until his return to the Yale Medical School, from which he was graduated in 1831. Though earnestly invited to resume his position in the Retreat, and having now a strong predilection for the specialty, to which he hoped sometime to return, he wisely judged it better to first gain more experience in the general practice of his profession, and a favorable opportunity offering, he at once entered on the practice in Durham, Conn. He was there not quite two years when, in response to a most urgent request from his old friend and preceptor, Dr. Todd, then in failing health, he returned to the Retreat. Here he continued as assistant physician until called to Brattleboro, though acting superintendent during Dr. Todd's disabling illness, and for some time after his death.

Dr. Rockwell was married June 25, 1835, to Mrs. Maria F. Chapin, a native of Salisbury, Conn.

He received the appointment of superintendent of the Vermont Asylum for the Insane, from the board of trustees, June 28, 1836, but he did not assume charge until the following October, when his services were required to supervise the completion of the alterations and additions to the building, purchased by the trustees, was undergoing, to render it suitable for the reception of patients. This building, a wooden structure of rather imposing exterior, stood on beautiful grounds then known as Woodland, and when remodeled was very well adapted to the purpose in view. It occupied the site of the present Marsh building, and with the premises and 45 acres of meadow land adjacent was purchased with the legacy of $10,000, bequeathed by Mrs. Anna Marsh, who died in 1834. By the kind thoughtfulness of this most philanthropic lady, and the remarkable stewardship of Dr. Rockwell, Vermont was placed far in advance of most of the States of the Union in her ability to take proper care of her insane.

The asylum was opened for the reception of patients December 12, 1836. At that time it was by many supposed to be of ample size to accommodate all that would be sent to it for many years; but patients came in so rapidly that scarce a year had elapsed before it became evident that a much larger building would soon be required. Not long after, a centre building and one wing of a new asylum, a brick structure, designed after the best model then known, was erected on the grounds opposite the original building, which afterwards, until vacated and removed, was called the "old asylum."

To the construction of the institution, long since grown to be one of the largest in the country, the State has contributed various sums amounting in the aggregate to $23,000. This is the only outside aid the asylum has ever received from any source, while, under the management of the late superintendent, it has been extended, rebuilt, as to the large portion destroyed by fire in 1862, remodeled in some parts before and since that catastrophe, and has besides supported itself from the first on income derived from private patients. These patients came from all sections of the United States; also from the West Indies, the Bermuda Islands, the Canadas, and the British Provinces, and were attracted hither by the wide spread reputation of Dr. Rockwell for treating mental diseases. And to establish the institution on so firm a foundation that it might continue to be of as great benefit in the future to the insane of moderate means, and to the dependent insane of Vermont, as it was to them and others during his superintendency, with the hope that it might be ever increasing in its capacity for usefulness, was the great aim of Dr. Rockwell's long continued, most assiduous and untiring labors.

While at Hartford, he had longed for an opportunity of attempting an experiment, before untried, of largely engaging the male patients of an asylum in farm labor; and it is known that the favorable location of the Vermont Asylum for such purpose greatly influenced him in his decision to accept the superintendency. But, as shown in some of his earlier reports, he met with much opposition from some of his brother specialists, who deemed the project impracticable and dangerous. His was not the character, however, to be stayed by ordinary obstacles, and a few seasons of patient trial, beginning with a limited company at first—selected, of course, with due regard to their mental and physical condition—proved that a large number of insane persons, under the guidance of a few men of calm temper and possessed of ordinary tact, can be safely trusted to work together on a farm; also, that such employment is a most valuable adjunct to the means used to promote the recovery of the curable, and affords the most natural, healthful and enjoyable kind of exercise for the incurable insane. The success of the experiment is further substantiated and, indeed, now indisputably established by the fact that all State institutions for the insane, built in more recent years, have adopted his idea, and now possess extensive farms, on which the inmates are more or less largely employed. But while so much interested in assuring the success of this undertaking, he neglected none of the other means commonly used for the occupation and diversion of the insane. Indeed, he had early and thoroughly tested almost everything in the form of diversion and the ordinary occupations and exercises, both within doors and without, for female as well as male patients, such as are now resorted to for their benefit.

The following extract from some remarks, offered on a public occasion soon after Dr. Rockwell's decease, as coming from a brother superintendent and native of Vermont—Dr. Mark Ranney—and as comprising so much in a few words, would seem to find an appropriate place in this brief sketch: "I well remember his fine presence and genial, courteous manner which quickly won the respect of all with whom he came in contact. His intellectual strength and culture also gave him great influence wherever he was known, and eminently fitted him for the position he filled and adorned for a long series of years. Although deeply engrossed with the financial affairs of a large asylum, which he conducted with signal ability, his contributions to the advancement of psychological medicine were important and valuable. His untiring industry, great financial ability and faculty of organization and ability to forecast the prospective needs of his State, and provide for them, were integral and prominent points of his mental constitution; and they were agencies which led to the gradual growth of one of our largest public institutions, and with less pecuniary aid than in any other instance in the country, and the same personal resources enabled him to rebuild the large portion of the asylum that was destroyed by fire."

Possessed of abilities of no common order and in harmonious union as they were with a most generous and sympathetic nature, Dr. Rockwell could undoubtedly have won distinction in almost any position in life. To refer to one faculty only, his memory was so retentive that until late in life he could translate the classic authors with almost the same facility as when fresh from college; and as to such abstract facts as dates and names, particularly the latter, his powers of recollection were certainly quite remarkable. Considering his numerous family of patients and their more numerous relatives and friends, who often came to visit them, and whose names even in full, once heard, he seldom forgot, the ability to call them all by name was certainly very convenient. But it was of far greater service in enabling him to converse with his patients about their home and household affairs, when it was judicious to do so, with the facility almost of the family physician; as with the names of their children he could recall pretty much every incident he had from time to time learned of their family histories. Yet this was perhaps the least important instance in which this one faculty, a capacious memory, was utilized to interest and divert the minds of those under his charge, and whatever talent or accomplishment he possessed, that could be applied to such service, he used to in some way benefit his patients—to cheer the despondent, to soothe the irritable, to calm the excited, to rouse the lethargic, and to bring all on to the road to recovery, or to render as comfortable and contented as possible those for whom no hope of recovery could be entertained.

It was ever his most earnest and ceaseless endeavor to have all associated with him in care of the insane, in whatever capacity, possess, besides other essential qualifications, the inherent and indispensable qualities of kindness, gentleness, frankness and patience which eminently distinguished his own intercourse with them. In addition to these, he was himself noted for a wonderfully encouraging and hope-inspiring manner, which none can fail to recall to mind of the many in the community who came to seek his counsels in their various troubles and trials.

Though few could excel Dr. Rockwell in the graces of general conversation, a conciseness or terseness of style, but of an order most pleasing, was one of his more prominent characteristics. This all will remember who had much intercourse with him. Most of his acquaintances, especially the recovered of his insane family, will also recollect his happy method of illustrating a point he wished to fix firmly in the mind of the listener, by some apt quotation, or perhaps more often by a short anecdote. Of these last he had such a stock in reserve as to have been seldom known to repeat one. When or where he learned them was ever the mystery.

The results of his rich experience, derived from long practice among and intercourse with the insane, he took great pleasure in freely imparting to his assistants and also to other physicians seeking such information. This was often and most aptly rendered in a sort of aphoristic style, in which much information was conveyed in a few words. Some of these condensed sayings, or maxims as they came to be considered, with others of like order, in which were concentrated the deductions of his experiences with the world at large, are known to have often been efficient guides to some of his assistants in their after career; and especially to those, of whom there were nine, who were called to the superintendency of asylums for the insane. Among the latter were his son, who is now a member of the board of trustees, but when his father resigned his charge in August, 1872, succeeded him in the superintendency, and Dr. Joseph Draper, the present worthy incumbent of that office.

As a citizen of Brattleboro, Dr. Rockwell is most affectionately remembered for having always taken an active interest in everything that tended to advance the growth and prosperity of the town, as well as for being among the foremost in every benevolent work. During the earlier years of his residence here, he occasionally read a lecture at the village lyceum, choosing for a topic something regarding mental or physical hygiene, or other subject in the treatment of which useful information could be imparted. He was also several times called on to deliver an address on some occasion of unusual public interest. Among these addresses his eulogium on the late President Harrison is remembered as having been perhaps his most distinguished rhetorical effort. Unfortunately all his manuscripts, including some unpublished papers on psychological subjects, were consumed in the disastrous fire at the asylum before alluded to.

In person, Dr. Rockwell was much above the ordinary height, but of erect and well proportioned figure. His head was large and of fine shape; features regular, and countenance pleasing in expression. On May 10th, 1872, as he was starting from his door he was thrown from his wagon with such force as to cause a fracture of the neck of the thigh; this, together with internal difficulties consequent to the shock to his nervous system, confined him to his bed until his death, Nov. 30, 1873. Every day until his death, during his long and painful illness, some of his patients came to see him, and it was most interesting to witness them leaning over the form of the prostrate physician, and in their turn speaking words of sympathy and encouragement. Encouraged and sustained he indeed was by their presence and their kind words, but in a way they knew not of, and cheered by the thought that he had been of some service to them, to humanity, and to his adopted State, he died, as since early youth he had lived, in the hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave.

Of Dr. Rockwell's family, his wife, daughter and one son survive him. His second son, a graduate of the United States Military Academy, died in the service, in 1868.

Largely indebted for his success to the trustees of the asylum, from whom he ever received unswerving sympathy and support, and to the harmonious co-operation of those immediately associated with him, he was also in many ways efficiently aided by his wife, who, though holding no official position, devoted the greater part of nearly every day of her long residence in the institution to efforts to promote the comfort and welfare of the insane.

EDWARD R. CHAPIN, M. D.

THE VERMONT ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

This institution was founded upon a bequest of $10,000 from Mrs. Anna Marsh, of Hinsdale, N. H., who died in the year 1834. In accordance with the provisions of her will, it was incorporated by the legislature, Nov. 3, 1834. The trustees named in the will of the founder, and also in the act of incorporation, were Samuel Clark, John Holbrook, Epaphro Seymour and John C. Holbrook, all of Brattleboro. They held their first meeting at Colonel Chase's stage tavern, pursuant to notice, signed by Samuel Clark and published in the Vermont Phoenix of Sept. 11, 1835, and organized by choosing Samuel Clark chairman, Epaphro Seymour treasurer, John C. Holbrook secretary. On the 3rd of October following, at an adjourned meeting, the legacy of Mrs. Marsh was paid into the hands of the trustees by Asa Keyes, one of the executors of the will of the said Mrs. Marsh. The first report of the trustees to the legislature was then made under the requirements of the charter. This report, (which was never printed), was in substance as follows, to wit: That they had received the sum of $10,000, bequeathed by Mrs. Marsh for the foundation of an institution for the relief of the insane, and that they had fixed the location of the same at Brattleboro, the terms of the will restricting them to some place in Windham county, near the Connecticut River. They further took this early opportunity to state, (what they say "must be obvious to every one,") that the sum of $10,000 was far from adequate to the establishment of such an institution as should be at all commensurate with the wants of the State. In their opinion $30,000 was requisite, and they submitted the question of supplying such additional sum as might be necessary, to the consideration of the legislature.

This appeal was supported by an interesting statement of the results of their inquiries and investigations as to the needs of the State, in respect to provision of this kind, supplemented by a showing of what had been done in this direction by Massachusetts and other States. The legislature responded by the passage of an act, Nov. 9, 1835, appropriating $2,000 annually for five years, "To enable the trustees the more effectually to promote the benevolent designs of the institution; provided, that said trustees should take no benefit from the provisions of the act, until they had so far erected the building and organized said asylum as to receive patients therein; and, provided, also, that any future legislature might alter, amend or repeal this act."

A purchase was concluded with Nathan Woodcock, May 25, 1836, embracing the location of the present buildings, (about six acres of land, with dwelling house thereon), and with Ebenezer Wells for 45 acres of meadow land, adjacent and additional to the site above mentioned.

The work of remodeling the dwelling was then commenced, and at a meeting of the trustees, held June, 28, 1836, Dr. William H. Rockwell, of Hartford, Conn., for several years previously assistant physician at the Connecticut Retreat, was chosen to the superintendency, to enter upon his duties as soon as the premises were ready for the reception of patients, which was Dec. 12, 1836.

The second report of the trustees, (unpublished), was presented to the legislature, October, 1836. In this the progress made was detailed. Besides the remodeling of the dwelling house, an extension of a wing containing eight rooms was made to it, the whole being designed for the accommodation of 30 patients, the necessary officers and employees; the cost of the whole, the purchase, refitting and furnishing, absorbing nearly the whole of the Marsh legacy. They expressed the belief that they had been extremely fortunate in the selection of Dr. Rockwell for the superintendency, and that in the expenditure of the bequest of the founder, they had erected accommodations for patients to the utmost limit of the means at their command, and had so endeavored to order their arrangements, that in the event of further extensions, these first expenditures should not be to any considerable degree lost; and closed by submitting to the legislature the question as to whether the advantages to be derived from such an institution, should be extended through its enlightened liberality, to all the citizens of the State who required them, or be confined to the comparatively few, whom it would be practicable to accommodate, on the original limited plan, calling attention to the impossibility of relying at once upon the appropriation of $10,000 made the previous year, by reason of the provisos which rendered the annual payments liable at any time to be repealed.

In response to this report, the legislature granted an additional appropriation of $2,000. Three subsequent appropriations were made by the legislature for extending accommodations, during the seven following years, two of $4,000 each, and one of $3,000, aggregating a total of $23,000. These last grants were made with certain provisos in the interest of the State, securing to citizens of Vermont a preference in the matter of admissions over those of other States, and stipulating that in case the institution should cease to exist, the real estate should be held as security to the State for the total amount granted. The aid thus rendered to this institution represents the total amount yet appropriated by the legislature of Vermont, toward providing accommodations for the care and treatment of the insane of the State.

The operations and results of the asylum since its opening have been detailed fully in its published reports from year to year, hence need not be enlarged upon here.

Its growth, from its unostentatious beginning to its present state of development, has been slow but constant. The average number at present is 450 patients. With the exception of the State aid referred to, it has been self-sustaining and self-creating, through the sagacious foresight and sound practical management of its board of trustees and superintendent. Its success has been in no small degree due to the pursuance of a steady and uniform policy, which has been rendered practicable under its charter, which preserved it from those frequent changes of management that are incident to political revolutions in institutions under ordinary State control.

The asylum is a chartered institution, but not a stock corporation. It is simply a property in trust for a specific object, and its management is wholly vested in its board of trustees. The following are the changes that have occurred, by resignation or death:

In 1838, John Holbrook, deceased; Asa Keyes was elected his successor. In 1839, John C. Holbrook removed from the State; Nathan B. Williston was elected to succeed him. In 1847, Epaphro Seymour resigned; J. Dorr Bradley was elected in his place. In 1852, Samuel Clark resigned; Frederick Holbrook was his successor. In 1862, J. Dorr Bradley, deceased; Daniel Kellogg was chosen to fill the vacancy. In 1874, Daniel Kellogg and Asa Keyes resigned; William H. Rockwell and James M. Tyler were elected in their stead. In 1875, Nathan B. Williston resigned; Richards Bradley was chosen in his place. There have been three changes in the superintendency of the asylum. In 1872, Dr. W. H. Rockwell resigned, and was succeeded by his son. In 1873, Dr. W. H. Rockwell, Jr., resigned, and was succeeded by Dr. Joseph Draper, who entered upon his duties Feb. 16, 1873.

DR. J. DRAPER.

HON. LARKIN G. MEAD

Was born at Lexington, Mass., Oct. 2, 1795; educated at Dartmouth College; first practiced law at Chesterfield, N. H.; married Mary Jane Noyes, daughter of Hon. John Noyes, of Putney, Vt., June 8, 1829, and removed to Brattleboro in 1839, where he was employed in closing up the affairs of the Brattleboro Typographic Co. He practiced law in the courts of Cheshire county, N. H., and Windham county, Vt., during a large portion of the 30 years in which he lived in Brattleboro; was a prominent Whig in the Harrison campaign of 1840, and chosen senator from this county in 1846. He procured the charter for the first savings bank in this State, now known as the Vermont Savings Bank of Brattleboro, and was the first treasurer of that institution about 25 years; was chairman of the first prudential committee, chosen to carry into effect the present system of graded schools, in 1841. Shortly after resigning the office of treasurer of the bank, he died July 6, 1869.

Comparatively few persons have passed a more successful, cheerful, hopeful life of full rounded measure, beyond, by some years, the allotted age of man. In his domestic relations was, apparently, much of happiness and cause for congratulation. The wisdom he showed in the selection of his life partner was fully manifested in the conduct and characteristics of the nine children composing this gifted family. The eldest, John N. Mead, died while in his fourth year at Harvard College, in 1850, at the age of 19 years. He seemed naturally to possess capabilities such as others can rarely acquire by years of effort. He was with George C. Hall and William C. Bradley and others, of that brilliant circle of scholars, in the early days of the present school system, which gave much pride and satisfaction to the teachers and a high character to the schools. In the sciences, languages, music, drawing, painting, mathematics and mechanics, he surprised every one by his proficiency. With such an easy comprehensive grasp his mind seemingly swept the whole field of human effort, we had cause to wonder what an intellectual giant he would become in coming years. All problems and difficulties were fearlessly met and conquered with no show of egotism or vanity. Even "the great teacher," death, never found a mortal subject who met him more calmly and philosophically. When told that his disease was past remedy, that his young life, with so much to make that life desirable to himself and others, must in a few hours be closed forever, he replied:

"I have had a good time and good friends, for which I feel thankful. Life thus far has been so pleasant, I would stay longer, but it is all for the best as it is, for the years of responsibility, I may not be equal to or fitted to endure, are near."

Socrates could have made no better reply, and Bryant, in his high poetical conception of the desirable in life's closing scene, has not transcended the actual.

His classmates at Harvard gave evidence of their high estimation and affection by erecting a monument to his memory, on which is inscribed:

"The autumn winds rushing,
Waft the leaves that are sere'st;
But our flower was in flushing
When blighting was nearest."

L. G. Mead, Jr., early manifested a taste for drawing and sculpture. His frequent copies from nature on paper, canvass, and in marble, during his clerkship with Messrs. Williston & Tyler, in 1853, caused his friends to think he would not long remain behind the counter selling nails, paint and putty. His local fame attracted the attention of that well-known artist, Henry K. Brown, while on a short visit to this place in the summer of 1853. Two favored sons of genius met. The claims of the younger to favorable consideration being honored by the elder, an artist of established reputation and old world experience, probably decided the pathway of the younger for life. The decisive step was taken by placing himself under the instructions of Mr. Brown, at New York, where the young aspirant diligently improved his favorable opportunities about two years, when he returned to his home at Brattleboro, in Dec. 1856, where he soon gave evidence of his progress in art by a New Year's freak. On the last night of the old year, assisted by a comrade, with snow and water, he constructed an image, called the "Recording Angel." The occasional application of water, during the progress of the work, made the snow more susceptible to manipulation and gave the whole figure greater hardness and solidity, as the night was so cold each application of water soon became solid. Standing in a snow bank, in a freezing atmosphere with a lantern "dimly burning," or "the moonbeams misty light," would be more favorable conditions for the burial of Sir John Moore than for the exercise of genius in the work proposed. Conveniently near the scene of operations, at the joining of the two roads at North Main street, was John Burnham's old foundry building. Access was gained thereto, at the midnight hour, and a sufficient quantity of snow carried into a warmer atmosphere, where was formed the most expressive parts of the figure, in the north room of that old building. We will give, in his own language, the account of a noted citizen of this place, on this occasion:

"As morning dawned, there, at a fork of the two principal streets of the village, stood an image, bright in the rays of the morning sun, and brighter still with the magic light of genius. The mischievous boy stood appalled by the unwonted sight; it was surely no idle work for him to cast his snowballs at. A noted simpleton of the village, after looking at it for a moment, ran away from it in fear and alarm, and a man who rarely ever before made a bow, raised his hat in respect."

This figure remained in perfection over two weeks, unprotected save by the sanctity of genius. New York papers gave an account of this affair, and a resident of Brattleboro, when off the coast of Chili, heard a sea captain read the account from a Spanish paper.

Soon after this event Mr. Mead received several commissions; one from Nicholas Longworth, Esq., of Cincinnati, for a duplicate of the snow statue in marble, and one from Richards Bradley, for a marble bust of his grandfather, Hon. William C. Bradley. A full length, colossal statue of Ethan Allen was made by him for the State of Vermont, and is now in the State House at Montpelier. Rev. Edward Atwater, of New Haven, then recently from Europe, and some parties in New Orleans gave him commissions, all of which he executed to the satisfaction of the applicants, previous to his departure for Florence, Italy. The last accounts of him from that place are of a hopeful character for his world-wide fame.

Charles Mead, the eldest brother living, has given proof of excellent business capacity. At the time of the great fire of 1857, his works were destroyed. He was proprietor of the boxwood and ivory rule manufactory, founded in 1834, by S. M. Clark, of Hartford, Conn.

Eleanor, the eldest daughter, was married to Hon. William D. Howells, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, when he was United States Consul to Florence, Italy, during our civil war.

Joanna was married to Augustus D. Shepherd, of New York, we think, in 1862. The family is now widely scattered. To give an account of each member, in detail, our limits and propriety forbid, but as some of their names have become, in a certain sense, public property, may be deemed a sufficient apology for the liberty we have taken for the honor of Brattleboro.

COL. JOHN STEELE TYLER

Was born in Brattleboro, April 29, 1843. He was a grandson of Hon. Royall Tyler, of whom is a biographical sketch in this work, commencing at page 83. Col. John was the eldest son of Rev. Thomas P. Tyler; D. D., and Mary A. Clark, daughter of Rufus Clark, Esq., of Brattleboro. He was baptized June 22, 1843, at Christ's Church, Guilford, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Hopkins, receiving as his Christian name that of his uncle, John Steele Tyler, of Boston, Mass.

The subject of this sketch was one of that large class of young men whose professional studies were arrested by the outbreak of the rebellion, calling them away from school or office to the camp and battle-field. During the first ten years of his life, his father was rector of Trinity Church, Fredonia, N. Y., removing, in 1853, to Batavia, N. Y. Consequently much of his earlier boyhood was passed in Fredonia and Batavia, although he had, for several of those years, the great advantage of the careful training and thorough instruction which then distinguished the school for young boys, under the charge of his aunt, Miss Amelia S. Tyler, at Brattleboro. About his twelfth year his father's friend and classmate, Rev. Chas. W. Everest, Principal of the Rectory School, Hamden, Conn., received him into that excellent institution for the next four years. One of the advantages in which it stood, at that time, almost alone, was a strict and efficient military organization. Uniformed and equipped as a company, the boys were drilled semi-weekly by Col. Arnold, their commandant, in all the duties of the soldier.

We well remember into what neglect the militia system, never very efficient, had fallen. Few of the future heroes of the war, at its opening, knew anything of tactics could go through with the manual exercise, or had even a correct idea how a squad of men was to be drilled, or how a company was to be organized, and, if possible, still less how it was to be maneuvered. All this the four years of his Hamden school life taught him thoroughly, and thus, what, at the time, seemed the least useful of his acquirements, proved to be by far the most important.

Soon after leaving school, his character began to assume a serious and manly cast. It would almost seem as if the stern duties and the early death, that loomed in the near future, already threw back a shade upon his life. While in Brattleboro, at a visitation of the bishop, he acknowledged his baptismal obligations, and received from his father's hands his first communion. At the same time with him, a cousin, his equal in age, was also confirmed. They soon separated to meet no more on earth, the latter, from family connection, removing to the South. It was, in miniature, an example of a wide spread sorrow. Cousins, almost brothers in affection, playmates in childhood, kneeling side by side in the solemn service of their common church, they parted to fight through that long weary struggle with equal bravery, and, no doubt, with equal earnestness of conviction, the one for, and the other against, the flag of their country.

In the spring of 1861, he had commenced the study of law at Brattleboro, in the office of his uncle, Hon. Royall Tyler. When the first call was issued for volunteers, for three years or the war, he at once wrote to his father asking permission to enlist. If such promptness of application is an example of the zeal of our young men, the brief answer which he received by return mail, illustrates the feeling equally prevalent among their parents:

"MY DEAR JOHN:—If you do not enlist, you will be ashamed hereafter to look your children in the face."

He joined, as a private, the men then being enrolled in Brattleboro, and when they were organized as company C, of the Second Regiment, he was chosen First Lieutenant, his commission bearing date May 17, 1861. June 24, the regiment left Burlington on its way to the front. From that time to the end, his history is merged in that of the regiment. The son or brother marched away in the flush of youth and strength, with a tear on his cheek and the light of hope in his eye, and, save a brief leave of absence, they saw him no more till he was brought back to them, tenderly, in that dreamless sleep which no reveille shall disturb.

Within a short month of his departure, we gain our first destined view of the first lieutenant of Co. C., revealed by the lurid glare of Bull Run's luckless fight, Captain Todd wounded, and he in chief command, rallying his men with an indignant appeal as to "what they would say in Vermont, if the Green Mountain boys did not stand firm though all others fled." On the 8th of January, Capt. Todd resigned, and Lieut. Tyler was promoted to his place, January 23, 1862. Capt. Tyler retained the command of Co. C for 14 months, notwithstanding several proposals of promotion by transfer to other regiments. This period included the campaigns of McClellan, Pope and Burnside, and in most of the severe engagements of that battle summer he was present.

Occasional letters, written during the advance and retreat on the Peninsula, are preserved. He speaks with pride of the Vermont brigade at Lee's Mills; at Williamsburg, in the fearful battles of the seven days, and in the terrible retreat through White Oak Swamp. After describing the repulse of the pursuing rebels at Savage Station, June 29, '62, he says:

"The darkness was so intense we could not see our hands before us; but the retreat must be continued, and on we tramp through rain, mud and infernal darkness, until White Oak Swamp lies between us and the foe. We marched all night, many a poor fellow, exhausted, fell out of the ranks, to be picked up by rebel cavalry. On the 30th, everything promised a day of rest. The swamp covers our rear, and the bridge is destroyed. The men rest and sleep as best they may, and a supply of provisions is brought up. When all is quiet, in the twinkling of an eye, the rebels, from forty pieces of rifled ordnance, planted with consummate skill, pour their leaden hail into our midst. 'Twas the most terrific scene I ever witnessed. Our batteries were unable for some time to return their fire, on account of their immense losses in men and horses; but reinforcements arriving, and our division having rallied from what promised to be a panic, we held our ground until midnight, and then covering the retreat by marching the remainder of the night, we reached James River at 7 A. M., next day."

August 27, he writes, from camp near Alexandria, Va.:

"We are all in good health, i. e., those that are left of us. Only 45 of the 87 who left Brattleboro for Burlington are now fit for duty; one-half gone in one year; in two—nous verrons."

In October following, his younger brother, Rufus C. Tyler, arrived at camp in charge of a company of recruits from Vermont. Rufus, not quite 15, had enlisted as a private in the 11th Regiment. Capt. Tyler procured his immediate discharge, on the plea of tender age. Rufus, having had some experience in sea life, obtained a commission in the volunteer navy, where he served to the end of the war, taking part in the capture of Fort Fisher and in other naval engagements. He was lost at sea while mate of that unfortunate ship, General Grant.

On the 9th of February, 1863, Captain Tyler was commissioned major in place of Major Stone, promoted. On the 3d and 4th of May following, occurred the battle of Fredericksburg, and Major Tyler, as once before, when captain, crossed the Rappahannock with the Vermont brigade. The Sixth Corps, flushed with victory, by taking the almost impregnable heights, were forced back by the overwhelming forces of Longstreet and Anderson.

Major Wales, then Captain of Co. C, recalls an incident of this fight. "Major Tyler," he says, "in the highest excitement was leading the regiment in a charge, pell mell up the hill, clearing the rifle pits, out of which the rebels were tumbling like swallows out of a bank. When about half up, the order of recall was given. 'Not till we have taken those works,' said the major, and it is a singular fact, he could not hear the order till we had done it."

In September, 1863, the Second Vermont, under the command of Maj. Tyler, was sent to New York and Poughkeepsie to enforce the draft. After the tramp of the Sixth Corps through Culpepper to Madison Court House, he adds this postscript to a letter of March 4, 1864:

"I omitted to mention an important event of our late expedition. I captured a small contraband; have him to black my boots; says his name is Andy—never had any other. I have affixed Johnson, of Tennessee."

Andy, now known as Andrew J. Reid, remained in Col. Tyler's service till his death, and is still with his relatives in Brattleboro.

His commission as Lieutenant-Colonel is dated April 2, 1864, but its reception by him was delayed until the 24th, on which day his last letter to his father thus briefly announces his promotion:

"Rev. Dr. Tyler: Compliments of his affectionate son,

JOHN TYLER, Lt.-Col. Vt. Vols."

Hitherto, in all the battles in which he had been engaged, he had escaped uninjured, but at the sanguinary struggle of May 4th, in the Wilderness, when the Vermont brigade, at such a fearful sacrifice, maintained the very key of General Grant's position, he received what proved to be his death wound. In the same charge upon the rebel line, Col. Stone was killed and Lt.-Col. Tyler fell, struck in the thigh by several buckshot. As his boot filled with blood, he supposed the femoral artery was pierced and that he should immediately bleed to death. He urged his men to go ahead, as it was useless to remove him. He was, however, removed to the field hospital, where the bleeding for a time stopped, to again commence, and he sank from exhaustion and died May 23, having completed his 21st year the 29th of April preceding. His commission as colonel, dated May 6, 1864, was forwarded to his uncle by Gov. J. G. Smith, with the highest testimonials as to his character and abilities.

Hon. Frederick Holbrook, who was governor during two years of the war, and from whom he received his commission as captain and major, says of him:

"I knew Col. Tyler intimately and was fondly attached to him for his many manly traits and virtues, and fully believed, before time had proved it, he would make a man in the best sense of that term. I well remember his patriotic enthusiasm in raising a company for the war, and the faithfulness and perseverance with which he discharged every duty as a soldier. I may say, in a few words, that 'the elements were so mixed in him,' as to make him one of the best of our volunteer officers.—Extract from the Tyler Papers.

GEORGE BATY BLAKE,

The youngest of nine children of John Welland and Abigail Jones Blake, was born at Brattleboro, Vt., May 19, 1808. His father and mother were married at Brattleboro, May 24, 1790, by Gardner Chase, Esq. His mother died Dec. 14, 1808, within a few months after George's birth, at the age of 42 years, and his father Oct. 27, 1818, aged 59 years. They were both buried in the beautiful graveyard on the hill near their Brattleboro home.

George, thus early left an orphan, was placed, during a portion of his infancy, and cared for by Stephen Greenleaf and his family, living at the West Village, and in after years he held their memory in grateful remembrance. Subsequently he lived at the homestead until the age of thirteen. His eldest sister, Anna Sophia, who, in 1814, married Henry Cabot, son of Hon. George Cabot, of Boston, had charge of the household during George's childhood until she went to Boston upon her marriage, and there lived until her death in 1845. Mrs. Cabot is well remembered in Boston society of the time, for her personal charms and her winning, social graces.

After the death of his father, George was for a few years particularly under the charge of his eldest brother, John Rice Blake. These brothers, the eldest and youngest of the family, long survived the other children, and were for twenty years or more partners in the banking business, which George undertook about the year 1850, in Boston, and to which the energies of the remaining years of his life were largely given.

Although George's father had been a man of very considerable wealth for the time, at his death the family were left quite poor, so that when Mr. Dickerman, a dry goods dealer from Boston, who chanced to see George, then a lad of thirteen, in Brattleboro, and offered him a place in his store, the family gladly availed themselves of the offer, and the boy went to Boston. He lived at first with his sister, Mrs. Cabot, in Winthrop Place, Boston, and for two or three years received from his brother John and this sister $50 a year, which was the only money help he ever received. He was in Mr. Dickerman's employ a few years, and went thence to his brother-in-law, Edward Clarke, of Edward Clarke & Co. dry goods importers, and before he was 21 years of age, Mr. Clarke took him into the firm as partner, and he went at once to England to buy goods. From this time, in 1828, he was constantly going to England and the Continent of Europe for the purchase of goods, making many acquaintances and some life-long friendships. Among many others he thus came to know George Peabody, at that time a buyer of dry goods for his Baltimore firm, and afterwards long resident in London, where for several years Mr. Blake had large business relations with his firm.

May 24, 1833, Mr. Blake married his cousin, Anna Hull, daughter of Joshua Blake, of Boston, a prominent and successful merchant, doing business with the Mediterranean ports. They were married at her father's house in Winthrop Place, by the Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood, of King's Chapel, at which church Mr. Blake then, and during his whole life, attended service, acting for several years as vestryman, and always taking a deep and lively interest in the church and its several clergymen.

In these early years in England, Mr. Blake made the acquaintance of Richard Cobden, the distinguished English statesman, then, in 1835, partner in a cotton printing establishment near Manchester, where he had built up a prosperous business. Mr. Blake at this time bought goods of Mr. Cobden, and had a great admiration for the qualities which later won him such distinction as a legislator and political economist. Mr. Blake gave full adherence to Mr. Cobden's free trade views, and was always of the opinion that for any country custom duties were only to be justified by the need of revenue. He recognized, however, for the United States, that reform in this direction, in justice to large vested interests, must be somewhat gradual; but looked confidently to absolute free trade for all nations, and believed that in the not distant future, the United States, under a free trade policy, would be cotton manufacturers for the world.

The children of this marriage were nine, of whom the two first born died in infancy, and the youngest of all, bearing the name of his paternal grandfather, John Welland, died in 1861, aged nearly 15 years. The other children, four sons and two daughters, are still surviving, in the year 1880, and all the sons were for years partners in their father's firms in Boston, New York and London. This business is still continued by the sons and their associates selected by Mr. Blake, essentially as established by him.

Mr. Blake, after leaving the firm of Edward Clarke & Co., formed a copartnership for the importation of dry goods with Mr. William Almy, under the firm name of Almy, Blake & Co., and during this time and subsequently was constantly crossing the Atlantic for the prosecution of his business in buying goods through England, France and Belgium. He next formed a copartnership with David Nevins and Edward H. R. Lyman, under the firm name of George B. Blake & Co., also importers of dry goods. Both these gentlemen still survive, Mr. Nevins living near Boston, carrying on a large manufacturing business, and Mr. Lyman in Brooklyn, N. Y., has been long associated with his brother-in-law, Mr. A. A. Low, in the firm of A. A. Low & Bros., the prominent China firm.

About the year 1846, Mr. Blake's health, which had always been delicate, failing him, he was obliged to give up active business, and in the spring of 1847, he bought an estate in Brookline, near Boston, where he lived the rest of his life excepting during the winters of the last few years; these were passed at his house in Boston.

During the three or four years' interval in his active business career, Mr. Blake became a director in the Boston & Worcester Railroad, and took a most active interest in the affairs of that corporation, giving much of his time and energy to the development of its growing business. He was one of the very earliest to favor and promote the joining of this railroad with the Western road. In 1850, Mr. Blake associated himself with Mr. Addison Gilmore, president of the Western (now Boston & Albany) road, and Mr. George Cabot Ward, son of Thomas G. Ward, Boston agent of Baring Bros. & Co., of London, for the prosecution of a foreign and domestic banking business. The firm name was Gilmore, Blake & Ward. Mr. Gilmore dying very suddenly shortly after this firm was established, the name was changed to Blake, Ward & Co., and later to Blake, Howe & Co. At this time his brother, John Rice Blake, came from Brattleboro and joined him as partner, the firm name being later changed to Blake Brothers & Co., the three eldest sons joining as partners about the year 1860.

One of the leading aims of Mr. Blake, throughout his business career, was to advance in every possible way the commercial interests of Boston. He was largely instrumental in securing and maintaining the regular visits of the Cunard steamers to that port.

During the civil war he was always most warmly interested in the maintenance of the Union. Originally a Whig in politics, and voting for Henry Clay in the presidential election, Mr. Blake early sympathized in the views of Garrison, Sumner and the others who looked upon African slavery in the United States as a barbarism. With many other law-abiding citizens of Massachusetts, his sense of justice was shocked by the enforcement of the fugitive slave law in Boston, by the returning of Anthony Burns into servitude. He endeavored to prevent this by offering, through a friend, to buy Burns of his owner, who then refused to sell his property at any price.

When the State of Massachusetts was rapidly forwarding troops for the suppression of the Rebellion, and incurring a large debt for bounties and other war expenses, the money market had become exceedingly active, so that the State, for providing money on their notes having a few months to run, paid as high as 12 per cent. per annum. At this time it became necessary for funding her bounty loan indebtedness, that the State should promptly secure some three or four millions of dollars. This was finally done by a sale to Mr. Blake, by Gov. Andrew and his council, of two millions of five per cent. sterling bonds, with a short option for another million and a half at the price agreed upon. Mr. Blake was then made, by Gov. Andrew, agent for the State for the negotiation of this loan, which he was authorized to domiciliate for payment of principal and interest in London, with either of several firms selected by Mr. Blake and approved by the State authorities, foremost among whom were the Barings and Rothschilds. Mr. Blake went at once to London on this mission, but found the times most unfavorable for such negotiations, the Bank of England having suddenly advanced the rate of interest to ten per cent. Finally he succeeded in inducing the Barings to take a joint interest in this purchase of two millions. Owing to the condition of the London money market, however, no bonds had been sold up to the time when the option to take the further amount was maturing. Mr. Blake, however, took the further responsibility of assuming the additional amount. He always felt that the deserved high credit of Massachusetts was largely due to the strong sense and high integrity of Gov. Andrew, insisting upon the payment of gold for the principal and interest of the State debt throughout the suspension of specie payment by the United States government.

Mr. Blake died at his house in Brookline, Aug. 6, 1875, his death resulting from a severe attack of paralysis at his office in Boston two days before. His wife had died two years previous, June 7, 1873, at the Brookline home.

GEO. B. BLAKE.

[From the Boston Daily Advertiser of August 11, 1875. Written by Gamaliel Bradford].

The recent removal by death of Mr. George Baty Blake from business circles, will turn back the memories of many men over the last fifty years of the commercial history of Boston. The youngest of nine children, of a highly respectable family in Brattleboro, Vt., he came to Boston in 1821, with nothing but his own exertions to depend upon. Amid the numerous temptations which a city life offers to young men, he kept himself pure and his moral character free from reproach. His aspirations were high and were aided by an innate refinement, which distinguished him through life. His manners and bearing were always those of a gentleman, and nothing coarse or vulgar ever found favor with him.

Probably there is no society in the world where the English language is spoken, in which Mr. Blake would not have borne himself with credit. Of his commercial sagacity there is no need to speak. In the long course of his business career he never failed to meet his engagements promptly, and during the years in which he acted as a director of the Boston & Worcester Railroad, his judgment, energy and decision were such as to command the respect of his associates in an unusual degree.

Mr. Blake delighted to select young men, to give them a chance of advancement, and to feel that they owed their success to him. During an acquaintance of nearly 30 years, of which 17 were passed in close and daily intercourse, the writer of this notice never received from him a harsh or unkind word. To his inferiors in station he was uniformly kind and courteous, a fact to which many attached dependants can bear witness. In his family relations he was affectionate, almost without limit, and, as a father, at once indulgent and firm. If the tree is to be judged by its fruit, he needs no other monument than the character of the group of children who received his last adieus.

Without theological bigotry, Mr. Blake was decidedly a religious man. His attendance at church was regular and quite as much from pleasure as duty. He has often been heard to speak with emotion of sermons which particularly pleased him. His reverence for sacred things, though unostentatious, was real, and any man who acted from conscientious motives was sure of respectful treatment from him. He professed to be, and we believe was, governed by a sense of responsibility to a higher power. We are quite sure that his descendants will attach less value to the pecuniary inheritance which devolves upon them, than to the memory which they can thus cherish and hold in honor.

REV. JOHN CALVIN HOLBROOK, D. D.,

Brother of Ex-Gov. Holbrook, was born in this town June 7, 1808. His father, Dea. John Holbrook, of whom is a brief account in this work, commencing on page 34, was the first publisher of the 4to Bible in the United States who made use of stereotype plates. Said plates were imported from England about 1816, and first put in use in this, then small village, in the remarkably successful enterprize.

John C. was fortunate in his mental and physical organization, and well improved his opportunities for intellectual culture. He was full of life, activity and good humor, and invariably a leading spirit with his associates. He was two years a student at Hopkins Academy, in Hadley, Mass., under Rev. Dan Huntington, father of Bishop Huntington, of Central New York; one year under the tuition of Rev. E. H. Newton, and two years a cadet in Capt. Partridge's Military Academy, Norwich, Vt., at the most prosperous period of that institution.

Soon after he entered as clerk in the book store of Messrs. Holbrook & Fessenden.

He became a member of the Congregational Church under the ministrations of Rev. Jonathan McGee. After a few years he succeeded his father in the book publishing and paper making business. Subsequently he became a member of the firm of Richardson, Lord & Holbrook, in Boston, one of the oldest and most extensive book selling houses in the United States, and removed to that city, where he conceived the plan of the Comprehensive Commentary on the Bible, in 6 royal 8vo volumes, and of the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge and the Polyglot Family Bible, which were prepared under his direction. He sold out his interest in Boston and returned to Brattleboro to publish the aforementioned and other works. From about this time his action seemed wholly under the control of a high ideal. However it might be with his personal interests, he seemed determined to leave this world in a better moral condition than he found it. His publications were all of a religious character, and his undertakings great; but he would rather fail, and even perish, in a good cause than to succeed in a bad one. Success in business was mainly desirable that he might have the ability to forward his religious and beneficent plans. While prosperity attended him, he assisted several young men in fitting for the ministry.

In the days of his youth, some fifty years ago, his mind was much exercised in regard to the great west, for he believed the time not distant when she would control in our national councils. Therefore, not only the welfare of the union, but of the world, demanded that the ideas of religious and political freedom, inculcated by the fathers of New England, be early implanted in the growing communities of the west.

His last great business undertaking proved too much for his means, and the Brattleboro Typographic Co. was incorporated, of which he was President, to continue the business. Before 1840 he gave up this position and removed to Davenport, Iowa. While there he was licensed to preach by the Congregational Association, and became pastor of a church in the city of Dubuque in the same State, and in 1842 was ordained. Here he labored eleven years and was instrumental in building up one of the strongest churches in the State. He was then invited to remove to Chicago and establish and edit the Congregational Herald, and to establish the New England Congregational Church, now one of the leading churches of the city and State. After three years of labor there he was re-called to the pastorate of his former church in Dubuque, where he labored eleven years longer.

Being solicited to undertake the raising of an endowment fund for Iowa College, he removed to Boston, and, in a little more than a year, collected upwards of forty thousand dollars for that purpose. While engaged in this work, he was called to become pastor of the old and large Congregational Church in Homer, N. Y. During his ministrations of six years in Homer, he was induced, by the American Missionary Association, of New York City, to visit Great Britain and address meetings, held for raising funds for the education of the lately liberated slaves of this country. He accepted this invitation, having leave of absence from his church, and was enabled to send home about thirty thousand dollars for this object. During his absence he visited the principal parts of England and Scotland, portions of Ireland and the continent, going to Paris and thence to Italy, as far south as Naples, and returning through Switzerland. While absent he wrote a series of letters for the Boston Recorder, and occasionally one for the Congregationalist and New York Independent, as well as for the Dubuque Daily Times.

From Homer he was called to the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Stockton, one of the chief cities of California, and after two years' labor there, was chosen by the General Association of New York State, in 1872, Secretary of the newly formed Home Missionary Society, and removed to Syracuse, where he has since resided in the discharge of the duties of this important office.

Mr. Holbrook was married in 1829, to Miss Cynthia S. Tuttle, of Windsor, Vt., by whom he had four children, all deceased. She died in Davenport, Iowa, of consumption. His present wife was Miss Ann L. Clark, of Platteville, Wis. They have no children, but adopted and brought up as their own, two sisters, both now married and settled in Stockton and Dubuque.

While living in Brattleboro, Mr. Holbrook was chosen deacon at the same time his father was in that office in the same church, (a rare case,) and was superintendent of the Sunday School.

In Boston he was a member of Dr. Lyman Beecher's church, and for a time the clerk of it.

While in the west he aided in founding Iowa College, and was one of its trustees while he lived in the State. In Chicago he also co-operated in originating and founding the flourishing Chicago Theological Seminary, and was one of its directors, and for a time Vice President of the Board.

In 1863, the honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Williams College, of which Dr. Mark Hopkins was President.

The grandmother of Mr. Holbrook, Sybil Lane, was a lineal descendant of Gov. Bradford, of Plymouth Colony.

Since 1856 he has been a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He was one of the originators and members of the Historic Albany Convention of Congregationalists, and has several times been delegate to the National Council of that denomination.

While he resided in Brattleboro he manifested much interest in all public improvements, and was active in the projected railroad from Brattleboro to Troy. He was also appointed by the Governor of Vermont, Commissioner to superintend the expenditure of three thousand dollars, granted by the Legislature to procure a preliminary survey of a route for a railroad from the south line of the State, north on the west bank of the Connecticut, which was accomplished by Prof. Twining, of New Haven, Conn., and which prepared the way of the present Connecticut and Valley Railroads.

He was also one of the four original Trustees of the Vermont Asylum for the Insane, under the will of the founder, Mrs. Marsh, and by the act of incorporation. He took a deep interest in the establishment and progress of this important institution, and, in spite of discouragement, it was largely owing to his influence and persistent efforts that it went into operation.

Mr. Holbrook is still, at the age of 73, (1880,) actively engaged in superintending the operations of the New York Home Missionary Society, of which he is Secretary, having charge of all its affairs in the State.

LIEUT. COL. ADDISON BROWN

Was born at Brattleboro, Vt., June 6, 1838, and was, at the time of his death, in his 26th year. His father, the Rev. Addison Brown, of Brattleboro, Vt., was well and favorably known throughout the State.

Armed with the rudiments of a good education, impressed with the moral and religious teachings of his home, and with the spirit of enterprise not uncommon to American youths, young Brown left the paternal roof at an early period in life, and sought his fortune in the Western States. At Rockford, Ill., and on the upper Mississippi in Minnesota, he prosecuted business with an industry and intelligence that gave promise to future success. Returning to visit his friends in Vermont, he was induced to remain in the East for a time, and the breaking out of the war of the rebellion, in April, 1861, found him in the city of New York.

Filled with an ardent love of country, and true to the principles of Republican liberty, he volunteered at the first beat of the drum, and enlisted as a private in the 12th Regiment, New York Volunteer Militia, a three month's Regiment, commanded by Colonel, afterwards Maj. General Butterfield. The Regiment took part in Patterson's campaign in the Shenandoah Valley.

After the muster out of said Regiment, private Brown returned to Brattleboro, assisted in raising a company, and, in September, 1861, again entered the service as Captain of Co. F, 4th Vermont Volunteers.

The winter of 1861-2, one of great mortality to Vermont troops, Capt. Brown fell a victim to disease, and for several weeks remained in a critical condition, but before the opening of the spring was able to be with his command.

In March, 1862, he accompanied his command to Fortress Monroe, and up the Peninsula to Warwick Creek, where the first engagement of note took place, April 16, 1862, on which occasion Capt. Brown, though not in the most active part of the engagement, displayed, under heavy fire and trying circumstances, the calm and deliberate enthusiasm for which he was afterwards so justly distinguished. At the battles of Williamsburgh, Golding's Farm and Savage Station, he bore an honorable part with his Regiment.

At the battle of Crampton's Gap, (Smith Mountain,) Sept. 14, 1862, in the charge that drove the rebels from their chosen position, the 4th Vermont scaled the heights, and captured a Virginia Regiment almost entire. In this brilliant affair Capt. Brown bore an active and distinguished part.

At the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg, Bank's Ford, Gettysburg, Funks-town, Orange Grove, Opequan and the Wilderness, Capt. Brown was always where duty called him, and showed quick comprehension, great presence of mind and justly won great praise.

M

Sept. 20, 1864, the term of service of the 4th Vermont expired. His commission as Lieut. Colonel of the 5th Regiment, had not reached him; under these circumstances, in obedience to existing orders, he had but one course to pursue, and that was to return to Vermont with that portion of the Regiment ordered there to be mustered out. Arriving in Vermont with the 4th Regiment, Col. Brown spent a short time with his friends, and, upon receiving word that his commission as Lieut. Colonel of the 5th Regiment had been forwarded to the army in the field, he left home for active service again.

At the time Col. Brown left for Vermont with the 4th Regiment, his health was considerably impaired, but it was not anticipated that it was seriously so. It was hoped that a few weeks of rest from the cares, arduous labors and severe exposures of the service would restore him to health again. He returned to the field with renewed hope and zeal, it is true, but with unrestored health. A leave of absence was granted him, and he left his command Dec. 8, 1864, for Rockford, Ill., to regain his health and strength and returned to duty again. But he had ended his last campaign, he had fought his last battle. The severity of the service had been too much for his physical system, and he who had stood firm while others quailed, at last yielded to disease. Acting upon medical advice, he started with his devoted wife for the coast of Florida. He had not proceeded far when it became evident that his strength was too rapidly failing for so long a journey, and stopped for the night at Harrisburg, Penn., where he died March 3, 1865.

His example was for good, and his daily conduct was worthy of imitation. He never yielded to the use of intoxicating drinks, so prevalent in the army, and on no occasion was Col. Brown ever heard to use a profane or licentious word. His conversation was direct and agreeable, and his language pure and simple. He was very particular to do exact justice to all, and he would spare no pains to see that the humblest soldier of his command had full justice done him. While he was kind to all, he frowned indignantly upon any act of cowardice or disposition to shirk the performance of duty. He was an affectionate man. He remembered home and friends, and would often speak of the loved ones there in terms of fond endearment.

In the winter of 1862-3 he married the accomplished daughter of Melancthon Starr, Esq., of Rockford, Ill., to whom he was devotedly attached. During the severest campaigns he would find a few moments time, nearly or quite every day, usually just before seeking rest by sleep, to write a few lines to her and other friends, how it went with him and his country's cause.

In the death of Col. Brown, Vermont lost one of her noblest sons, a true soldier and an honest man.—Extract from Vermont Phoenix.

GROUT FAMILY IN BRATTLEBORO.

The genealogy and history of the Grout family, of Westminster and Newfane, and afterwards of West Brattleboro, Vt., is briefly as follows:

DEA. JOHN GROUT was born in Westminster, Vt., August 17, 1788, went to live in Newfane about 1810, moved to West Brattleboro in 1836, and died here October 16, 1851. He was son of John Grout, of Westminster, Vt., who was the son of Thomas, of Spencer, Mass., who was the son of John, of Sudbury, Mass., who was the son of John, of the same town, who was the son of Capt. John, of Watertown and Dudley, who came over from England to America, about 1634, at the age of eighteen, who is believed to have been the son of Richard Grout, or Grouette, of Walton, in the county of Derby, England, whose family is supposed to have settled in Cornwall, in the west part of England, during the reign of Henry II., 1154-89, and to have originated in Germany, where they bore the name of Grotius, or Groot, alias Grote, Gross, Gros, or Graus, who are believed to be the descendants of the Grudii, or the Great, of whom Cæsar speaks as among the daring tribes of Belgic Gaul, upwards of fifty years previous to the Christian era.

John Grout was married to Azubah, daughter of Jonathan Dunklee, of Brattleboro, May 28, 1811, and had nine children, of whom eight were sons. His wife, Azu-bah, died in West Brattleboro, July 24, 1866, aged 73 years; his own age, at the time of his death, being 63 years.

LEWIS, the eldest of the children, was born January 28, 1815; fitted for college, in part, at Brattleboro Academy, and in part at Burr Seminary, Manchester, Vt.; graduated at Yale in 1842. Having taught nearly two years at West Point, N. Y., he studied theology at New Haven two years, graduated at Andover (Ms.) Theological Seminary in 1846, and was ordained October 8, same year, as a missionary to South Africa, and married to Miss Lydia Bates, in Springfield, Vt., whence he and his wife started, the same day, for mission work, under the auspices of the American Board, among the Zulus, in Natal. Two months' sailing brought them to the Cape of Good Hope, where they spent six weeks, then set sail for the rest of the voyage, and reached their desired haven February 15, 1847. Mr. Grout's mission life was one of much activity, labor and study, of a pioneer character, full of solid reality, yet not a little diversified with what, in America, would be regarded as wild and romantic. He gave much time and attention to the study of African languages, especially the Zulu, of which it became his duty, by appointment of the mission of which he was a member, to prepare a grammar. He translated the Scriptures and prepared other books in the Zulu tongue, for the natives; having charge of the printing press for a time at his station, Umsunduzi. He was also engaged in teaching and preaching, traveling and exploring; establishing a station and organizing a church where there had never been a trace of civilization or Christianity; and so obliged to be, for himself and his people, architect and carpenter, brickmaker and mason, wheelwright and blacksmith, tamer and trainer of oxen and horses, physician and dentist, farmer and magistrate—to say nothing of finding and building roads, fording rivers, and trapping leopards, and nothing of incidental studies in Natural History, of preparing a sketch of the native tribes, of having now and then a controversial bout with the Colonial Government in behalf of Aboriginal rights; or with Bishop Colenso on Biblical teaching, moral science, and the proper way of treating polygamy among a heathen people in their coming to embrace the Christian faith and enter the church of Christ. All which manifold duties and vocations left no time for idleness, or even for that needful rest which a tropical clime makes all the more imperative for the foreigner of a cooler sky. Yet here he labored fifteen years, or till March 12, 1862, when, with impaired health, he made return sail, reaching Boston June 7, 1862.

Having rested for a time, Sept. 21st, he took charge of the Congregational church in Saxtons River, for a year; was then settled as pastor of the Congregational church in Feeding Hills, Mass., two years, after which, Oct. 1, 1865, he entered on an agency for the American Missionary Association in New Hampshire and Vermont, an office which he still continues to hold, having his home in West Brattleboro.

ADMATHA GROUT, second son, born Feb. 19, 1817; fitted for college in Brattleboro Academy; graduated from Dartmouth in 1845, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1851. But failing health did not allow of his entering upon the work of the ministry. He died in Osawatimie, Kansas Territory, Sept. 6, 1855.

HANNAH, third child, born May 9, 1819; married to Mr. Lyman C. Ranney, of Westminster West, Aug. 18, 1859. They reside now at St. Johnsbury Centre.

SYLVESTER BISHOP GROUT, 4th child, born Feb. 7, 1822; married Nancy R. Montague, of Guilford, Jan. 8, 1852; lived in West Brattleboro till March, 1872; removed to Kansas; is now living in Clarion, Kansas. Mrs. Grout died September 23, 1879.

PAULINUS SCOTT GROUT, born Nov. 18, 1823; died in West Brattleboro, March 14, 1847.

ISAAC A. GROUT, born March 2, 1826; went in early life to live with his uncle Isaac, in Putney; being of age, went to California, where he still resides. He was married April 10, 1879, to Mary T. Taft, of San Francisco.

CHESTER GILBERT GROUT, born April 3, 1828; married Emeline Washburn, of Springfield, Vt.; lived in Kansas for a time; went to Illinois, there volunteered during the late war, and entered the 7th Iowa regiment of the Federal army; was in several severe engagements, as at Belmont, Fort Donelson, and Fort Henry; is now living in Kansas.

HENRY MARTYN GROUT, seventh son and eighth child, born May 14, 1831; graduated from Williams College in 1854, and married Miss Fannie J. Foster, daughter of Rev. Amos Foster, of Putney, Vt. He was Principal, for a time, of Brattleboro Academy, afterwards of Monson Academy; was licensed to preach in 1856; labored for a time in Marlboro, Vt.; was afterwards installed over the church in Putney; called to West Rutland, was installed Aug. 26, 1862. His next pastorate, four years, was in West Springfield, Mass., after which he was for several years associate editor in the literary department of the "Congregationalist," of Boston. He was called to the pastorate of Trinity Church, in Concord, Mass., in 1872, where he is still laboring; in 1878, received the honorary title of Doctor of Divinity, from his Alma Mater.

JOHN MILO GROUT, 9th child of John and Azubah Grout, born April 13, 1835, in Newfane, where all the other children were born; was married May 25, 1858, to Miss Sarah A. Herrick, of West Brattleboro. He engaged in mercantile business, for a time, in Hartford, Conn.; afterwards in Putney, then in West Brattleboro; now resides in Medford, Mass.

While engaged in mission work, in Natal, the Rev. Lewis Grout was chosen corresponding member of the American Oriental Society, in whose "Journal" may be found a number of literary and linguistic papers from his pen, such as an "Essay on the Zulu and other Dialects of South Africa," "A Uniform Orthography of South African Dialects," "Phonology and Orthography" and "Particles of the Isizulu and its Cognates." Among the other literary productions of his pen are "Reply" and "Answer" to Bishop Colenso, on Polygamy, and a "Review of the Bishop's Notes on Romans;" "Dedicatory, Installing, Historical, and other "Sermons;" "History of the Zulu and other tribes in South Africa;" "Reminiscences of Life among the Zulu-Kaffirs;" "Zulu-Land;" "A Grammar of the Zulu Language;" "Zulu-English Vocabulary;" "English-Zulu Vocabulary;" and translations of Psalms, Acts, and other portions of the Bible into the Zulu language. REV. LEWIS GROUT.

HON. DANIEL KELLOGG

Was born at Amherst, Mass., Feb. 10, 1791, graduated at Williams College in 1810, studied law with Gen. Martin Field, and commenced practice at Rockingham, Vt. in 1814, where he continued to reside until 1854, when he removed to Brattleboro, where he died May 10, 1875, aged 84 years.

The name and character of this gentleman as a successful advocate at the bar, President of the Bellows Falls Bank and Judge of the Supreme Court, had long been known to the people of Brattleboro, therefore, as was anticipated, the accession of himself and family to this community proved an acquisition of the most desirable character. In various ways did the action of Judge Kellogg and his estimable wife, the daughter of Judge Aldis, of St. Albans, contribute to the welfare and attractions of Brattleboro. To the Episcopal Society, then struggling to obtain a foothold and a church building in this place, their influence and material aid was indispensable, and will ever be gratefully remembered.

They purchased the estate of Hon. John Phelps on High Street, and on grounds of the same erected a handsome residence. Mrs. Kellogg, by the exercise of her taste and culture, intellectual attainments and instructive conversation, rendered her home one of the most attractive resorts in this place. She was, we learn, a pupil in the Troy Seminary, under the management of Miss Willard, and graduated with great proficiency and honor from that institution, which, at that time, had a reputation unequalled in this country.

The greater portion of Judge Kellogg's active life had passed before he became a resident of this town, where he closed his long life of 84 years, therefore we give an extract from the pen of those qualified to give us correct information regarding him.

"He married, first, Jane McAfee, of Rockingham; second, Merab Ann Bradley, daughter of Hon. Wm. C. Bradley, of Westminster; third, Miranda M. Aldis, daughter of Hon. Asa Aldis, of St. Albans.

He was for a few years State's Attorney for Windham County, and Judge of Probate for the District of Westminster, Secretary to the old Governor and Council of Vermont, during the administration of

Gov. Butler and Gov. Van Ness, United States District Attorney for the State of Vermont 12 years during the administrations of Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, Adjutant and Inspector General of the State, represented the town of Rockingham in the General Assembly, and for two years State Senator for Windham County. In 1843, he was chosen President of the State Constitutional Convention, and Judge of the Supreme Court of the State from 1845 to 1852.

His children were: HENRY, born Aug. 23, 1823, graduated at Williams College in 1843, engaged in the study of law with Hon. William C. Bradley, of Westminster, Vt., and was drowned while bathing in the Connecticut River at that place, June 18, 1844.

GEORGE B., born in November, 1825, studied law with Hon. Asa Keyes, of Brattleboro, married to Mary L. Sikes, daughter of Uriel Sikes, of Brattleboro, March 15, 1847, commenced the practice of his profession at Rockingham in 1846, soon after his father was elected Judge of the Supreme Court, removed to Brattleboro in 1855, appointed Postmaster at Brattleboro in 1861, State's Attorney for Windham County three years, Adjutant and Inspector General for the State from 1854 to '59, represented the town of Brattleboro in the General Assembly two years, was active in raising and enlisting the Vermont Cavalry Regiment, and was Lieut. Colonel thereof during the Rebellion, at the conclusion of which he was discharged, and resumed the practice of his profession at St. Louis, where he died in November, 1875.

SARAH B., born in August, 1831, married Henry A. Willard, of Washington, D. C., in November, 1855, where she now resides.

DANIEL, born April 9, 1834, married Margaret W. May, of Brattleboro, May 2, 1861, was Postmaster at Brattleboro from 1862 to July, 1868.

At the time Judge Kellogg was elected an associate Justice of the Supreme Court he was in the enjoyment of a lucrative practice in the judicial district for which he was chosen, and although at the time he was open and undisguised in his devotion to the democracy, and had accepted the position of United States District Attorney for the State under Jackson, yet his fidelity in the discharge of his official duties, discretion and sterling honesty, his learning and ability as a lawyer, all conspired to secure an election from his political opponents. His personal popularity was so great in his Judicial District, that he secured an almost unanimous vote from the members of the General Assembly representing the district for which he was chosen, although a large majority of the members were radically opposed to his political opinions, yet they freely and cordially supported him for an office which has always been regarded as the highest and most honorable in the State.

In his deportment he was kind and courteous towards his professional brethren and judicial associates. During an extensive practice of more than fifty years, his fidelity to his clients was never questioned, his social, political and business relations were characterized by great frankness and sincerity, and his whole life was distinguished by the most perfect integrity. He was a careful and laborious student, precise and painstaking in the preparation of his cases. His examination and presentation of authorities indicated great industry and research.

Although he had been unfaltering in his devotion to the democracy from his early manhood, the free and almost unanimous support he received from the representatives of his judicial district indicated the estimate in which he was held as a lawyer and a citizen."

Hon. James Barrett, of Woodstock, who succeeded Mr. Kellogg as Judge of the Supreme Court, and has always been assigned to the same judicial district, says of him: "I was in practice in the County of Windsor during all his official service, he was adequate to all its responsibilities and requirements, his lawyership was broad, accurate, practical and sensible, the result of faithful study, faithful and extensive practice, of a large conversancy with current business and affairs in all departments, and of most excellent social culture and bearing. As in all things else, so in the law, as practitioner and Judge, his faculty and fondness of order, system and propriety were marked, and secured not only the best results from these qualities in the conduct and dispatch of business, but the highest respect and esteem of all, both clients, the public and the bar. His personal character was blameless and without the stain or shadow of dubious propriety in any respect in all the relations he sustained in life."

"The State Reports which contain the opinions he delivered during his judgeship show that he was worthy of his position, and a worthy associate of the eminent men who were his fellow Judges. In conclusion I may properly say, from my familiarity with the people of Windham County since I have been in service as Judge, that the uniform expression of all in respect to him, has shown that few men pass through so long a life, esteemed and honored and gratefully remembered by those who knew him in all his daily walk and conversation, in the deportment and outcome of his current life, private, public and official, as was Judge Kellogg."

We first met this gentleman eight years before he became a citizen of this place, under circumstances whereby we are reminded of the foregoing testimony of Judge Barrett, in relation to Judge Kellogg's "fondness of order, system and propriety." In October, 1846, the Windham County Agricultural Society held their annual meeting and exhibition here, and we believe it the first and only time that our town has been honored by such an occasion. The Common north of Main street was the exhibition ground for live stock, the old School-House for farm products and garden vegetables, the High School-House for manufactures, etc., and the old Unitarian Meeting-House was occupied by the members of the society after the exhibition closed, to hear the reports of the committees of the various departments, and transact all legitimate business coming before said society. Judge Kellogg was at that time President of the society, and presided over its action in the old meeting-house, where came into full exercise that "order, system and propriety," to which Judge Barrett alludes, causing dispatch of business and the high respect of all, both members of the society and the public.

After over twenty years of acquaintance and pleasant familiarity of the people of this place, with the subject of our sketch, they are compelled to confirm the concluding statements in the testimony of Hon. James Barrett.

Though Mr. Kellogg was some past three score years when he came here, he was not idle, he practiced law several years after he settled in this town, and during about the whole period of his life thereafter he was in offices of trust and responsibility. His facial expression, and the personnel of the whole man, was such as to inspire trust and confidence.

He was president of the old Savings Bank, the first chartered in the State, and one of the board of Trustees of the Vermont Asylum. For the best good of the patients, proper management and general welfare of the institution, he ever betrayed a warm and liberal interest. "The proper thing to do," was the first and uppermost question with him in every position he occupied.

Though a democrat, one of the most influential and decided in the State, he disapproved of the action of the administration in the Kansas outrages, and also its action, or rather its inaction, near the commencement of the late Rebellion or Civil War. When that awful strife was fully inaugurated, he said: "I know of no other way but to stand by the old flag, come what may, all else is, with me, of secondary consideration—my party, my church may perish, but save the country."

When we consider the long, successful life and honorable record of Judge Kellogg, the partner of his life, one of the finest examples of female excellence, we cannot be insensible to the compliment, to the honor received by this community, that he selected this place for the remaining years of his well spent life.

ROBERT G. HARDIE, JR.,

Son of Robert G. Hardie and Fanny W. Hyde, was born in this town in 1854. His early development of artistic talent excited public notice and attention. Before receiving any instruction, his friends were surprised by the accuracy of his pictures from nature. Among specimens of his work we have noticed portraits of Gen. Martin Field and wife, Jacob Estey and wife, Mrs. Col. Hooker, P. B. Francis, Esq., Rev. Mr. Cummings, Mrs. Dr. H. D. Holton, and Mrs. Gen. Marcy—mother-in-law of Gen. Geo. B. McClellan.

Upon real personal merit alone can one become noted or distinguished in this field of labor, and nothing would be more impossible than to undeservedly obtain a reputation for excellence in the same, as he has secured in his native town. It does not seem to have given him a satisfied pride, or made him vain to know that his early efforts receive commendation, and his works are appreciated; but, like all true sons of genius, he is constantly looking forward to the unattained. During the winter months of the last two or three years, he has pursued his favorite studies in New York city, but now (1879) we learn he is in more favorable conditions for this purpose, in France.

His genius, gentlemanly bearing, good habits and excellent moral character—not always associated with genius—has interested our best citizens in his welfare. Therefore it is with much pleasure we hear of his favorable progress in Paris, (the latest field of his efforts,) and that it is our privilege to place his record here in honor of his native home. His father, Robert G. Hardie, is a native of New York city, and his grandfather, Mr. John Hyde, who served in the war of 1812, came from Massachusetts to this town about fifty years ago. It is about thirty years since his name became associated, and, to the last years of his life, he was practically interested in, the improvement or regeneration of our village cemetery. But a short time has elapsed since the eyes of our venerable friend of eighty years closed forever, therefore there is here no more familiar name than that of "Uncle John Hyde."

HENRY DWIGHT HOLTON, M. D.,

Resident physician and surgeon, of Brattleboro, the past decade, was born at Saxtons River, Vt., July 24, 1838, married there Ellen Jane Hoit, Nov. 19, 1862, who was born Nov. 28, 1839, at Saxtons River, daughter of Theophilus and Mary Damon (Chandler) Hoit of S. R. The early training of Dr. Holton was of the strictest New England kind, and much of his success in life is undoubtedly due to the principles thus early instilled into his mind by his parents. His boyhood was like that of the majority of boys brought up on a farm, and is well described by Warner, in his book entitled, "Being a Boy." The following account of his life is from a book entitled, "Physicians and Surgeons of America," and a sketch of him in a work published by the Rocky Mountain Medical Association. He was fitted for college at the Saxtons River Seminary, and studied two years with Dr. J. H. Warren, of Boston, and two years with Professors Valentine and A. B. Mott, of New York, attending lectures at the same time in the medical department in the University of New York, from which he graduated in March, 1860, settling successfully in Brooklyn, N. Y., (physician to Williamsburgh Dispensary, Brooklyn, 1860,) Putney, Vt., and Brattleboro, Vt., his present residence. He has traveled extensively in Europe and this country. He is a member of the Connecticut River Valley Medical Society, of which he was Secretary from 1862 to 1867, and President in 1868; the Vermont Medical Society, of which he was censor for several years, and the President in 1868; the American Medical Association and the British Medical Association, a corresponding member of the Boston Gynecological Society, and member of the American Public Health Association, and a delegate to the International Medical Congress at Brussels in 1875. He is also a member of the Rocky Mountain Medical Association. The Doctor has contributed some valuable papers to medical journals and to transactions of medical societies, and reported at one time "Mott's Cliniques" for the press. An article describing his apparatus for keeping in place sternal dislocations of the clavical, and an article on diphtheria, are contributions which show research and ability. He was appointed by the court, in 1873, medical examiner to the Vermont Asylum for the Insane, and in the same year was elected by the Legislature one of the Trustees of the University of Vermont. He has been surgeon of the 12th regiment of Vermont militia. He is now Professor of Materia Medica and General Pathology in the medical department of the University of Vermont. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him in 1879, by the University of Vermont. In June, 1880, he was elected one of the Vice Presidents of the American Medical Association. The Doctor is a vigorous orator and a clear thinker, and well up in a knowledge of the most approved and latest methods of relieving human suffering.—From the "Farwell Memorial."

ECCENTRIC PERSONS IN BRATTLEBORO.

Mrs. Lydia Maria Child has, in some of her works, compared such persons to "sweet bells jangled out of tune."

Such characters, of varied capabilities, can be found in every community. The great deficiencies in some render them unworthy of notice, but the amusing peculiarities of others cause them to be conspicuous and quite universally known and remembered, while many persons of far greater usefulness are forgotten. Therefore the history of the odd specimens of humanity serves to remind us of persons and events that otherwise would be forever buried in oblivion.

OLD JIMMIE BARNES AND SUKIE, HIS WIFE,

Black Sam, Johnson, Aleck, Jess. Mash, John Dover, Ed. Gould and others, have each played their parts before the people of Brattleboro; the curtain dropped, and the actors, with a large share of their audience, passed onward beyond recall.

John W. Blake, Esq., our first postmaster, found employment for Jimmie Barnes on a farm owned by Mr. Blake, in the West River district. At this time Jimmie had no family, and he was intensely devoted to the interests of his employer, for whom he had great veneration. He considered the "Esqr." the man, and the only man, fit for office. When asked the question whom he should vote for, for representative, governor or president, the answer invariably was, "Squar Blake." Jimmie remained a single man until he met Sukie at the store of John Holbrook, in the building now known as the American House. This event must have been before 1810, for Mr. Holbrook ceased his mercantile operations in this place about that time.

However much "Barkis was willin'," there was a serious objection, in the shape of a husband, to be disposed of, before Sukie could be honored by the name of Barnes. In all the stores and hotels of that time, customers were furnished with a popular beverage called "flip." This was, we believe, a compound of some kind of ardent spirits, beer, water, nutmeg, sugar, and finished by inserting into the mug containing the composition, a red hot iron. As Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, the husband of Sukie, for a mug of flip, gave up his marital rights to Jimmie, and left him in undisturbed possession of "the charmer." The legality of this affair was never questioned before the courts, and for effectiveness, expedition and economy the transaction has never been surpassed, if equalled, in this town. Jimmie ever afterwards had a weakness for the beverage, and had as many blessings in store for the man who invented "flip," as Sancho had for the man who invented sleep.

A daughter, the eldest from this novel union, married one of the brave tars who served under Com. Decatur, in the war of 1812, and assisted in the capture of the British frigate "Macedonian." It was the custom of that time to use complimentary words in marriage notices, therefore appeared in the village paper, the following: "Mr. J. Freeman, to the amiable and accomplished daughter of James Barnes, Esq., of England."

Our earliest recollections of Jimmie date to the time he was bent with age and went about with a bag upon his back, to carry off—we were told—naughty, disobedient children, and especially those boys who neglected to attend school and religious exercises.

The frontispiece in the Westminster Catechism—a likeness of Satan—for Sunday, and Jimmie with his bag for the other six days of the week, rendered one motive of obedience sufficiently prominent for juvenile government in this place. But more dreadful than with a bag was Jimmie with a spade—that implement of his vocation in the village cemetery—when he covered from our sight forever, Andrew Jackson Shattuck, Willy Fessenden and other of our schoolmates, in the long time ago. The pent up grief, led slowly up cemetery hill by Dea. Wood, often found utterance, when fell upon the ear a hopeless, heart-rending rattle upon the coffin, of gravel from the glittering spade of Jimmie.

Though

"It was a childish ignorance,"

there was a pleasure in wishing anything but good for the old wretch who dug the first graves on that hill and made so many people cry.

The catechism can yet be seen, but the old "Scratch," decorated with serpents, who once stood at its threshold, long since vanished with Jimmie and his bag. By the death of Mr. Blake, in 1818, Jimmie lost his most highly valued patron. From that time, or a short time before the death of Mr. Blake, Jimmie took up his abode on the east side of the river. The small dilapidated cottage, where he lived with Sukie and an idiotic child named Olive, was, in 1825, standing near the base of Chesterfield mountain and about opposite the Congregational parsonage. He cultivated some over an acre of ground, about his cottage, but the principal source of his income was this place, where he passed most of his time in varied employments, such as working in gardens, doing chores, moving grain on his back up or down stairs for merchants, and telling big stories.

"The honey bees in England," he said, "are big as the sheep in this country, but the hives are about the same size as used here." "When at work with my axe on the mountain," said he, "I was attacked by a big snake that measured, after I had killed and straightened him out, just sixteen axe-helves long." It was as impossible to get an abatement of one axe-helve from the measure of that snake, as to get from farmer W. a reduction of one bug from the "eight bushels of squash bugs, potato measure," found by him, as he declared, when tearing away an old barn.

Jimmie claimed to be a native of old England, and he evidently felt superior to the natives here who were laborers like himself. In hair-breadth escapes and thrilling experiences he rivalled old Sinbad, of Eastern romance. There was an air of earnestness and seriousness in his manner, when relating the events of his life, that would doubtless have generated more faith in the minds of those who listened to his narratives if he had regarded the old admonition,

"Lest men suspect your tale untrue, Keep probabilities in view."

The history of his advent here will be best given, as well as we can remember, in his own words:

"When some weeks on the voyage from England to this country, our ship was leaking so badly we could not save her, and to save myself I got inside of a large hoghead. The cooper headed me in and the waves cast me ashore. The bung of the cask loosened by sunshine and I pushed out and grabbed the tail of an ox. The frightened animal dragged me over a ledge, the cask broke open and up jumped Jimmie."

His wife, Sukie, made mops, husk doormats, and told ladies' fortunes to order; but she was a poor financier. Her price for reading the book of fate was a small package of green tea. When the summer was in prime many small packages, wafted by white dresses and enclosed by jewelled fingers, passed over Chapin's island to the shrine of Sukie. To the Brattleboro fair of doubtful age, feeding on blue clay and the illusions of hope, there was an unaccountable charm in the ugly, pox-marked, tripe-like face of their oracle. Her eminence in ugliness constituted, perhaps, her popularity as an oracle. A company of quite plain looking girls never appeared so attractive as when standing beside old Sukie. We will allow them credit for sagacity transcending their aspirations of receiving light from Sukie's yellow teacup. The cunning creatures understood the value of comparison; willingly did they accompany eligible and desirable young beaus to this little cot on the mountain, who would "look on this picture and then on that."

In 1833 some people then living in this place caused the erection of a new building for Jimmie and Sukie. Col. Paul Chase, proprietor of the old stage house, and Mr. McKean, the first high school teacher, especially interested themselves in this matter, and Mr. McKean went over the river with his nail-hammer, to help shingle the house. A few years after this event the house was destroyed by fire, and from injuries thereby received, Olive, their idiotic child, died. At this time age and infirmity had nearly finished their work upon the aged couple; but Col. Chase did not desert them in this extremity. With his own carriage he brought them to this side of the river, where his personal superintendence was given to their wants, and every needful provision made for their comfort up to the last moment of their lives.

"BLACK SAM,"

So called, came here from Bennington about 1823, and was at one period the only representative of the colored race in this place. From that circumstance alone he was conspicuous. He was much of the time in the employ of Francis Goodhue, Esq., but when he was under the influence of stimulants his employment was less lucrative though more amusing. Upon such occasions his powers of imitation were largely developed. The sentiments and exact tones of the voice of his subject was given at the street corners, or wherever he could find an audience. He gave imitations of animals, but he especially delighted in showing off the magnates of Brattleboro; and his patron was not excepted in these laughable exhibitions of his peculiar faculty. Sam was bound to have some fun, and he generally succeeded in accomplishing his object. He did not bind his talent in a napkin, but did all he could to improve his own and other people's digestion.

Poor sensitive, suffering

JOHNSON, THE RHYMER,

Or hard, to whom we have elsewhere alluded more definitely, rarely smiled. Not a day passed when he did not have a grievance, some record of abuse or charge against some one, to send up to the high court of heaven. Homeless as he was, and wandering in abject poverty from house to house, and passing the long winter nights in a stable, caused some observers of his condition to advise him to apply to the town for relief. Upon one such occasion he replied, "Don't fret yourself about me. I lodge in a more comfortable place than General Washington did when he was surveying in the forest; and when he was fighting the battles of his country I guess he would have sometimes been glad to find as good a place as Mead's barn to sleep in. If my shoes do let in the water, there is as good a chance for it to run out as there is for it to get in, and there is as good a chance now for you to mind your own business as there ever will be."

"JOHN DOVER."

Who came here about 1840, was a serious oddity, and always in a hurry. His almost constant employment was sawing wood with a very short, quick movement of the saw, and his utterances perfectly accorded with said movement. His reply to any question was prefaced with the word God, repeated very rapidly many times. He knew Alfred Ellis was the most eminent fisherman in town, and it may be he intended to take away his well-earned laurels. This much is certain; John, in his latter days, spent much time fishing in divers places. One morning he caught, at the mouth of West river, an enormous pike. Passing through Main street with his valuable prize, much attention was excited, congratulations offered and inquiries made of the fortunate fisherman. With the usual preface John replied, "Can't tell, can't tell; if he hadn't thought 'twas Alf. Ellis' hook never should caught him in God's world."

John belonged to one of the two classes of men in Brattleboro who do not

"Keep their eyelids closed
And waste their hours in bed."

As a general rule, smart, thriving men are not of the 3 o'clock in the afternoon sort; they are early risers in the morning. Men of an exactly opposite character do the same, as some hotel bar-keepers could testify. Now it is not necessary to say John was of the class last mentioned; but we will give him the credit of being an early riser, and giving important testimony as to the merits of Mead's snow statue. Near the snow-lined pathway in which he was walking, with a wood saw, to his task, stood, in all its commanding, wondrous beauty, the "Recording Angel," fresh from the creator's hand. Fearfully he gazed upon the silent monitor and then, giving it as wide a berth as possible, ran with all his might until well out of supposed danger, when he exclaimed, "It's a devil or ghost, I don't know which!" After living in this town about twenty-eight years, poor John died in the arms of public charity at the town poor farm of Brattleboro.

EDWARD GOULD.

With slender, bent form and shuffling, dragging step—the motion of his body like that of a ship in a high sea, and apparently as insensible to surroundings,—this queer specimen of humanity was for many years almost daily seen in our streets, to as late a period as 1869. He was peaceable and inoffensive under great provocations; but when he heard from a crowd of school boys, "Ed Gould stole a knot hole, a post hole, and he stole squashes in the blow," his anger was aroused to a fearful pitch. He was often shamefully treated and made the subject of ridicule. The boys, delighted to find a vulnerable point in the armor of his good nature, teased and tormented poor Ed. until he often became completely exhausted in vain efforts to punish them for libel and clear up his character. It was not, we have charity to believe, intentional cruelty on the part of the boys, but it was their natural, almost insatiable love of fun that nearly wore out this poor, unfortunate being. The veteran frog, as stated in ancient fable, exactly explained the situation amidst a shower of stones. Deficient as he was in the qualities needful to command respect, he seldom, if ever, failed to give a correct answer when the question was, "What is the day of the month?" He also gave exercises in singing, spelling and preaching. If a chair, box or barrel was furnished him for a rostrum, he never declined when invited to address the few or many. These efforts, it has been said, "were enough to make a colt break his halter." They were often unintentional burlesques, more characterized by entertainment than by instruction, yet some gifted men of high intellectual attainments will ever lack the important qualifications—assurance, energy and earnestness—as displayed by Ed. Gould from the last head left in an empty flour barrel. "The Scolding Wife" was the song best adapted to his operatic abilities—his highest accomplishments in vocal music. In the chorus—

"It is her heart's delight
To bang me with a fire shovel Around the room at night!"— a very proper sympathy was excited for the unfortunate husband in this age of female domination. When the song of "Brave Wolfe" was called for, the whole air and manner of the singer changed. The smacking together of clenched hands, the fire and indignation, in singing the grievances of the unhappy subject of petticoat despotism ceased, and in soft, plaintive tones was heard:

"Love is a diamond ring, long time I've kept it,
'Tis for your sake, my love, if you'll accept it.
And then this gallant youth did cross the ocean,
To free America from her invasion.
The drums did loudly beat, the guns did rattle;
Brave Wolfe lay on his back, "How goes the battle?"
I went to see, my love, 'twas in my favor;
"Oh then," replied brave Wolfe, "I die with pleasure."

Then the cannon on our side did roar like thunder,
"And, have yer got eny terbacker with ye?"
"Be yer goin' to use that pipe for a few minutes?"

HIS LECTURE ON MILLERISM.—"Now my Christian Friends, Rumsellers, Terbacker-chewers and Sabbath-breakers, you don't believe the world will all burn up next year, because you don't want to believe it; and that ain't all, you don't want a stop put to your devilry. You are as bad as the folks was more than 40 years ago, when old Noah built his yark. When he told the folks the water was goin' to rise high as Chesterfield mountain and drown 'em all out, they didn't believe it, but they abused him, and made fun of him, and yer see how they got paid for it. Noah flew round like a house afire after stuff to build his yark. He went to Texas, Hinsdale and Chesterfield to buy lumber. He got some of his best sticks down to Jarro Burrows' mill, in Vernon; and farmer Wood with his stags did the teaming for ninepence a perch. He got all the nails at Hall's store and paid for 'em in sheep pelts and dried apples. He hadn't but just got his yark done when the rain come down like pitchforks. But folks wouldn't believe Noah when the water was knee deep in Main street. Noah see how 'twas, and he opened the door and told 'em they better git aboard while they could; but they said it wasn't much of a shower, and soon over; then they began to yell and hoot, and the tarnal school boys snow-balled him so he had to go in and shut the door. But you know it wasn't long afore they wished he would open that door agin and take 'em aboard. This time the fishes will all be killed, and a yark such as Noah had wouldn't do yer any good. Nothin' will save ye now but to believe what I tell you, and being so good, the fire won't burn ye more'n t'will Hinsdale red oak. We must all stop being sinners. I have been a sinner myself. I stole rum from Hartwell Bills and denied it when they laid it to me. I went to court the Pierce girl and pretended all I wanted was a drink of water. I was a lying scamp and I've been sorry for it a good many times, and I shan't do so again next time I see her."

Ed. obtained some of the ideas from which this lecture was constructed by attending Millerite meetings at the Chapel on Canal street, in 1842. One of the preachers at the series of meetings held there at that time usually, when commencing his services, took off his coat and cravat. While disrobing himself to his shirtsleeves, he said to the audience, "Thank God, I know what it is to work for my living. I have laid many rods of stone wall in my day, but I have done with all such work forever. I have but one task before me, and that is of short duration. I shall never again visit my earthly home, for before I finish the work assigned me, before I can complete the circle marked out for me, the last great day will surely come and all the things in this world will burn up or melt with fervent heat. This mountain of rocks, now clad in the varied colors of autumnal beauty, will, before another autumn, melt down into the river and kill all the fish. Please to sing,

"You can't stand the fire
In that great day."

In an atmosphere charged with fumes of burning sulphur, a large share of the audience, judging from the sound, kept time with the singing by stamping their feet. Chipman Swain, Esq., our deputy sheriff, appeared in the sacred desk, on the left side of the preacher, and requested there be no more manifestations of disrespect for the services. He reminded all present of Vermont law, its impartiality in protecting all religious sects, and the penalties for persons who in any manner disturb assemblies gathered for religious worship. The tall, commanding form, authority, and very proper remarks of this executive officer prevented, it may be, the riotous opposition or persecution needful for the prosperity of this sect in Brattleboro. The awfully solemn words of the stone wall preacher fell mostly upon stony ground, and since this event more than thirty times has old Chesterfield mountain put on her annual gala dress, as in days of yore, while upon Ed. devolved the task to keep green the memories of the prophets by his oratorical efforts in the public streets.

At the conclusion of a lecture on phrenology, Ed. and "Jess Marsh" were persuaded to become subjects for examination by the lecturer before the audience. The next morning Ed. said, "They wouldn't let the phrenologer man tech us 'till they put a hankercher on my face and a hankercher on Jess' face. The phrenologer said we was both fools, but Jess was the biggest fool, 'cause he didn't know it, and I did."

One evening in a crowded meeting house, not very well lighted, Ed. was seated listening to a revival sermon from an itinerant minister. Immediately after the sermon, an invitation was given to all unconverted persons desiring prayers to occupy the "anxious seat." The reverend gentleman, depending upon his sagacity to detect mental emotion from appearances, left the pulpit, and by making personal applications, as he moved among the people, some persons went forward who otherwise would not, probably, have presented themselves. The serious, humble appearing Ed., as he sat with downcast eyes, attracted the attention of the vigilant shepherd. "My friend," said the preacher, as he grasped Ed. by the hand, "Is Christ precious to your soul?" The great, prominent blue eyes of Ed. opened wide with a vacant stare as he replied, "Wal, I dun know; guess it's pretty good plan." The faithful watchman said no more,

"But with a sigh moved slow along."

HOTELS.

THE OLD BRATTLEBORO HOUSE,

Known in the past generation at one period as "Smith's" and at another time as "Chase's Stage House," was built by Samuel Dickinson, in 1795, and was destroyed by fire in October, 1869. Dickinson married Hannah Whitney, a sister of Hon. Lemuel Whitney. After he left the hotel he built the house on Flat street afterwards owned by James Frost, where he died May 15, 1817. In Prospect Hill Cemetery we have found his monument, with the following inscription:

"Beneath the sacred honors of the tomb,
In awful silence and majestic gloom,
The man of mercy here conceals his head,
Amidst the solemn mansions of the dead.
No more his lib'ral hand shall help the poor, Relieve distress, and scatter joy no more."

From 1795 to 1869 the hotel has been conducted by Sam'l Dickinson, Salem Sumner, Erastus Dickinson, John R. Blake, Maj. Henry Smith, Col. Paul Chase, Lem'l Whitney, William C. Perry, Charles C. Lawrence, and at some period by a gentleman from Troy, N. Y., whose name we are not able to give. The property was owned at one period by Francis Goodhue, who erected the front gable and made some other alterations; but at the time of its destruction it was the property of the Blake Brothers, of Boston, Mass., who sold the land on which the buildings stood to E. Crosby, or Crosby & Rice, and the well-known "Crosby Block" now occupies the site of the old Brattleboro House, which was built 85 years ago. Built so long ago, and in almost constant use for the public accommodation seventy-four years, this hotel was more extensively known and better remembered abroad than any other building of its time in this place. Standing through all the wars excepting that of the Revolution, what a story of the long vanished years must be associated with it! If it had a voice or record to tell us of the now buried generations and interesting events of its time, we should have a more complete history of this town than any person now living can furnish. We can sift over some ashes of its past, find here and there a gem or historical fact; but of the many sad and glad memories associated with it, we can know but little.

Of those known to fame who in early life began their career by rendering services as bar-tender, office clerk, or occupying some subordinate position here, were: E. Fessenden, William Chamberlin and Simeon Leland. Fessenden is a native of this town, but for many years has been a noted citizen of Hartford, Ct., where he has successfully filled important offices in that city, and among them, president of the Phoenix Life Insurance Company. Chamberlin was an eminent wholesale merchant in New York, and began business in that city by retailing goods from a wheelbarrow, on a capital of but $100, and that was lent to him by Maj. Henry Smith, who was at the time keeping the old stage-house here. The fame of Leland, as a man of enterprise and success, reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Judging from the palatial hotels he has reared as if by magic, he must have found, in some dark corner of this old house, or elsewhere, the wonderful lamp of Aladdin.

About the time of the last war with Britain it was the custom to roll into that big bar-room a hogshead of old West India rum, and supply customers from the faucet. Years ago we heard Erastus Dickinson (nephew of Samuel Dickinson) say, "I paid over $300 for a hogshead of old rum, and after it was on draft in the bar-room it was, by good judges, declared a superior article. It immediately acquired so excellent a reputation it would not stay with me, and in a little over one week it all left me." Probably more than a dozen such houses could be built by the money here expended in hogsheads of rum, fourth of July dinners, training day and other gala day feasts, diffusing a sweetness on the air a la the

"Wonderful savor of pastry and pies
That night from St. Gore's butteries."

The only hall in the village for public gatherings was in this house. It was dedicated in 1816, by feasting and dancing. Cap't Sam'l Betterly of Newfane—just married—was there with his bride, and others from out of town participated in the festivities on this occasion. Joseph Steen, Esq., our eldest native citizen (1880), and Judge Whitney joined in the dance, and Mr. Steen, by his activity upon the floor, completely wore out his new pumps bought for this eventful night. "While joy was unconfined, and youth and pleasure met," intelligence circulated in the gay company that Mrs. Barber—a general favorite and highly respected—had just breathed her last. The sad feeling in the company from this event, and respect for the deceased, suggested a discontinuance of the exercises, but Judge Whitney said, "Let the dead bury the dead. On with the dance!"

Many years ago a theatrical company from the city made the whole village and vicinity completely wild with their excellent acting in this hall. The plays continued so many days or weeks it was thought by some to be a permanent institution, as in Boston or New York. The fate of the beautiful Desdemona excited general sympathy and brought copious tears from—then in life's morning—our prospective grandmothers. The play of "George Barnwell, the London apprentice," was, for moral effect, equal to a camp-meeting sermon. Upon the handbill announcing the play, or tragedy, was the following caption:

"How wretched is the man who's wise too late!
By my example learn to shun my fate," etc.

Underneath the foregoing was an engraving representing poor Barnwell hanging by the neck upon a gallows, as an example of being "wise too late." Wisdom, as personified in Scripture, said, "seek me early and ye shall find me," but for late seekers for wisdom no encouragement is given. When wisdom comes too late we do just as well without it, as exemplified in the fate of Barnwell. That sermon, though from a theatrical company, at the old stage house in the long ago, has never yet, we believe, been surpassed in any pulpit in this town.

With the exception of D. P. Kingsley of Springfield, Mass., we believe the old stage proprietors who once made this house their home, are none of them living. Many now living here remember Asher Spencer, Lovell Farr and Kingsley, formerly a partner of Mr. Spencer. Shepherd Pond, the last of the old stage drivers we remember, is yet living (1880), we learn, in Bennington, Vt.

Col. Paul Chase served several years as high sheriff of the county, and Maj. Henry Smith was chosen his successor to that office. They were agents of the old lottery organization, chartered for the benefit of Horatio Knight, about 1826. Messrs. Chase and Smith occupied conspicuous positions in society, and their families, as to intelligence, influence and respectability, were in the front rank.

THE VERMONT HOUSE,

Which from 1828 to 1857 stood where is now the Town Hall and the Episcopal Church, was a common wooden dwelling house of two stories, until fitted up for a hotel by Willard Pomroy, in 1828. His brother, Chester W. Pomroy, was the first proprietor. He was succeeded by Hiram and Alonzo Joy, and others, whose names do not occur to us; but Capt. T. C. Lord was the last owner and proprietor. He took away the old wooden house, and in 1849-50 erected, in place of it, a handsome brick front of three stories. It was destroyed by fire in February, 1851, and never rebuilt. At the same time "Wanstasket Hall," built in the rear of this hotel, by Hon. Calvin Townsley, was destroyed. The hotel was owned by Col. Calvin Townsley, and sold by him to Capt. Lord after 1840. Capt. Lord died but a short time—a few weeks—before the fire. He was a popular hotel keeper and captain of the "Lafayette Light Infantry." A military company from the city of Lowell, Mass., was induced by Capt. Lord to visit Brattleboro, in 1847-8. They had glorious weather and a fine time. Accompanied by Capt. Lord's infantry, they ascended the mountain east of the village. The hydro-pathic institution of Dr. Wesselhoeft was then in its palmy days, and the patients had built a house of logs upon the highest point of the mountain, three stories in height. There were projections from each story wide enough to stand upon, and a flat roof. The soldiers and brass bands of music completely filled the projections of the house and occupied the flat roof. They played several marches we could hear from the village distinctly, and we could also plainly see the bright glare of the brass instruments reflected by the sun. The effect was beautiful and decidedly pleasing. The house, soon after this rare event, was burned down by one of the annual fires on the mountain. Capt. Lord at this time could not accommodate one-half of his applicants for hotel fare, and many private houses were opened for visitors from abroad.

Between 1846 and 1860—a period of fourteen or fifteen years—celebrities of both sexes were frequently seen riding or walking in our streets. Of such, whose names occur to us, were Henry W. Longfellow, Count La Porte, professor in Harvard, but in 1830 Minister of Finance under Charles X. of France, Rev. William H. Channing, Col. T. W. Higginson, James Parton and wife, (Fanny Fern,) Miss Catherine Beecher, Dr. Kane, of Arctic fame, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Prof. Calvin Stowe, and Count Gowraski. Of those from abroad who built or bought houses in this place and vicinity, for homes during the warm season, were John Stoddard of Savannah, Ga., Buckner and Eustace of New Orleans, La., the last named United States Senator from Louisiana, Hon. George Folsom of New York, United States Minister to foreign parts, N. F. Cabot, Esq., from Alabama, Prof. Elie Charlier of New York, and at a later period, Joseph N. Balestier, Esq., and Dorman B. Eaton, Esq., both of the legal profession in New York City. Each of the gentlemen last named have given public addresses in this place upon matters of national importance; and Prof. E. Charlier of New York, on the Fourth of July, 1876, made some remarks with happy effect. To the people assembled on our park, or village common, he said: "Though a native of France, I claim a kindred with you, for my wife and children were born under your flag. And I claim a share in your Washington, for the royal army of my native land could not be permitted to draw their swords on your soil against the enemies of American liberty until your Washington was created, by a commission from the King, a Marshal of France." A reply the Professor once made, as we learn, to the remarks of an insufferable egotist, is so good a plaster for the bump of self-esteem, that present and future generations ought to have it. The reply we give below: "If what you say is true, no other man in this world can perform the duty I require performed, or fill your place. I see upon you, as well as upon myself, indications of age, and people will soon be obliged to get along without us, therefore they might just as well begin now to learn to do without us as to wait a little longer."

THE HAYES HOTEL,

Built by the grandfather of President Hayes, is yet standing at the West Village, but it has long since ceased to be used for its original purpose. The President's uncle occupied it for many years as a private residence, and it is now in possession of his daughter, Mary Ann, who is the present wife (1880) of Mr. W. H. Bigelow, formerly of Chicago, Ill. In 1815 the old Brattleboro Light Infantry dined at the Hayes Hotel, the day the mail coach—decked with flags—brought here the tidings of peace, after the war of 1812, and Mr. Anthony Van Doorn.* We know of but one member of the infantry company of that day now (1880) living, Joseph Steen, Esq., and he says the father of President Hayes assisted in waiting upon the table that day. We improve this occasion to say that one of our early Representatives, Israel Smith, was brother to Chloe Smith, the grandmother of the President, Rutherford B. Hayes.

THE AMERICAN HOUSE.

The hotel now known by the above name was not used for that purpose until after 1811. John Holbrook occupied it for mercantile uses up to that period, when he left this place and settled in Ware House Point, Ct. After its vacation by Mr. Holbrook, it was owned by one of the Hunt family, of Vernon, and Joseph Goodhue, first hotel keeper. It was next owned by Francis Goodhue, who, sometime between 1833 and 1837, built the front gable and piazza. The house then received its present name, but for some fifteen years or more it was known as "Sikes' Hotel," and there was a sign with the name as stated thereon. Mr. Uriel Sikes and Richard Philips came from Northampton, Mass., about 1811, and established a hat manufactory in this village, under the firm of Philips & Sikes. Sikes afterwards began hotel keeping in this house, about 1820, and left it about 1835 to his successor, Ralph Herrick. During the time Mr. Sikes was in this hotel he was a noted performer upon the bass viol. He was the leader of a band of stringed instruments, that officiated at a Fourth of July celebration in 1824. On the morning of that day

*Mr. Anthony Van Doorn was the son of a West India sugar planter, and was a man of excellent business capacity. He was well informed, as he had studied for one of the professions, but did not complete his studies. He built up—for that time—a large furniture business, at the West Village; and about 1829-30 moved his business to the East Village, where he died in 1871. He built the large brick house on Main street, now occupied by his son, Moses T. After he retired from business he visited Europe. He left a widow and four children. His oldest son, Moses T., is now a prominent merchant on Main street, and his second daughter is the wife of Mr. John Brown.

the bass viol and violin players had a rehearsal in the south front room of this hotel, and thereafter played a march at the head of a long procession, escorting the orator of the day to the only meeting house then in the village. The house remained in possession of Joseph and Wells Goodhue until sold to Charles F. Simonds, in 1860; and in 1863 it was conveyed to Stearns & Ray. In 1865 it was bought by the present (1880) owners, Ray & Boyden.

From the beginning to the present time the proprietors have been: Joseph Goodhue, Uriel Sikes, Ralph Herrick, Mr. Burnett, Edward Woodman, George Bugbee, Charles G. Lawrence, Mr. Rice, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Day, Henry C. Day, R. Rawson, Chas. F. Simonds, Mr. Starkey, J. S. Gates, C. Stearns, George A. Boyden, Henry Starkey, F. E. Reed. Hon. Daniel Webster took dinner at this house in July, 1840, when Edward Woodman was proprietor of it. Messrs. L. G. Mead, John R. Blake, and others,—a committee of reception—directed the footsteps of Mr. Webster to this hotel. "Mine host" of the "Stage House," Col. Paul Chase, was at that time a prominent pillar of the democracy here; otherwise the great statesman would, probably, have been directed to "Chase's Stage House."

RUFUS CLARK'S HOTEL.

The house south of Whetstone Brook, bought by Capt. Adolphus Stebbins in 1832 and now (1880) owned and occupied by his son, John Stebbins, was a hotel, and Rufus Clark the proprietor, in 1815. Mr. Stebbins removed the upper story of the rear part, where was a hall for dancing, etc. There was at this time (1815) no road past the house, leading to Guilford, and, of course, no Canal street. All travel from this village to Guilford was up Cemetery Hill and then take the right, past the farm of W. F. Richardson.

The house was built in 1812, by Joseph Clark, father of Rufus Clark. The master workman was James Steen, father of Joseph Steen. Mr. Clark also first established here the cloth-dressing and wool-carding business. The shop and machinery was where is now the machine shop, first built by Thomas & Woodcock for the manufacture of paper machinery, and afterwards a new brick shop, for the same purpose, was erected on the same ground by Hines, Newman & Co., and is now standing. Joseph Clark was one of the earliest settlers, and owned all the land south of Whetstone Brook to the Guilford line.

THE REVERE HOUSE

Was built by James Fisk, in 1849, and was burned in 1877. Mr. Fisk was the first keeper, or proprietor, and thereafter it was kept by Henry Field, J. J. Crandall, Vanbibber, Asa Sanderson, George R. Cushing, Knowlton Brothers, Mr. Stevens, L. V. H. Crosby, Henry C. Nash, George A. Boyden, and some others, but Nash was owner and Henry Harris proprietor at the time of its destruction. Fisk sold the house and stables to Mr. Vanbibber, and after the death of Mr. Vanbibber, Henry Nash became the owner. In 1850, when under the management of J. Fisk, it was opened as a temperance house, and a grand entertainment given on this occasion. Sentiments were offered and congratulatory speeches made at the table of refreshments, by pastors of churches and other citizens of this place. We believe it did not long continue to be a temperance house.

After its destruction a portion of the land in front was purchased by the town, to widen the highway, and A. V. Cox & Co., and Starr & Estey bought the remainder. The gentlemen last named have erected (1879) a beautiful brick block with marble trimmings—Philadelphia style—containing Howe's photograph rooms, Mrs. T. Avery's millinery store, office of Davenport & Eddy and the People's National Bank, of which Hon. Parley Starr is president. The land west of this block has been sold by Messrs. Starr & Estey to D. Leonard and the Methodist Society. That society is now (1880) constructing a house for public worship. It is the intention of Mr. Leonard, we learn, to build a block, at no distant day, upon the remainder of the Revere House ground, to contain his power presses and other fixtures for the publishing business.

BRATTLEBORO HOUSE,

Named after its old predecessor of "happy memorie," is upon the south side of Whetstone Brook, near the bridge. It was at first an organ manufactory, built by Messrs. Jacob Estey & Co. Isaac Sargent fitted it up with all the modern improvements for a first-class hotel the next year (1870) after the old "Brattleboro House" turned to ashes. His means being exhausted by the great expenditures, the property returned to J. Estey & Co. The hotel is now (1880) conducted by Messrs. Dunton & Campbell. The house is well kept and has pleasant rooms. The view of the Connecticut from its upper rooms is very fine.

BROOKS HOUSE

Was erected by George Jones Brooks in 1871-2. The plan was by E. Boyden of Worcester, Mass., and the construction by J. M. Buzzell. The cost was between one and two hundred thousand dollars. The size, quality, and general arrangement of it has led some people to believe the public wants have been anticipated for some years to come. Within the memory of some people now living here, not so large, convenient and elegant a hotel could be found in our largest cities. All the rooms are in telegraphic communication with the office, are heated by steam radiators, and are mostly arranged in suites, parlor and bedroom adjoining. It is provided with all the modern improvements, and no expense has been spared in the arrangements to meet the demands of the age. It stands upon the west side of Main street, and but a few rods from the steep declivity of the river bank, upon which is Main street, about 100 feet above the Connecticut,—thereby affording the very best facility for drainage. Since the construction of "Crosby Block" and the "Brooks House," our natural advantages for good drainage have been improved by all the hotels, most of the dwellings on Main street, also on High and some other streets.

Mr. George J. Brooks, to whom we are indebted for this generous expenditure for the convenience and honor of Brattleboro, is a son of the late Capt. William Smith Brooks, who, with his family, settled in this town in 1839. He was born in Medford, Mass., March 5, 1781, and in early life was engaged in commerce. He was the commander of a merchant vessel, and suffered loss and imprisonment by the French depredations,* or "spoliations," as it was called, of American commerce, when Napoleon I. was shaking down the thrones of Europe. Capt. Brooks, after his capture, was detained several months a prisoner in France, and saw Napoleon when at the pinnacle of his prosperity. This insult to the old stars and stripes was not forgotten by Andrew Jackson. Many will remember that halcyon period of the democracy, when, by the action of its great executive, it bravely defended the unity of these States and

*He was also taken prisoner by an English press gang. It was such outrages upon our commerce that brought on our last war with that nation, 1812.

"My father's flag and mine."

The dilatory action of the French government in regard to making compensation for these spoiliations, revived within the old hero the memories of other days. The flag which waved in triumph over his cotton bags, and the dead Pakenham with four thousand slain, must be respected at home and abroad. Therefore came forth his message to Congress, recommending reprisals upon French commerce, unless immediate attention was paid to our demands.

In 1821, Capt. Brooks settled in Chesterfield, N. H., where he established a cotton factory at the outlet of Lake Spafford, causing a village to spring up about him, which is now known as "Chesterfield Factory." He continued his business at the factory several years after his removal to this place, his last home, where he died in 1865. His wife died in 1841, and of the family six children are now (1880) living, and, with the exception of Capt. William, Jr., make this place their home. George J. and Francis W. were located several years in California, where they were successful wholesale dealers in paper. Capt. William was a clerk in the store of the late Gardner C. Hall in 1829-30, when he was elected captain of the Brattleboro Light Infantry. From him, when in England, came the art of making seamless brass and copper tubing, and patents therefor have been sold to the amount of $500,000. The wide acquaintance of the most of this family with the world—having lived in varied climes and visited the most famed resorts in this and other countries—had ample means, opportunities, experiences and discrimination for selecting the most favorable locations for health, convenience or pleasure, has not prevented them from choosing their location here. And one of them, in giving such a monumental evidence of his approval of this location, has spoken plainer than words in favor of Brattleboro.

In the summer of 1877 the President of the United States—R. B. Hayes—with his wife, visited Brattleboro, the home of his fathers, and was met by our citizens in the spacious rooms of the Brooks House. He addressed the people from the balcony in front, and on the morning of his departure, said his grandfather was a blacksmith in this town (See sketch of the Hayes family, page 67) about 100 years ago. This, we learn, is the first time a President of this nation has visited this town, and it was a matter of congratulation and satisfaction that there was so good a house for his reception.

GLEN HOUSE—WEST VILLAGE,

Known over fifty years ago as Stewart's Hotel, and a favorite resort of the military of that day, is the second hotel built by Rutherford Hayes. Since Russell Hayes succeeded his father as proprietor of this hotel, the persons whose names we give below have conducted it down to the present time: Amasa Bixby, Henry Barrett, Timothy Root, Phineas Stewart, R. Goodenough, George Emerson, Mark Worcester, George A. Boyden, Henry Nash, C. O. Miller, L. D. Thayer, Mr. Alden, William Warren, T. Clapp, Albert Smith, John L. Sargent, present owner, and Seth Jones, present proprietor (1880.)

VERMONT HOUSE.

There is another hotel a few rods north of the Glen House, known as Vermont House. This hotel was first set in operation by Mr. Nathaniel Holland, some twenty years ago, and is now owned by Charles Mixer. It is the last public house in this town before coming to the Marlboro line.

CHURCHES.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH.—EPISCOPAL.

In 1871 the Rectory, situated on Green street, was sold, and a lot purchased on Tyler street, upon which, during the same year, a new rectory was built, costing about $6,000. F. A. Nash and Dr. W. H. Rockwell were appointed as the building committee. The largest contributor to the building fund was Mrs. Judge Kellogg.

Mr. George W. Folsom and his sister, Miss Helen L. Folsom, also gave liberally, and the different parishioners contributed according to their several ability. In 1874, the Rev. Mr. Harris resigned, and was succeeded by the Rev. Wm. H. Collins, of Vergennes, Vt., who is now the rector of the parish. Through the efforts of the ladies of the parish, the debt remaining upon the rectory has been nearly all paid.

In April, 1879, F. E. Draper, Esq., of New York City, placed in the church the following substantial and elegant memorials of his wife, Mary Goodhue (Cune) Draper: An eagle lecturn of polished brass, a chancel rail and corona of the same material. The latter is a very fine piece of workmanship, being made in the form of a double crown. Upon the largest is this inscription in raised letters—"I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living." The inscription on the upper crown contains the names of Mrs. Mary G. C. Draper and her sister, Julia (Cune) Bartlett. There are about 40 gas jets in the crown, and the effect when lighted is very beautiful. In addition to these gifts, Wilton carpets have been laid in the chancel, greatly improving its appearance. These were also from the same person who gave the memorials we have described.

REV. WM. H. COLLINS.

UNIVERSALISM IN BRATTLEBORO.

West Village.

Hosea Ballou preached his second sermon in this place in 1791. He was then in his twenty-first year. He says, "The second time I attempted to preach was in the town of Brattleboro, Vt., where my brother preached in the daytime and I undertook to speak in the evening, being overpersuaded to do so; but this attempt was a failure, and I was greatly mortified and thought for a time that I would not engage in a work for which I was not competent." The brother referred to above was David Ballou, considerably older than Hosea, and the father of Rev. Moses Ballou of Philadelphia. Among the auditors of Father Ballou on the occasion mentioned above were, probably, Col. Daniel Stewart, Levi Goodenough and Reuben Stearns, at least these men were pronounced Universalists at that time. Col. Stewart was "always" a Universalist. If so, the doctrine of the final restitution of all things was believed here as early as 1780.

Hosea Ballou, 2d, preached some of his first sermons in Brattleboro. It is believed that he preached at the residence of Levi Goodenough in his eighteenth year—1814. He certainly preached there not later than 1816-17. Between this date and 1829, there was occasional Universalist preaching in school houses or private residences by Revs. John Brooks, Thomas J. Sawyer, Wm. A. Balch, Russell Streeter and Isaiah Boynton. In December, 1829, Rev. Matthew Hale Smith, then only a boy of 18, was settled over a society in the West Village. He preached half the time there and the other half in Guilford. Meetings were then held in the Town Hall. Mr. Smith continued his pastorate in Brattleboro till 1832, a successful one so far as indicated by outward results. He was popular and his audiences were always large.

He was succeeded by Rev. Aurin Bugbee, during whose ministry occurred one of those episodes the like of which could hardly take place in this generation whose sectarian spirit is certainly less fierce than that of the last generation. The old church in West Brattleboro was owned in considerable part by Universalists. They asked for the privilege of using it occasionally a Sunday, but their request was absolutely refused. Thereupon they went to church early Sunday morning, November 24, 1833, forced open the door and took possession of the house. Meantime, two clergymen, Revs. F. Loring of Hinsdale, N. H., and Warren Skinner of Proctorsville, had been engaged to conduct the religious services during the day. Mr. Loring began his service at 9 A. M. and continued it till 10:30 A. M., when Mr. Skinner took the pulpit for another service. At this time the other party with their members, one of them the principal of the Academy, came in a body to the church, entered the vestibule and demanded admittance to the auditorium, the doors of which were all closed, long seats filled with men being placed against them. They requested the Universalists in the vestibule to call out their committee for consultation; but they answered that they should not interrupt the services, which had then begun. Next the Congregationalists proposed to overpower the Universalists in the entry, rush into the church and expel Mr. Skinner by force from the pulpit—and take possession themselves. But Judge Clark advised them that by this course they would all render themselves liable to indictment and heavy fines as disturbers of a religious meeting. The Academy bell was then rung and they departed in a body to that place and held their meeting, leaving the Universalists in undisputed possession of the church for the rest of the day. However, at the close of Mr. Skinner's service, at twelve o'clock, Mr. Loring began his second service for the day, and at its conclusion, at half-past one o'clock, Mr. Skinner took the desk and occupied it till three o'clock. As a result of this contest, after some months the Universalists sold their interest in the church to the other owners and in 1834 built the Brick Church now standing in the West Village. Meantime their meetings were held in Stewart Hall.

The Brick Church was dedicated the 1st of January, 1835. The order of services on that occasion was as follows: Reading of Scriptures, Rev. Mr. Wheeler; Introductory Prayer, Rev. F. Loring; Sermon, Rev. I. D. Williamson; Dedicatory Prayer, Rev. T. J. Whitcomb; Concluding Prayer, Rev. Aurin Bugbee. Immediately after the dedication of the church, Rev. Charles Woodhouse assumed the pastorate of the society and continued it two or three years. He was succeeded, about 1838, by Rev. Abraham Page, whose ministry extended only through one year. Rev. J. W. Bailey preached here from 1841 to 1843. An incident occurred during this period which made a deep impression upon his audience. One Sunday while he was preaching, a pure white dove came into the church, through an open window, perched upon the stove-pipe, where it remained a moment, and then flew directly over the minister's head, poising there awhile, and then passed out of the window through which it entered. The speaker was moved by this incident, so much resembling the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus, and drew from it encouragement and approval of his words and work.

Rev. W. S. Ballou was pastor of the society in 1844-5. He was succeeded in 1847 by Rev. Jno. S. Lee. The Melrose Seminary, at the head of which was Mr. Lee, was established at West Brattleboro at this time. At this institution, besides many others, several of our clergymen received their academical education, among them, Revs. Sumner Ellis, R. A. Ballou, S. H. McColester, Judson Fisher and Simon Goodenough. Mr. Lee left the parish and the school in 1849. The school did not continue long after he removed from this place.

Mr. Lee was followed in the parish by Rev. W. S. Ballou, whose second pastorate extended through two years. Rev. Edwin Davis preached part of the time during 1851-2. Rev. W. Wilcox part of the time during 1853-4. The society's last settled pastor was Rev. Maxey B. Newell, who supplied them half the time in 1858-9. There has been no stated and regular Universalist preaching in the West Village since that date.

The society was organized January 10, 1834. Among the first signers of the constitution were Phineas Stewart, Samuel Earle, Jr., Jeremiah Beals, Emory Stearns, John Cutting, Robert Windsor Frazier, Roswell and Alonzo Goodenough, John Mixer and Rufus Pratt.

East Village.

Universalist meetings were held in Wheeler's Hall as early as 1835. Rev. Chas. Woodhouse the preacher; but it was not till May 24, 1843, that the present society was organized. Among the original members were Dr. Reuben Spaulding, A. J. Hines, J. H. Esterbrook, W. H. Esterbrook, Alford Simonds, O. J. Martin, Orin Starkey, Luther Weld, Harvey Houghton, Jno. B. Miller and Sewall Morse. The first meeting house owned by the society was located on the corner of Canal and Clark streets, and was purchased by the Millerites in May, 1843. It was built and occupied for many years by the Methodists. The first settled pastor of the society was Rev. L. J. Fletcher, who began his ministry in the early part of 1844. He was succeeded in July, 1846, by Rev. Jno. H. Willis, who remained here only one year. Rev. C. R. Moor assumed the pastorate of the society early in 1848 and closed his connection with it in February, 1852. The present Universalist church was built during his settlement here. It was erected in 1850 and dedicated in February, 1851.

Rev. H. P. Cutting was settled over the society in May, 1852, and remained one year. He was followed, June, 1853, by Rev. Geo. H. Deere, whose pastorate extended through seven years. During his ministry the church was repainted, in 1857, and through his exertions $500 were raised in 1858, for Tufts College. Rev. E. Smiley began his labors with the society the first of January, 1861, and closed them with the same year. He was succeeded early in 1862 by Rev. W. T. Stowe, whose pastorate extended to July, 1864. Rev. M. R. Leonard supplied the desk through the winter of 1864-5.

REV. JAMES EASTWOOD.

Rev. James Eastwood was called to the pastorate of this parish Sept. 15th, 1865, and resigned Jan. 3rd, 1870. Rev. M. H. Harris was settled July 1st, 1870. During the nine years of Mr. Harris' pastorate this parish has grown to be among the largest and strongest in the village, and the largest Universalist parish in the State, having at the present time two hundred and fifteen families connected with it. In 1871 the church edifice was enlarged and remodeled. Since October, 1870, more than two hundred members have united with this church by baptism; and $30,000 have been paid out for parish expenses and missions. The church organization was reorganized Sept. 14, 1843. Rev. Warren Skinner preached the sermon on this occasion, and baptized fourteen persons and gave them the right hand of fellowship.

BRATTLEBORO NEWSPAPERS.

Brattleboro's first newspaper was the FEDERAL GALAXY, which was started by Benjamin Smead, in 1797. The Galaxy was printed on a four-page sheet measuring about 17 by 21 inches, four columns to a page, in type of similar size to that used in this work, but of the "old style," and was sold to subscribers for $1.34 per year, payable on the last day of every quarter. An idea of what was considered news in those early days may be gained from the contents of No. 71, Vol. 2, dated May 8, 1798, a copy of which is now in possession of the writer. The entire first and second pages, and nearly one column of the third page, are taken up with a copy of the "Instructions to Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall and Elbridge Gerry, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the French republic," signed by Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State, and bearing date July 15, 1797—nearly ten months previously! Following this article, under the general head of "Domestic Events," is given about a column and a half of news from South Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, New York and Massachusetts. Then follows a half-column of editorial matter, the leading article treating upon the then all absorbing topic of our relations with France. Something more than a column of this page is occupied with advertisements. Two and a half columns of the fourth page are devoted to a report of the proceedings of the American Congress, House of Representatives, extending from Wednesday, March 28, to Tuesday, April 3. The remainder of the page is taken up with advertisements, among which are three applications for divorce. There is not a local or State paragraph in the entire paper. The Galaxy was continued until about 1802, when Mr. Smead removed to Dansville, N. Y.

Not long after the death of the Galaxy, (in 1803) THE REPORTER was started, by William Fessenden. Mr. Fessenden was the son of Rev. Thomas Fessenden of Walpole, N. H., and learned his trade at that place. As related by Mr. Joseph Steen (who served as apprentice in the Reporter office, beginning June, 1814), Mr. Fessenden had arrived in Brattleboro on his way to New York to procure employment as a journeyman printer, and the fact becoming known to the landlord, Mr. Samuel Dickinson, John W. Blake, Esq., and other leading men of the place, who greatly desired to have a Federal paper published here, Mr. Fessenden was induced to remain and embark in the undertaking. He obtained a press and other necessary materials in Boston, at second hand, established the Reporter, and remained proprietor of it until his death, in 1815. Becoming largely interested in the publication of books, the editorial charge of the paper, after the first few years, was largely left to other hands, being for some time in care of his brother, Thomas Green Fessenden, who was a lawyer by profession and a writer of note, and who afterwards went to Boston and established the New England Farmer.

Another newspaper, called "THE INDEPENDENT FREEHOLDER AND REPUBLICAN JOURNAL," was started about 1808, by a printer named Peter Houghton, who was backed up in the enterprise by Judge Chapin, father of the late Dr. Charles Chapin, but it was continued only a short time.

The Reporter, soon after the death of Mr. Fessenden, passed into the hands of his father-in-law, Deacon John Holbrook, by whom it was continued until merged in the Messenger, about 1826.

The year 1817 saw the advent of the AMERICAN YEOMAN. The publisher, Mr. Simeon Ide, had worked as pressman on Webster's spelling book the greater part of the year 1813, for William Fessenden. In 1816 he had printed "the first New Ipswich (N. H.) edition" of the New Testament, in his father's blacksmith shop in that town; but the work proved unremunerative, and after having disposed of most of the edition to pay his debts, he found himself possessed of a good Ramage press, a font or two of type, and a few other necessary utensils of the trade, and he resolved upon publishing a newspaper. Failing to find the necessary encouragement at Keene, he next turned to Brattleboro, and issued the first number of the Yeoman, February 5, 1817. The first number contained a spicy article from the pen of Hon. John Phelps of Guilford, laying down before the inexperienced young editor certain rules to be observed in his editorial career, by following which (in the ironical sense of the entire article), he says, "I am certain your paper will want nothing—but subscribers." Mr. Phelps, Hon. James Elliot, Hon. Royall Tyler, Dr. Allen, Dr. J. P. Warren (then a student with Dr. Allen), and other men of some note, were occasional contributors to the columns of the Yeoman. A circulation of 300 copies was insufficient, however, to satisfy Mr. Ide's ambition, and at the end of one year he removed to Windsor, Vt., and united his paper with the Vermont Republican, in the office of which he had commenced his apprenticeship in the fall of 1809. At this writing Mr. Ide is still living in serene old age at Claremont, N. H.

In 1822 the BRATTLEBORO MESSENGER (Whig) was started by Alexander C. Putnam, a printer, who learned his trade at Windsor, and married a sister of the late Deacon Anson Barber. After continuing the paper four years, Mr. Putnam sold (1826) to George W. Nichols, whose first wife was a sister of the Fessendens, and who for some time had been employed on the Reporter, as foreman. Mr. Nichols was born at Stowe, Vt., in 1782, and learned his trade at Walpole, N. H. In politics he was a Democrat. He continued the Messenger until it was merged into the Vermont Phoenix, in 1834. After two years' connection with this paper, he sold out, and soon purchased the Windham County Democrat, which was started in 1836 by an association of Democrats, and run for one year under the editorial management of Mr. Joseph Steen. Mr. Nichols' second wife, Mrs. C. I. H. Nichols, who was a sister of Judge Howard of Townshend, was for some years the real and accredited editor of the paper. Under her administration the Democrat became one of the earliest champions of woman's rights in the country, and took a prominent position among the newspapers of the State. The paper was discontinued in the fall of 1853, and in the spring of 1855 Mr. Nichols removed with his family to Kansas, where he died the same year, at the age of 73.

The SEMI-WEEKLY EAGLE was started by B. D. Harris and William B. Hale—two youths just emerging from boyhood, and, as one of them has since expressed it, with considerable more pluck than discretion, there being already two well-established newspapers in the village of 2500 inhabitants, and neither of the firm understanding the printing business. It was a Whig paper, with strong partisan proclivities, and decidedly belligerent. The first number was issued Aug. 10, 1847, and its publication was continued about three years before passing into other hands. In the meantime Mr. Hale became cashier of the bank at Winchester, N. H., and Mr. Harris, having accepted the position of first Secretary of the Territory of Utah, then recently organized by act of Congress, was compelled to relinquish his connection with the paper. Accordingly, in the spring of 1851 the establishment was sold to a party of gentlemen in the county who were interested in maintaining the paper, and its management was committed to the hands of Pliny H. White, then a young lawyer, residing at West Wardsboro, whose letters and occasional essays had already attracted attention, and who, in after years, as Rev. Pliny H. White, became well known throughout the State. Mr. White, not finding editorial pursuits, as developed in a country newspaper office, entirely congenial to his tastes or his talents, remained in charge of the Eagle only a little more than a year, when Mr. Harris, having returned from Utah, was persuaded to resume control of it. He enlarged and changed it to a weekly sheet, and continued to conduct it until 1855, at which time, an adjustment of local political differences having taken place, the paper was united with the Vermont Statesman, conducted by O. H. Platt. The Eagle, under the management of Messrs. Harris and Hale, attained a circulation of about 1500 copies, which was considerably above the average circulation of country newspapers at that day. Being contemporary, and to some extent in rivalry with such well-known journals as the Windham County Democrat, edited by Mrs. Nichols, with which it had many a friendly bout; the Bellows Falls Gazette, edited by John W. Moore; the Montpelier Watchman, Patriot and Freeman, conducted respectively by E. P. Walton, Jr., Charles G. Eastman, and Charles W. Willard; the Burlington Free Press, Sentinel and Courier, under the editorial management, respectively, of DeWitt C. Clarke (and afterward of the elder Benedict), John G. Saxe and E. A. Stansbury, and other journals of like character and ability that might be named, it had to be both wide awake and pungent to maintain a reputable standing. The original projectors of the Eagle are still living and in the prime of life. Mr. Harris, still a resident of Brattleboro, is a well-known railroad contractor, while Mr. Hale has for many years been engaged in the banking business at Northampton, Mass.

THE VERMONT PHOENIX

Was first published Sept. 12, 1834, by Geo. W. Nichols and William E. Ryther, Mr. Nichols being the publisher of the Brattleboro Messenger, a Whig paper in politics, and Mr. Ryther publisher of the Independent Inquirer, a liberal paper in religious matters, owned by an association of gentlemen. It was first published for the proprietors by Hiram Tupper for a short time. The Inquirer having been published one year, the association sold it to Mr. E. H.

Thomas. The proprietors of the two papers then agreed to let both die, and from their ashes resurrect another paper, to be called the Vermont Phoenix. The Phoenix was published by Nichols & Ryther until Sept. 30, 1836, when they transferred their interest to Mr. G. C. Hall and Mr. J. C. Holbrook, the politics of the paper not being satisfactory to some of its patrons. The paper was then put in charge of Mr. Calvin Walton, from Boston, whom the proprietors engaged for the purpose, Mr. Ryther being retained in the office, and the paper advocating the election of William Henry Harrison for President. Mr. Walton's name, however, appears in only four numbers of said paper. Five weeks afterward Mr. Ryther, having purchased the paper of the proprietors, assumed its publication, and continued the same until July 8, 1847, when a partnership was formed with Mr. O. H. Platt (since of St. Louis, Mo.,) which lasted until April 18, 1851, when Mr. Platt, having purchased Mr. Ryther's interest, became sole proprietor. The Phoenix was enlarged in 1845, eleven years after its first publication. June 5, 1851, Mr. Platt, having purchased the Bellows Falls Gazette, united the same with the Phoenix, announcing that the paper would be published simultaneously at Brattleboro, Bellows Falls and Ludlow. How long this arrangement lasted we do not know. The Phoenix was again enlarged January, 1852. About this time the name of the paper was changed to The Statesman. January 1, 1855, it was merged with the Eagle, published by B. D. Harris, and the combined paper was called The Republican. George W. Nichols, publisher of the Windham County Democrat, having given up his paper and gone West, the type and fixtures were purchased by Dr. Charles Cummings, (who had had some connection with the Eagle), and Feb. 3, 1855, he revived the Vermont Phoenix, with which The Republican was merged in 1857. Mr. Cummings remained editor and proprietor of the Phoenix until he went to the war, in 1862, as Lieutenant-Colonel of the 16th Regiment Vermont Vols. At this time the publishing of the paper was in charge of Mr. Charles S. Prouty, and the editorial charge was assumed by Rev. Addison Brown, formerly pastor of the Unitarian Society in Brattleboro. Cummings was killed before Richmond, Sept. 30, 1864, while in command of the 17th Vt. Reg't, which he had recruited on the expiration of the time of the 16th. Col. Cummings was a native of Royalston, Mass., where he was born Feb. 6, 1821. Attending medical lectures at Castleton and Woodstock, he received his diploma in 1847, and after practicing a while at Fitzwilliam, N. H., came to Brattleboro in 1850. Messrs. Brown and Prouty purchased the Phoenix of Cumming's estate, in December, 1864. Jan. 1, 1868, Mr. Daniel B. Stedman bought a third interest in the paper, which was then enlarged to its present size. Mr. Brown died May 11, 1872, and Sept. 1, 1873, Mr. Prouty sold his interest to Mr. Olin L. French, who had formerly been editor of the Keene, N. H., Sentinel. The present firm is French & Stedman. The veteran founder of the paper, Mr. William E. Ryther, is still living at Bernardston, Mass., and furnished many of the above facts.—D. B. STEDMAN.

VERMONT RECORD AND FARMER AND ITS EDITORS.

In July, 1863, Daniel L. Milliken, editor of the Brandon Monitor, a local paper, changed the name and character of his paper, with the view of better adapting it to the wants of the whole State, and styled it "The Vermont Record." Mr. Milliken removed to Brattleboro Jan. 1, 1865. Here he had with him for a time H. M. Burt, now of Springfield, Mass., publisher of the paper printed on Mt. Washington, and who was connected with the New England Homestead, a paper which has gone out of existence. Rev. Mr. Ketchum was also associated with the editor of the Record for a limited time. Soon after the removal to Brattleboro, another department was added, with a separate heading, entitled, "The Vermont Farmer." In April, 1867, Mr. Milliken sold out to Ed. P. Ackerman, of Newark, N. J., who conducted the paper for nearly two years. In January, 1868, the two departments were united under the present title, The Vermont Record and Farmer, and C. Horace Hubbard, Esq., of Springfield, conducted an agricultural department for a number of years. In March, 1869, Mr. Ackerman sold to F. D. Cobleigh, a Brattleboro printer, who had a job office in connection with the office of the Record and Farmer. In May, 1874, Mr. Cobleigh died, and for the following year the Record and Farmer was under the editorial charge of J. M. Tyler, Esq., administrator of Mr. Cobleigh's estate, now Representative to Congress from the Second Vermont District. In April, 1875, Rev. A. Chandler, the present editor, purchased the paper of Mr. Tyler, and in January of the present year (1879) H. L. Inman of Ballston, N. Y., formerly one of the proprietors of the Ballston Democrat, purchased a half interest, the name of the firm now being Chandler & Inman.

While in Brattleboro, D. L. Milliken published also a School Journal, a monthly publication. He subsequently removed to Boston, Mass., and started "The Cottage Hearth," a literary and family magazine, which was continued until the present year, when it was merged into the Golden Rule, W. H. H. Murray's new monthly, with which Mr. Milliken is now connected. Mr. Ackerman, on leaving Brattleboro, went to New York, and has been engaged in different kinds of business. He is now in the lecture field. Mr. Cobleigh was a Knight Templar, and was buried with Masonic honors. Mr. Chandler, previous to taking charge of the Record and Farmer, had been a Congregational minister, preaching in several places in New Hampshire and Vermont for fifteen years.

REV. A. CHANDLER.

THE HOUSEHOLD.

The Household is the pioneer in its class of periodicals; the first, and, for several years, the only journal published in the country entirely devoted to domestic affairs. It was founded in the belief that the literature furnished by the various "ladies magazines" and kindred publications, though well-adapted to the needs of a large portion of its readers, was not such as to meet the requirements of those earnest working women who constitute so large a portion of the wives and daughters of our land; that they needed something more practical in its nature, whose tendency should be to elevate that peculiar labor of caring for and managing the family, known by the general term of "housework," from a mere drudgery to a science, and at the same time extend a hand to those who have a longing to make their home an index, as it were, of their characters—a reaching out for an attractiveness of surroundings which, with much or little expenditure, according to their means, shall attract and retain their husbands and friends, educate and refine the boys growing from youth to manhood, and cultivate a love for the good, the beautiful and the true in the daughters of the household, and in this way to make home, however humble, the dearest place, and the family the happiest people. Such is the purpose of the Household, and the patronage it has received may be taken as evidence that the faith of its projectors was well founded, especially in view of the fact that, unlike many, if not all of the successful journals of the present day, it was in no sense a child of fortune, either by birth or adoption. It is a well-known saying, "it takes a fortune to establish a paper;" the history of nearly every prominent periodical bears witness to its truth. The Household was reared and schooled in the hardships and privations incident to the life of a country printer, starting in January, 1868, with a subscription list of thirteen, with no capital to sustain it, and but little experience in newspaper life to direct its course, amid doubts and fears, gaining a little firmer foothold every year, it has solved the problem of success, and has to-day the largest circulation of any monthly published in New England. Four pages were added to its original sixteen, in the early part of 1869, the publisher having offered to make such an enlargement when the circulation of the journal should reach 12,000, and at the same time promised to make another and equal enlargement when the subscription list should number 20,000. The latter promise he was able to redeem with the commencement of the third volume, two years from the time the first number of the paper was issued; and since that time it has contained twenty-four large and well-filled pages, making it considerably the largest dollar monthly issued from an American press.

Instead of being disposed of through newsdealers, as a large portion of most of the monthly publications are, the large edition of the Household is mailed almost entirely from the publishing office, and fills nearly a hundred of Uncle Sam's large mail sacks per month. These are mailed from the middle to the last of the month preceding the date of issue, those having the farthest to go taking the earliest trains, and the whole edition reaches its readers with the regularity of clock work. It goes to every State and Territory in the Union, besides a large number are sent to foreign countries; the Household is not a local paper with a circumscribed field, but a cosmopolitan journal, adapted to all sections of the country, pretty generally found wherever there is a representative of the class to whose interests it is devoted. Its subscribers are found in nearly every county in the Northern and Western States, while in the far South and on the Pacific Coast its patrons are already numbered by the thousands. It has a large and efficient corps of agents throughout the country, many of whom have canvassed for it from its commencement, and it is a fact, since the first number was issued not a week-day has passed without bringing some addition to its subscription list. A good idea of the scope of the Household may be derived from a brief review of the special departments into which it is arranged. These are ten in number, corresponding to the apartments of a dwelling, as follows: The Veranda, the Drawing Room, the Conservatory, the Dressing Room, the Nursery, the Dining Room, the Dispensary, the Library, the Kitchen, and the Parlor.

In the Veranda are given the architectural notes, hints for out-door work, while a lookout is kept upon the surroundings of the dwelling, and assistance given toward beautifying the premises. The Drawing Room has articles on the art of furnishing the house, care of furniture, etiquette, and interior decorations. In the Conservatory are gathered the pets of the family in pots, cages and aquarium, and information given upon all matters pertaining to their treatment. The Dressing Room contains a brief review of the fashions, toilet recipes and practical suggestions upon needle-work and kindred topics. The Nursery is devoted to the care and management of infants and children, and furnishes the little folks with an assortment of entertaining reading and puzzle work. The Dining Room is furnished with hints upon table etiquette, the analysis of food, table talk, and a column of jokes as a "dessert." The sanitary articles of the Dispensary are from some of the best writers in the country, and abound in valuable information concerning the care of the sick and the preservation of health. In the Library, literary and educational topics are freely discussed, and there are also notices and reviews of books and current publications, and a page of original music in every issue. The Kitchen is a large department, where contributions are received every month from many of the most successful housekeepers in all sections of the country upon the various subjects that please or perplex their younger and less experienced sisters, with a large number of original and well-tried cooking recipes, a column of "Questions and Answers" upon all subjects pertaining to home life and domestic economy, a fund of practical information under the title of "Chats in the Kitchen," and a page of "Letters" from the Household Board, which is not surpassed in interest by any other feature of the paper; last, is the Parlor, which is a collection of original and selected stories, miscellaneous reading, poetry, etc. In short, the Household labors to promote the sweetness and grace of true womanhood in its presiding genius. And as an advertising medium the Household is especially valuable to all who desire to attract the attention of housekeepers and heads of families. It is generally preserved through the entire month for family reading, and then quite frequently laid away to be bound at the close of the volume and kept for future reference.—From the Book of the Centennial Newspaper Exhibition.

THE VERMONT HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Held their semi-annual meetings in Brattleboro in 1860 and 1862. At the meeting, July 16—17, 1862, the 16th, morning session, the Educational Secretary (of the Vermont Board of Education), John S. Adams of Burlington, introduced with timely suggestions Vermont geography and local history, for action of the Society upon, later. At the afternoon session, Rev. Pliny H. White read a memorial paper on Gen. Wm. Barton, who settled in the town of Barton, Orleans County, from whom the town derived its name. Henry Clark of West Poultney read interesting extracts from addresses he had delivered at the centennial celebration of Poultney, Sept. 21, 1861, upon the history of that town. The Hon. Hampden Cutts of Brattleboro read a carefully prepared sketch of the Hon. Paul Spooner, M. D., late of Hartland, Windsor County; after which Henry Clark, the orator of occasions, after some popular remarks on the suggestions made by Mr. Adams, at the morning session, introduced a resolution of sympathy and encouragement for Vermont geography and the civil and natural history of the State. The resolution, supported by the Hon. Geo. Folsom, LL. D., of Brattleboro, and the Burlington orator, who in his pertinent, persuasive, hurriedly eloquent zeal, always took an audience up and carried them along with him, was adopted. The Hon. Eliland Hall, President of the Society, in his grave, kind manner and way, then introduced the following, which, on motion of Mr. Adams of Burlington, was adopted:

Resolved, That we commend to the attention and encouragement of our citizens the Vermont Historical Magazine, recently undertaken by Miss Abby Maria Hemenway, of Ludlow, and now partially completed. Collecting from sources that will ere long be inaccessible, a vast amount of historical matter that is now useful, and will soon become invaluable. Its own intrinsic worth, as well as the persistent energy and praiseworthy perseverance with which it has been prosecuted, all recommend the enterprise to our approval and to general encouragement and support."

This was the first public notice of the work by an historical body; the more fitting and pleasant, coming as first, from our own Vermont State Historical Society.

Mrs. Hampden Cutts gave the historical levee, a very pleasant feature in the meetings of those days, at her hospitable mansion, the evening of the 16th. This meeting at Brattleboro was a specially interesting and genial one. Of the gentlemen named there present, all are now dead but Gov. Hall, of Bennington, and Henry Clark, now of Rutland. Others also, not herein specified, who were there are now demised. One, whose death left a blank in the Society, never yet filled, the live historical secretary, George F. Houghton, Esq., who was so much the soul of the meetings in his time, infusing into them so largely his own earnest zeal and fine historical taste and feeling. "Sic transit gloria mundi."—ED.

ADDENDA TO BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. CHARLES KELLOGG FIELD.

Died Sept. 16, 1880, aged 77 years.

To the persistent efforts of this gentleman during the last two years of his life, we are indebted for a large portion of the portraits contained in this work. By age and infirmities retired from business, but so long as he had strength to move he continued his slow and daily walk through our busy streets, but ever manifesting a lively interest in the progress of our History, since its publication was commenced by Mr. Leonard.

Fortunate, in 1876, in obtaining of Messrs. Bufford & Son, of Boston, accurate portraits for his history of Newfane, he wished to see equally good portraits of the old-time worthies of this town, whose well-remembered faces were familiar to him in the days of his youth and early manhood. Unsolicited, and without any reward for his services, he corresponded extensively with those more directly interested, to assist in the accomplishment of his wishes. He also collected money by subscription to procure an engraving of the new Unitarian church, and wrote the biographical sketches of Capt. Samuel Root and Epaphro Seymour, on pages 121 and 123. But a few days before his death he said to the writer, "Well, I feel relieved, for I have collected the money, paid Bufford for the portraits, got his receipt, and the matter is now all settled." With this labor of love his life has closed. Sadly and reluctantly, after a pleasant familiarity of twenty years, we take final leave of this remarkable man, who usually kept his worse side out and his best within. It may be truly said of him, as Byron said of Sheridan,

"God never made but one such man,
And broke the die in moulding Sheridan."

In the Vermont Phoenix of September 17, 1880, we find the following obituary notice:

"The well-known form of Charles K. Field has passed from among us forever. For many months his friends have been admonished by his faltering steps that the end was near, and his own remarks have indicated that he was fully conscious of the fact; but when it was reported that he was hopelessly ill, a feeling of sorrow settled over this community, which was greatly deepened by the intelligence of his death.

Mere casual acquaintances were often repelled by his somewhat rough exterior and blunt remarks, but those who knew him intimately looked through the surface into his heart, esteemed and loved him.

He came of a distinguished family, his lineage being traceable to John Field, the astronomer, who was born in London about 1520, and who died at Ardsley, England, about 1587. His grandson, Zechariah Field, came to Massachusetts and settled in Dorchester about 1630, but a few years later moved to Hartford, Conn., and died in Hatfield, Mass., in 1666. From him the line is easily traced to Martin Field, the father of the subject of this sketch, who was born in Leverett, Mass., Feb. 12, 1773, graduated at Williams College in 1798, studied law with his uncle, Lucius Hubbard, at Chester, Vt., and settled at Newfane at the opening of this century. He was a man of rare natural ability, of varied and extensive acquirements, and for thirty years was eminent in his profession and one of the leading men of the State. His wife was sister of the late Hon. Daniel Kellogg of this town. Their youngerson, Roswell M. Field, was one of the most brilliant and able men Vermont ever produced. He removed to St. Louis in 1839, and soon became the compeer of the most eminent lawyers of the West. For many years before his decease, in 1869, he was called the Nestor of the Missouri bar.

Charles K. Field, the oldest son, was born in Newfane, April 24, 1808, fitted for college at Amherst, Mass., entered Middlebury College at the age of fifteen, and graduated in 1822. After studying law three years in the office of his father, he was admitted to the bar of this county and commenced the practice of his profession in Newfane; in 1828 he removed to Wilmington, where he resided for ten years, representing that town in the legislature in 1835, '36, '37 and '38; he was a delegate from that town in the State Constitutional Convention in 1836. In 1838 he returned to Newfane, where he resided until 1861, representing that town in the legislature in 1853, '54, '55, and '60, and also representing it in the Constitutional Convention in 1843, '50 and '57. In 1861 he moved to this town, where he has since resided. He was elected a member of the Council of Censors in 1869, and chosen President thereof at its first session, and in 1870 represented Brattleboro in the Constitutional Convention. Thus it will be seen that he had large experience in legislative bodies, where he always exerted great influence and did much toward shaping the legislation of the State.

Mr. Field inherited many of his father's characteristics, especially his sarcasm, humor and faculty for relating stories, of which he possessed an inexhaustible store. He was a great reader, and the best ancient and modern authors were as familiar to him as were his village neighbors. His memory was wonderful; he remembered all of value that he ever read or heard, and had it at instant command; this, with his quick perception, originality, powers of description, wit and humor, made him a most entertaining man in conversation, a brilliant public speaker and a formidable adversary in forensic debate. His judgment of men was unerring; a distinguished jurist of this State once said of him that it made little difference what men said to him, he seemed to look right into their minds and read their real thoughts. He was a skillful lawyer, few men wielding a keener rapier than he, and he apparently possessed every requisite of a most effective jury advocate; but though he always commanded a large practice, he mainly left the trial of jury cases to others, regarding that as an uncertain and unsatisfactory field of enterprise. He was widely known throughout this State and highly regarded for his brilliant abilities. He possessed a kind, sympathetic heart, retained the strongest attachment for his friends, and was an honest man. He was the last of that generation of men composed of the Bradleys, the Kelloggs, the Shafers and the Fields, who for more than half a century gave eminence to the Bar of Windham County, and whose names will always shine in the galaxy of Vermont's distinguished men.

Mr. Field was married in 1828 to Julia A. Kellogg of Cooperstown, N. Y., who survives him; he leaves three children, Mrs. E. P. Jewett and Henry K. Field of Montpelier and Mrs. H. C. Willard of this town."

ALBERT H. BULL.

A well-known citizen of Brattleboro, died July 29th, 1869, of heart disease, at the age of 64 years, while on his annual summer visit at Old Orchard Beach, near Saco, Maine. Mr. Bull was a native of Hartford, Ct., where for several years he was a successful druggist. He retired from business about 20 years ago, and since that time has resided in Brattleboro. In 1849, he married Sarah, youngest daughter of the late Col. Joseph Goodhue, who survives him. The Brattleboro Phoenix says:

"Mr. Bull has laid the people of this village under great obligations by a generous donation to the library, a few years since, of $2,000, to be paid in annual installments of $100 each, for the purchase of books. The perusal of the books purchased by his liberality will exert a healthful influence for long years to come, and keep his name in fresh and grateful remembrance. His remains were brought to this place, and buried in our beautiful cemetery."

A correspondent of the Portland Press writing from Orchard Beach, says of Mr. Bull: "For 17 years he had spent his summers here, and had become interested in making the place attractive. When four years ago, the Park lot of forty acres, covered with a pine growth, was purchased by Mr. Staples, proprietor of the Old Orchard House, Mr. Bull conceived the idea of laying it out with walks and avenues, and supplying it with rustic seats and arbors. He had so nearly succeeded in carrying out his design as to make it a spot of great interest to all who visit the beach. He labored with his own hands, and with his own money employed others to assist. In winters, at his home in Vermont, he had with his own hands painted signs for the names of the walks and shady nooks, among which we find "Fisherman's Hut" and "Parsons Lodge," &c., and many other similar names, that seemed to him appropriate to the various localities. His work was a purely disinterested one, and he could only have been prompted by his love of the beautiful. He is represented as a man of culture, and his works here abundantly show it. His age was sixty-five, and the exclamation of all is, 'he died too soon.'"

THE ACADEMY OF 1801.

Three buildings were occupied by Rev. Hiram Orcutt in the establishment of "Glenwood Seminary," at the West Village in 1860. One of the buildings, with gable in the center and wings upon each side, is the academy building constructed by a joint stock company in 1802, the charter of the company having been granted by the State of Vermont in 1801. Roswell Redfield, uncle of Capt. Benajah Dudley, assisted in its construction in 1802.

Capt. Dudley, now (1880) living in his ninetieth year, was one of the pupils at this academy in 1807, when it was under the administration of its first preceptor or instructor, Rev. Titus Hutchins of Westmoreland, N. H. Built in the days of wrought nails, pod augers and flint-lock muskets, its antiquity and associations claim our attention. A large number of the collegiates of this town, whose names are on our list, page 58, fitted for college at this institution, under the instruction of Mr. Roswell Harris, who was its preceptor over thirty years.

In by-gone days this academy was famous for its exciting, thrilling exhibitions, in the ancient, spacious meeting-house (built in 1785 and destroyed by fire February 2, 1845) and thereby a worthy rival of the old Chesterfield Academy, which, at its annual exhibitions, drew crowds of visitors from afar and near to see where "The great heroes of the buried past,

Their mighty shadows o'er the present cast,
And fight their battles on the tented field,
Upon the lofty heights of Chesterfield."*

In the exhibitions at West Brattleboro, as at Chesterfield, tragedy was largely prominent and "thunder, blood and guns," the order of the day.

At the East Village there was but one school house in which was a public school, in operation about six months in a year, when it was currently reported among the scholars that at the coming exhibition of the Academy at the West Village, Theodore Green would, with a sword, cut off Goliath's head. Whether that now veteran Admiral in his youthful days acted the young David and carried out this part of the programme, we cannot say; but in after years we have seen acting by these students of such a character as to confirm us in the belief that somebody cut off the giant's head. In one scene we witnessed, the situation required the use of a terrible dagger, but in place thereof appeared a silver-plated butter-knife, and this was before the days of Mark Twain.

*In November, 1842, there was acted by the students "The Emancipation of Europe," and Napoleon, Wellington, Blucher and Alexander were represented. About midnight the Burdett and Miller glee club, from Brattleboro, sang "Lutso's Wild Hunt" with fine effect and loud applause.

The annual June training sham fights were invariably upon the green in front of the Academy, and against its walls were placed canvas roofs, under which were retailers of various kinds of refreshments, such as yellow gingerbread, smoked herring, beer, cider, and the contents of those beautiful cut-glass decanters of the olden time. Mr. Lewis Amsden (one of the old spelling-book printers at the East Village) usually pitched his tent in this locality on the first Tuesday in June, where, in addition to the sale of refreshments, as aforementioned, he disposed of penknives, jack-knives, pencils, side-combs, etc.

In 1815 the school closed, and remained closed about two years. During this period the second story of the building was occupied as a cabinet furniture manufactory by Mr. Anthony Van Doorn. He continued his business there until he built a furniture manufactory at the West Village, where, or near where, is now the brick Baptist church. After the room was vacated by Mr. Van Doorn, the town, for a consideration, acquired the right to use the room for town meetings. From that time this was the town hall, and the only place for voting upon town and state affairs until 1855, when the brick building now used for that purpose was built and made ready at the East Village. Previous to the occupation of the old Academy by the town, we have not learned where the town meetings were held, but we surmise, as the old meeting-house was built by the town, they made use of it for that purpose.

Judge —, who lived at the East Village from 1789 until April, 1847—a period of 58 years—never in all that time failed to be present at town meetings but in two instances. The Judge was a man of marked ability, and for a long time controlled public opinion here; but as the town increased in population and he increased in years, his position became more and more difficult to maintain. He made many eloquent and effective speeches in that old hall, in defence of his opinions upon town affairs. At the conclusion of one such effort against a popular movement, Mr. John Birge, who rarely made remarks in public, arose and said: "Mr. Chairman, I move there be 3000 copies of his excellency's speech printed for circulation." No one man has so many times represented this town in the State Legislature as the Judge. He has been heard to say he could not be true to the freeman's oath unless he voted for himself.

At the town-meeting in 1847 there was a long contested election for representative, and not until near midnight did they succeed. Then, at the eleventh hour, a new candidate—John R. Blake, Esq.—received the majority vote.

KILLED IN BATTLE.—Mr. S. T. R. Cheney of West Brattleboro has recently lost two sons, one killed in the attack on Fort Steadman, in front of Petersburg, and the other died at Brooklyn, N. Y., the day after his marriage. Frederick S. Cheney, who was killed at Fort Steadman, was a corporal in Company C. 57th Massachusetts Regiment. Captain George E. Barton notified Mrs. Cheney of the death of her son, an extract of which we copy:

DEAR MADAME: It becomes my painful duty to inform you that your son, Frederick Cheney, a corporal in my Company, "C," detached on the "Color Guard," was killed in the action of the 25th of March, before Petersburg, Va. I cannot speak too highly of his many good qualities, both as a soldier and a young man of excellent principles. Always kind and considerate towards his comrades, he won their love and respect, and as some of the company remarked in my presence, "I would have spared almost any one else, rather than him." Like many of our other brave boys, he fell at his post of duty, fighting for the Union and the old flag. I found his body after the fight and it was removed to the 1st Division Hospital burying ground. He must have died instantly without much pain, as he was struck on the head by a piece of shell. His body lay within a few feet of Lieut. Murdock, who was killed while holding the colors. And now, dear madam, please accept the heartfelt sympathy for yourself and family in this your sad bereavement, and may the good Lord in his mercy help us all to do our duty and enable us to say and feel "Thy will be done," so that whether on the field of battle or in our quiet New England homes, we should be "always ready" and like your son Frederick at our post of duty."—From an Old Brattleboro Paper.

HISTORICAL NUGGETS FROM BRATTLEBORO.—The first postage stamps ever printed in this country came from Brattleboro, in 1845 and 1846. About the same time Providence, R. I., and New York city issued a local carrier's stamp, but Postmaster Palmer, of Brattleboro, was the first to put in circulation a stamp to prepay postage. They were printed in sheets, upon light buff-colored paper in black ink, and were about the size of the present postage stamp. It is needless to say that in the years that have elapsed their value has largely appreciated. Before their scarcity and antiquity was fully realized, seven of these stamps were sold for $1 each, and the same have been resold as high as $20 apiece, going to England. A Bath (England) magazine has published a long article in regard to the stamps, mentioning the name of the engraver (Thomas Chubbuck of Springfield, Mass.) and having a wood-cut of their original.—Newspaper Item.

DEATH OF A PRODIGY.—George Ladd, Brattleboro's mathematical prodigy, died at the Poor Farm, February, 1878. His wonderful ability to solve the most difficult mathematical problems, although without even a common school education, made him an interesting character. If given, for instance, the number of miles from Brattleboro to Washington, or any other point, he would immediately and accurately give the number of feet and inches.

A CURIOUS FIDDLE.

Not even Cremona's far-famed violins so cluster with reminiscences as this. It was natural that, while our boys were lying at Brandy Station, on the Rappahannock, during the gloomy winter of 1864-5, their thoughts should turn towards the more pleasant scenes of their native hills.

"Oh that we had a fiddle!" at length some one exclaimed.

"Well!" said a young fellow from Brattleboro, "I believe, boys, that I can make you a fiddle."

He had never attempted anything of the kind in his life.

"Can you?" shouted the boys. "Good! you make one and we will send to Washington for the strings."

George M. Colt, of Company C., 2d Vermont Volunteers, was the one who proposed to make the cheer-giving instrument; and with a hatchet, a jack knife, an old file and a piece of a junk bottle as his only tools, he got a piece of soft maple that grew upon the banks of the Rappahannock, and set to work. The bottom and side rim of the fiddle were made out of one single piece of maple, in the most approved style and form of the ordinary fiddle. It was a complete dug-out. The top was made of pine, which grew in the country. The bow was of maple, same as the larger part of the shell. The hairs were pulled from the tail of Col. Walbridge's white horse. The glue, some member of the company happened to have with him. In the course of some five weeks the instrument was completed. After having been wistfully eyed by the men of the company and regiment for a long time, during its construction, the instrument at length gave forth its stirring strains. One of their comrades was called out of the hospital to give it a trial. He played two hours, until he was exhausted. Many stag dances it conjured up; to many headquarters it went of nights in a round of serenades. It was admired and cherished by the officers, and wondered at by that prince of tacticians and soldiers—General Getty.—Newspaper Article.

A CENTENARIAN.—1879.

A notable event for West Brattleboro was the 100th anniversary of the birth of Mrs. Sally Stockwell, which was celebrated most becomingly, at her home, on Wednesday, April 30, 1879, by her numerous relatives and friends. Mrs. Stockwell was born at Chesterfield, N. H., April 30, 1779. She was a daughter of Abner Harris, whose father was one of the early settlers of that town, and who emigrated from Woodstock, Conn. She was married to Arad Stockwell when sixteen years of age. He died 23 years ago at the age of 83 years. She has been the mother of ten children, five of whom are still living and were all present. There were also 34 grandchildren, 24 now living, and 37 great-grandchildren, 33 now living. Hundreds of her friends called upon her, with congratulations and many tokens of regard. A poem was also read by Rev. M. H. Harris, written for the occasion by Mrs. Abby R. Colburn of Brattleboro. The Brattleboro photographers, Messrs. Howe and Parker, were on hand, and secured pictures of the old lady, the house, and the relatives and visitors present. The old lady received them with charming womanly simplicity and grace. She dined with her oldest friends, and after dinner she smoked her accustomed pipe. Her mind and memory are wonderfully clear for a centenarian, while there is little in her appearance to indicate that she has outlived three generations. Among the aged guests present were Eli Lee of Vernon, 93 years old; Rev. Samuel Fish, 90; Emory Pratt, 90; Benajah Dudley, 88; Sally Harris, 87; Timothy Adkins and wife, each 86; Maria Woodward, 85; Mrs. Emory Pratt, 84; Electa Bennett, 84; Saben Jones, 82; Wilder Harris, 82. Mrs. Stockwell is a living, unanswerable argument and example in favor of early marriages and large families. Married at 16, the mother of ten children, and 100 years old. What more can be said? Girls, go and do likewise—if you can. Another sad warning of the evils of tobacco. Mrs. Stockwell has smoked moderately for a time, "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." If she hadn't done so, probably she would now be 260 years old instead of 100!—Brattleboro Paper.

THE TUSK OF AN ELEPHANT FOUND IN BRATTLEBORO.

The tusk of a fossil elephant was found in a muck bed, about five feet below the surface, on the farm of D. S. Pratt in this town, Saturday, Sept. 2, by a workman who was digging muck. The tusk is forty-four inches in length and eighteen inches in circumference at the largest end, and eleven inches at the smallest. It is in a fair state of preservation, although some parts of it crumbled after being exposed to the air. The workman on discovering it took a piece to Mr. Pratt, remarking as he handed it to him, that he had found a curious piece of wood. Mr. Pratt, on looking at it, discovered its true nature. This tusk belonged to a species of elephants long since extinct, supposed to be the Elephas Primogenius (or mammoth) Blumenback, that inhabited the northern part of North America, having wandered across the Siberian plains to the Arctic Ocean and Behring Straits and beyond to this country south to about the parallel of 40 degrees. Their bones show them to have been about twice the weight and one-third taller than our modern species.

The remains (tusks, teeth and several bones,) of one of these elephants were found at the summit of the Green Mountains, at Mount Holly, in 1848, by workmen engaged in building the railroad from Bellows Falls to Rutland. These remains were found in a muck bed, eleven feet below the surface and at an elevation of 1415 feet above tide water. Most of the bones found, including a molar tooth, were taken by the workmen and others and carried out of the State. The most perfect tusk was secured by Prof. Zadock Thompson, and is lodged in the State Cabinet at Montpelier. This tusk was 80 inches long and four inches in diameter. The molar tooth, now in possession of Prof. Agassiz, weighs eight pounds and presents a grinding surface of eight inches long and four broad. A plaster cast of it is on exhibition with the tusk at our State Cabinet.—Brattleboro Paper.

Leonard Knapp was captain of the old Floodwood company, in 1831. His father—James Knapp—John Alexander and a Mr. Bennett went from Brattleboro to the battle of Bennington. Leonard Knapp said, when in the employ of Dr. Lemuel Dickerman, he heard the Dr. say he learned his profession from Dr. Henry Wells, our first town clerk. Lemuel Dickerman, when a boy, was a bound apprentice to learn shoemaking, in Massachusetts. He left his employer and travelled on foot to Brattleboro. After some time in service on the farm of Dr. Wells, he became so well accomplished by instructions from Wells, that he assisted him in practice, until so many patients preferred the young doctor, that the old doctor sold out and went to Montague, Mass.

PART II.

DUMMERSTON.

BY DAVID LUFKIN MANSFIELD.

"Be that is not proud of his ancestors, either he has no ancestors to be proud of,
or he is a degenerate son."

THE FIRST VISIT OF WHITE MEN TO DUMMERSTON

Was that of Col. Joseph Kellogg and his scouting party from Fort Dummer.

They ascended Black Mountain, Nov. 30, 1724; Col. Kellogg wrote in his journal at that time:

"The next scout I sent up ye West River Mountain, and there to Lodge on ye top and view Evening and Morning for smoaks, and thence up ye mountain at Great Falls and there also to Lodge on ye top and view morning and evening for smoak; but these making no discovery of any Enemy returned."

Dummerston was a name originally applied to one of four tracts of land granted about 1713, by Massachusetts to Connecticut as an equivalent for 197,793 acres of land granted by the former to planters, and which upon determining the boundary between the two governments were found to be within the jurisdiction of the latter. This tract containing 43,943 acres and including a portion of the present towns of Brattleboro, Dummerston, and Putney, was sold at auction, together with the other tracts, by order of the colony of Connecticut, April 24 and 25, 1716, and upon partition made, fell to William Dummer (afterwards Lieutenant Governor.) Anthony Stoder (Stoddard) William Brattle and John White.

Dummer being the oldest proprietor, the tract was called after him. On the settlement of the judicial line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire in 1741, this tract fell within the limits of the government of New Hampshire, which incorporated the whole into three townships, including in the middle township, the greatest part of the land belonging to the heirs of Wm. Dummer and Antony Stoder, and called the name of it Fullum, by virtue of which the privileges of a town are now held.

The charter from New Hampshire, dated Dec. 26, 1753, was issued to Stoder and 56 others, and covered 19,360 acres. The time to fulfil some of the conditions of the charter was extended June 12, 1760, and again July 7, 1763.

ORIGINAL CHARTER OF DUMMERSTON.

Through the kindness of O. E. Randall of Chesterfield, N. H., the representative of that town to the Legislature of that State, which met at Concord, June 4, 1879, we have obtained a copy of the charter of Fullum.

The original charter is recorded in the "Charter Record" Vol. 1 Page 185, which volume is kept in the office of the Secretary of State, for the State of New Hampshire, at Concord.

The Grantees, owing to Indian wars, as they claimed, could not fulfil the conditions of the charter; hence, they applied for an extension. Mr. Randall did not deem it necessary to copy the merely preliminary or terminal matter, but made the following extract from Extension of Charter:

"Now know ye that we being willing to promote the end proposed, have of our farther grace and favour suspended our claims of the forfeitures which the said Grantees may have incurred, and by these presents do grant unto the said Grantees, their heirs and assigns the term of one year for performing and fulfilling the conditions, matters and things by them to be done which term is to be renewed annually until his Majesty's Plenary Instructions shall be received relative to the incident that has prevented a compliance with the charter according to the true intent and meaning thereof. Signed, sealed &c. by Benning Wentworth the 12th, of June 1760.

DUMMERSTON AS SURVEYED IN 1767.

The plan of the town as surveyed by Isaac Miller, and Ebenezer Waters in 1767, is quite different from the one recorded at the end of the charter on the Charter Book with the Secretary of the State of New Hampshire. The west boundary line of the town as surveyed in 1767, is a straight line. The plan of the town drawn on parchment by Ebenezer Waters is still in existence; but the writing has nearly faded out. By careful study, we have deciphered, or made out all but one or two words. It reads as follows:

"This is a Platt of 21,700 acres of Equivalent Lands, so called, Lying on and adjoining the West side of Connecticut River and North of Haidens Land so called, and said Equivalent Lands of Gov. Dummer and Anthony Stoddard Esq. deceased beginning at the N. E. corner of Brattleborough at a basswood tree marked standing on the bank of said River, From thence extending West 9° 45 North 5 3-4 Miles and 47 rods to a Beech Tree marked on the West line of said Equivalent Lands from thence extending North 26° 25 East 6 3-4 Miles 18 1-4 rods on said West line to a small Hemlock Tree marked, Thence extending East 10° 25 South 6 3-4 miles & 56 rods to a stake and stones Found on the Bank of said River and from thence Extending southerly by said River on which it Bounds easterly to the Bounds as formerly said—15,600 acres of said Land was laid out in the months of Sept. & Oct. 1767, and 6100 acres laid out in the month of June—for all said Land was laid into 100 acre lots Excepting some slips that was not convenient for lots, and these was also mostly on corners—all was done in lots that could be by Isaac Miller of Worcester & by Particular orders of Capt. John Stevens of Ashford, Comm. and Anthony Stoddard Esq.—Surveyed.

Per EBENZ. WATERS."

The Captain's name was barely legible. The south line of Dummerston is now 7 miles long, and the width of the town about 5 miles. 61 lots, or 6100 acres, were sometime set off to Putney, leaving 15,600 acres. Adding 1400 probably once a part of Marlboro. we have 17,000 acres, or as reported in the grand list of 1880, 18,481 acres. The township was re-charted by Gov. Tryon in 1766.

TOPOGRAPHY OF THE TOWN.

Brookline and Putney bound Dummerston on the N., Connecticut river on the E., Brattleboro on the S., Marlboro and Newfane on the W. The surface is exceedingly diversified. There are many high hills and deep valleys. Most of the land is very productive, especially in the Connecticut river and the West river valleys; and other portions are well adapted for grazing purposes. The principal forest trees are hemlock, pine, beech, birch, oak, ash, hickory and some chestnut. The sugar maple is abundant, and the product of one of the largest orchards, in the best seasons, has been 3300 lbs. of maple sugar. In 1850, other products amounted to 1581 head of cattle valued at $50,000; 967 bushels of rye were raised that year, also, 8639 bushels of oats; 45066 lbs. of butter were made and 14550 lbs. of cheese.

West river separates the town into two divisions called East and West Dummerston. It flows southeasterly through the town and empties into the Connecticut at Brattleboro. The school districts are numbered from one to five in the west part, and from one to eight in the east. Two have been consolidated with the others leaving only eleven at the present day. The west village is located near the right bank of West river on a lowland plain running north and south. The principal buildings include a church, store, tavern, post-office, and saw and grist-mill. The thrifty farmers and mechanics occupy neat looking dwellings. The Brattleboro and Whitehall narrow gauge railroad is building past this village. (Written in 1879.)

From this valley the hills rise gradually till their summit is reached, in this town, four miles distant near Marlboro pond. From that point the hills overlook Black mountain which rises to a height of 1150 feet above the surface of West river into which flow the streams from this high range of hills. The largest stream is Allen's brook, so named from the circumstance that a Mr. Allen was killed by the Indians many years ago, and buried near its source at Marlboro pond. They defeated the whites in a battle at Newfane, and Mr. Allen was one of the number pursued and killed. For long years a pine stump marked the spot where he was buried near the brook which received his name. Late years it has been called Stickney brook. On it are good water privileges, and within a few years, 4 saw-mills were standing on its banks within the space of as many miles. Three are still in operation and one has been pulled down. Along the passes of this brook are very deep ravines. The most beautiful stream is "Furnace brook" on which is the "Cascade" made famous and attractive to the passer-by on account of its foaming, rushing and sparkling waters jumping, tossing and glittering in the falling rays of the sun, down over a high ledge of rocks shaded by over-hanging trees and bushes threatening to dash upon the traveler as he passes over the bridge under which it swiftly glides into the river below.

Of the western range, Wicopee Hill is the most famous. Years ago there was no other pathway up the West river valley from Brattleboro to Newfane except over this very steep hill, by marked trees; and the traveler must have found it a hard road to travel. Black Mountain is on the left bank of West river opposite the village of West Dummerston. It rises almost perpendicularly from the water 1150 feet and opens to the south in the form of a horse-shoe, called "The Shoe of the Mountain." The appearance of the mountain as you pass along on the opposite bank of the river, is bold and majestic. Granite rocks are piled one upon another. Evergreen trees and stunted shrubbery poorly cover its surface and give it a dark and sombre hue. In the N. W. part of the town is a narrow defile made by the river. Along this narrow passway called "The valley of the shadow of death," is the road leading to Newfane. So steep and high are the hills and so narrow the pass, that for two or three months of the winter the rays of the sun scarcely fall upon the road for a mile, any part of the day. Well may the traveler exclaim on his journeying over the hills in this town :

"The hills! the everlasting hills!
How peerlessly they rise,
Like earth's gigantic sentinels,
Discoursing in the skies."

Through the east part of the town passes the Vermont Valley Railroad along the Connecticut valley. The railroad buildings include a passenger and freight depot. After leaving the railroad station, about two miles distant across the meadows and plains is the village of Slab Hollow, not a very high sounding name, but a place of considerable business, located on Salmon brook where there are good water privileges. The principal buildings are mills and shops, aside from the dwellings which together make quite a collection. One mile farther west is Dummerston Centre, a small village on an elevation of land that affords a delightful view of the long range of New Hampshire hills. No water-power is near and hence its former prosperity has greatly declined. Here is where the first meeting-house was built more than a century ago. Here is where the first settlers met so often at the house of Enoch Cook to transact town business. The new meeting-house stands not far from the site of the old church. The post-office is located where Hosea Miller lived, who was one of fourteen to sign the first call for a settler's meeting Jan. 21, 1771.

Business was once sufficient to keep open two stores, and the firm of Noyes, Mann & Hayes profited to the extent of $3,000 in one year. Litigants found employment for two lawyers; and the old time schoolmaster flourished his ruler over four-score and ten pupils. All is now changed. The number of school children has lessened one third. The old store is empty, the lawyers are starved out and only tillers of the soil remain. The range of hills through the central part of the town form a watershed from which the streams flow in one direction to the West river, and in the opposite direction, easterly, to the Connecticut. The principal streams on the eastern slope are Salmon brook and Canoe brook or Murder Hollow brook as it is called at the present day. The first name was given from the circumstance that Alexander Kathan, one of the first settlers, found an Indian canoe in that stream. The other name was given from the fact of its being the scene of a murder committed near where it empties into the Connecticut. The victim was a peddler of silk dress-goods. His body was supposed to have been thrown into the river, as a trail from the place of violence was found leading across the sandy soil to the edge of the stream.

The view from Prospect hill is always pleasing, and at this season of the year,

May 27th, when the fields and pastures are green with fresh grass, the forests clothed with new leaves and the fruit trees in full bloom, the survey is truly delightful. Prospect is nearly 200 feet higher than the beautiful hill where the Central village stands below, and almost overlooks Black mountain on the southwest in the West river valley. From its summit ten churches are visible in the several villages exposed to view. A part of the thriving village of Brattleboro can be seen six miles southward. The Green Mountains terminate the view in the west and gradually slope downward to the valley between, fertilized by West river, that rushes on in its rapid course until it unites with the Connecticut a few miles to the south, and destined some day not far distant to furnish a path for the swift locomotive that carries wealth and enterprise wherever it speeds. The blue Ascutney rises prominent in the scenery 40 miles away to the north, and the woodland hills fade into the horizon far beyond. The granite hills of New Hampshire extend along the eastern sky and the grey old turret of Mt. Monadnock rears in sight far above the neighboring summits. A rich and beautiful valley intervenes, through which flow the tranquil waters of the Connecticut as they roll silently on to the broad ocean. These are some of the principal features of the surrounding landscape. Consider, also, the cultivated fields, the numerous farm-dwellings, dotting the hillsides, the grassy plains and the fertile meadows and many pleasing objects, too numerous for description, and it can well be said that the view is charming.

GEOLOGY.

This paper for our history was to have been written by Samuel Knight of Brattleboro, but old age and failing health prevented his performing the allotted task. The writer can make only a brief statement on the subject. In the east part of the town is a large quarry of argillaceous or roofing slate which has been wrought for more than half a century. There are other kinds of slate some of which are serviceable for flagging stones. Schorl or black tourmaline is found in this town. Granite is also very abundant and highly valuable for building stones. Excellent granite has been extensively wrought for building abutments, piers, culverts of highways and railroads. It is also used for the walls of buildings, underpinning, doorsteps, hearthstones, window-caps and fencing posts. Allen, or Stickney brook, flows over a bed of excellent granite near its mouth, that has been worked many years. There is a shop near by for stone mason's work where the granite is formed into the required shape for building purposes. Black mountain is a huge pile of granite rocks piled up like "Ossa on Pelion" making an inexhaustible granite quarry. The Brattleboro and Whitehall Railroad passes close to the foot of this mountain of granite. [the above was written in 1879. The writer adds, Jan. 1884:] This quarry was owned by a New York Company in 1879. It is now owned by Geo. Lyon of Northfield Mass. who employs about 50 men in getting out granite. He has a large and increasing business, and contracts at the present time that will require two or more years to fulfil.

BRATTLEBORO AND WHITEHALL R. R. Gauge, three feet:

The road extends up the West River valley from Brattleboro to Londonderry.

The trains began running, Nov. 20, 1880, and the road has been in successful operation since that time with increased earnings and passenger traffic from year to year. The earnings from Nov. 20, 1880, to Jan. 1, 1882, as reported by the treasurer, of the road are as follows :

From passengers,	$15,041,97
„ freight,	15,919,78
„ express,	579,41
„ mails,	2,251,14
A total of	33,810,30

The total cost of the road was not far from $408,000.

INTRODUCTION TO THE RECORDS OF DUMMERSTON FOR THE YEARS 1773 & 1774.

The tract of land called Dummerston is a part of the tract of land on the west side of Connecticut River formerly granted to Connecticut government as an equivalent for some lands which the province of Massachusetts Bay had granted to their planters which upon inquiry was found to be within the Government of Connecticut in order to secure the property of ye soil to the Massachusetts planters, that government granted to Connecticut the property of sundry tracts of their province lands one of which was the tract here mentioned, which the government of Connecticut sold to sundry private gentlemen among whom the late Honorable William Dummer Anthony Stoder Esq. whose heirs are now the proprietors of one-half of the whole tract on Connecticut River supposed to contain 48000 acres the said Wm. Dummer being the oldest proprietor the tract was called after him, the name is now kept up in acknowledgement of the title from the original grant of the Massachusetts government which is the title the land is now held by—on the settlement of the jurisdictional line of the province of Massachusetts Bay with that of New Hampshire, the tract of land here mentioned fell within the limits of New Hampshire government which incorporated the whole into three township including in the middle townships the greatest part of the lands, belonging to the heirs of Wm. Dummer & Anthony Stoddard & called the name of Fullum by virtue of which the privileges of a town are now held Besides the town of it Fullum which is known by the name of Dummerston, includes nearly one half of the town of Putney.

MINUTES FROM DUMMERSTON RECORDS.

"After the record of a town meeting holden on the 17th of May 1774, are the remarks of Dr. Solomon Harvey then town clerk of Dummerston. The reader may observe that no Trustees were chosen at the annual meeting as usual, which, should it excite any speculation, it may be remembered that the Government of New York who had ever since July ye 4th Anno 1764, exercised an unprecedented system of tyranny over all that territory then called State of Vermont—and did in almost numberless instances, so cruelly harrass and pillage the poor new settlers in their intolerably, inhospitable wilderness, as rendered their hard earned pittance scarce worth enjoying, and all under the sacred and auspicious name of administering justice; for a particular account of which see Col. Ethan Allen's treatise on the monopolizing conduct of New York relative to the New Hampshire grantees and settlers on the West side of the Green Mountains; and all to reflect on the conduct of the New Yorkers in the neighborhood from the time of the commitment of Lieut. Spaulding to the common jail for high treason till after their murdering of William French and Daniel Houghton: and no man can be at a loss in regard to the truth of what is here laid down.

Governor Tyron and his imps, and the minions of the British tyrant (George the third) had by their hell invented policy, their plans, commissioners and other artful insinuations, extended their influence into every new plantation over which they tyrannized, and had not failed even to have some in their interest in this town who by art and insinuation overpersuaded the honest people of the town to omit choosing Trustees for the year, alleging that they had no right to it by virtue of any law of the Government, notwithstanding the provision made and provided in such case, and the special injunction to all incorporated societies to comply with it, and accordingly the meeting was dissolved by a majority of votes. The people finding how grossly they had been imposed on in the affair, grew uneasy at the conduct of the artful insinuator, knowing that the next step would be that the New York Judges and Trustees in their Court convened at that blood stained star-chamber in Westminster would appoint some of their innisaries to supply the place of Trustees in the town according to the law of New York made and provided in that case as aforesaid, and of consequence to avoid the mischief intended a meeting was held on the 10th of June following at 4 of the clock in the afternoon at the house of Enoch Cook in said town previous to which an advertisement had been published by the Clerk exhibiting the articles hereafter acted on, viz: 1stly, After the meeting being opened the Moderator of the former meeting took his place in order to keep silence agreeable to the 1st article, the inhabitants voted to reconsider the vote of the former meeting for dissolving it, and to revise said meeting and 2dly chose Joseph Hildreth, Enoch Cook and Solomon Harvey Trustees for the year ensuing. 3dly, Thomas Clark as an assessor to be joined with the other two chosen at the former meeting, after which the meeting was adjourned, and to meet at any time or as occasion might require in the judgement of the Trustees, to consider of such business as might be thought sufficient for consideration, the response for a meeting of this nature seems to have been the threatening approach of New Yorks Tyranny which might require a more speedy meeting of the inhabitants than what could have been convened agreeable to the usual method.

A true record of the aforesaid proceedings.

Per SOLOMNN HARVEY, Town Clerk.

On the 18th of Oct. ADom 1774 Lieut, Leonard Spaulding of the town of Fulham Alias Dummerston was committed to the common goal for high treason against the British Tyrant George the third, by the direction of the infamous Crean Brush, his attorney and Noah Sabin William Willard and Ephraim Rana Esqrs. and Wm. Patterson the high Shreve and Benjamin Gorton and the infamous Bildad Eason his deputies upon which he upon the following day, viz: Oct. 29th a majority of the inhabitants meet near the house of Charles Davenport on the green and made choice of sundry persons to serve as a committee correspondency to join with other towns or respectable bodies of people, the better to secure and protect the rights and privileges of themselves and fellow creatures from the ravages and embarrassments of the British tyrant and his New York and other emmasaries. The persons made choice of were these, viz: Solomon Harvey, John Butler, Jonathan Knight, Josiah Boyden, Daniel Gates.

By whose vigilance and activity Mr. Spaulding was released from his confinement after about eleven days; the committee finding it necessary to be assisted by a large concourse of their freeborn neighbors and brethren consisting of the inhabitants of Dummerston, Putney, Guilford, Halifax and Draper, who discovered a patriotic zeal, and true heroic fortitude on the important occasion. The plain truth is that the sons of freedom whose patience was worn out with the inhuman insults of the imps of power, grew quite sick of diving after redress in a legal way and finding that the law was only made use of, for the emolument of its creatures and the innisaries of the British tyrant, resolved on an easier method and accordingly opened the goal without key or lock-picker, and after congratulating Mr. Spaulding upon the recovery of his freedom dispersed every man in peace to his respective home, or place of abode.

The foregoing is a true and short relation of that wicked affair of the New York cut-throatly Jacobitish, High Church Torietical minions of George the third, the pope of Canada and tyrant of Briton.

Per SOLOMON HARVEY, Town Clerk.

P. S.—Mr. Spaulding's pretended crime was that he threw out some words unfavourable to the British tyrant, relating to the Quebec bill by which he is made pope of that Government.

On February ye 3d the freeholders of Dummerston met at the house of Enoch

Cook in said town, at the hour of 2 in the afternoon agreeable to a legal advertisement for the purpose.

1stly. Made choice of Hosea Miller as Moderator.

2dly. Chose Solomon Harvey, and Richard Kelley to serve as delegates to set in Congress at Westminster on the 7th instant at the hour of ten in the forenoon.

3dly. Voted that the Courts of Common pleas be put by for a time. After which the meeting was adjourned to the 14th instant at 2 of the clock in the afternoon, in order to hear the report of the delegates after the rising of Congress.

HOSEA MILLER, Moderator.

Remarks of SOLOMON HARVEY
Town Clerk

I cannot conclude the records of the town regularly with regard to sundry proceedings toward the close of the year. I would cast no undue reflections but it may not be amiss to say that this year was the most remarkable ever known in this land, being a time of heart searching perplexity throughout all America the most poignant griefs and raging calamities seems to have raged in all parts, and in this neighborhood the affairs of a public nature wore the most disagreeable face.

The enemies of our land and of our temporal happiness exerted themselves in a very singular manner in order to create jealousies the most dangerous to societies and thereon to build the monstrous fabric of discord designed for our destruction. The worthy inhabitants of this town cannot after a moments reflection but be sensible of the artful insinuation of the inveterate enemies of the public affairs which so far succeeded notwithstanding my faithfulness and unshaken fidelity both to the town and country and mankind at large as rendered it necessary that I should resign all public offices among which that of Town Clerk. I resigned to John Scott your Constable to whom you are referred for the remainder of the Town records of the year A Dom 1775. Thus I conclude by subscribing myself the towns and all mankind's hearty and sincere friend.

SOLOMON HARVEY.

Soon after the charter of Fullum was granted, John Kathan who had resided in the limits of the town since the year 1752, united with a number of persons, purchased in conjunction with them, from the New Hampshire proprietors, a part of the township, and in the year 1754, according to his own account removed there "with his wife and seven or eight helpless children." Possessing the qualities of industry and perseverance—qualities especially necessary to the successful management of a new settlement, he addressed himself to his task and did "actually clear and improve above 120 acres, and built a good dwelling-house, barn and all necessary offices, and also a saw-mill and a potash works," and in order to guard his improvements was "at considerable expense in building a fort around his house" and was under the disagreeable necessity of residing therein during the course of a tedious and distressing war.

Joseph Temple of this town tradition says was saved in Westminster fight by the pewter basin in his knapsack.

Another brave man of the same township, John Hooker escaped with the loss of the soles of his boots which were raked off by a chance shot from the enemy. But the discomfort was only temporary; the art of the shoemaker was potent to restore the wanting portions, and the boots were afterwards worn by their owner with feelings of pride and satisfaction. Many a man more distinguished but less valient than Mr. John Hooker has in time of battle found safety in trusting to his soles, and that too, in a manner not one half as honorable.

RECORD RESUMED BY MR. MANSFIELD.

In accordance with the act of Congress, adopting the "non-importation, non-consumption, non-exportation association" on Oct. 20, 1774, the town held a meeting Nov. 28, 1774, and voted:

"that the assessors assess the town in a Discretionary Sum of money Sufficient to procure 100 weight of gun powder, 200 weight of Lead & 300 flints for the town use which was proposed to be procured with potash salts."

Josiah Boyden and Thomas Clark were chosen a committee to receive the salts and procure the articles above mentioned. In one of the articles of the "non-importation" &c act, was a recommendation that a committee should be chosen "in every county, city and town, by those qualified to vote for representatives in the Legislature, whose business it should be attentively to observe the conduct of all persons" in regard to measures adopted by the association. The advice conveyed in these words, though rejected by Westminster, was heeded by the patriotic people of Dummerston. The service implied was such as suited their temper. The subject was broached in town-meeting, Jan. 3, 1775, and several persons with Dr. Harvey at their head were chosen a "Committee of inspection to observe the "Conduct of the inhabitants agreeable to an order or recommendation of the Right Honorable Continental Congress." Under authority of this Committee, two of the town assessors were removed from their places, because they had refused to purchase the stock of ammunition which was to be paid for in "potash salts." From one man they took a gun because they suspected it contained a ball more friendly to the King than to the Congress.

By their decision, another man who had been prominent in the history of the village was declared unfit for office, and was not permitted to act in a public station, until by his conduct he evinced the spirit of a patriot. After the beginning of the Revolution, committees like these were to be found in almost every town throughout the New Hampshire Grants, but the people of Dummerston seem to have led the way in sustaining in Cumberland county (now Windham and Windsor counties) the efforts of Congress to guard against the manœuvres of inimical persons.

CAPT. JOHN KATHAN,

to whom in the year 1753, the township of Fullum was granted, unitedly with a number of other persons, purchased from New Hampshire proprietors, removed there with his family. He addressed himself with energy to his task and cleared and improved 120 acres on which he built a good dwelling-house and "all necessary offices, also a saw-mill and potash works," and in order to guard his improvements "was at considerable expense in building a fort round his house.

The first settler of Dummerston, as stated in the preceding records by the town clerk, performed good labors in the midst of great hardships and trials. Misfortune rendered his toil more severe. His eldest daughter, Mrs. Moore was taken captive by the Indians and he did not know her fate until she was returned from her captivity. The settlement, although much disturbed by the war, was not allowed to die, and a few years after the restoration of order, John Kathan and his eighteen associates, with their families were rapidly subduing the forests of Fullum, and accomplishing the conditions of their charter."

In addition to the town record account, the history of Captain Kathan, thus far given is from Hall's History of Eastern Vermont. For further information relative to him and his family, we are indebted to relatives of the Kathan family at the present time. Valuable information has been obtained from two Bibles; one containing the family record of Alexander Kathan, the other that of his father's family. Alexander's family Bible is now the property of a relative in Bangor, Me. It was printed in 1775. The Bible with the record of Captain John Kathan was printed in 1731, and is 148 years old. It is now the property of Charles C. Frost of Brattleboro. Both Bibles contain facts relative to the captivity of Mrs. Moore, a daughter, of Capt. John and sister of Alexander Kathan.

Capt. John Kathan came from England in the year 1729, and probably resided in Worcester, Mass. previous to his removal to Dummerston. He married a sister of Capt. Fairbank Moore. Their children were Alexander, b. Apr. 22, 1729, during the passage of his parents to America; Margaret, b. Oct. 6, 1730; John, b. Jan. 7, 1732, died June 3, 1802, aged, 70; Mary, b. Oct., 18, 1734, and married Col. John Sargeant, the first Anglo-Saxon child born in Vermont; the event is recorded in the old Bible as follows:

"tuesday ye 16 day of Dec. 1760, John Sargeant and Mary Kathan was married by Major Belles, (Bellows).

She was the mother of Eli Sargeant, the elder, who died at West River, Apr. 24, 1884, aged 73. Martha Kathan was born May 8, 1736, and married "July ye 22, of tuesday 1764 to Asa Holgait, By Samuel Stevens Esq."

DANIEL KATHAN was born Feb. 1, 1741 and married,

"tuesday May ye 6 day 1764, to Ruth Beret (Barrett) By Mr. Gay of Hinsdell."

Charles Kathan was born Mar. 26, 1743. These are the seven children that Capt. John Kathan had when he removed his family to Dummerston. They were not very "helpless" at that time, for the youngest was 9 years of age and the eldest 22 years. It is not certain that Alexander came here with the rest of the family. If he did, he must have returned to his home in Massachusetts, where he was married in 1755, and came back to this town in 1761.

John Kathan was present with his father in 1765, for John Kathan and John Kathan Jun., with nine other persons signed a memorial that year. (MSS. in the office of Sect. State Mass. LXXV. 547.) It was a complaint against Nathan Willard, in command of Fort Dummer. The record of Capt. Kathan's settlement in this town reads thus:

"June 5, 1752, John Kathan with his family Cam to settle at Bemas' rock on Conicut river in ye Government of New Hampshire eight miles from Fort Dummer."

This rock, which is near Putney depot, was named for Joseph Bemas, probably, a rather noted individual in this region at that time, and from whom sprang numerous families by that name.

The place is now called Kathan's ferry. The naming of rocks in the river appears for two objects: one as points for surveys of land, as deeds are in existence making these rocks as boundaries: The other as stopping places in voyages on the river to different military posts. Capt. John Kathan died Nov. 23, 1787, in the 81 st. year of his age. His wife, Martha (Moore) Kathan, died,

"22 of September 1766, of a monday night."

We read also, in the old Bible that on

"tuesday february ye 10, 767, Capt. John Kathan and the Widow Mary Wright maired at Springfield By the Rev. Mr Lotrop (Lothrop)."

"May 11, 1755, Margaret Kathan maired Benjamin Moors."

Although the captivity of Mrs. Moore is an incident in the early history of Brattleboro, it is mentioned thus briefly for the purpose of adding in connection what was recorded in the old Bibles of the Kathan family.

"Monday March ye 6, 1758, Capt. Moors with his son Benjamin were killed and Ben's Wife and two children were taken captives by the Indians."

After she had regained her liberty, we read in the same record:

"January 26, 1764, the widow Margaret Moors was maired to Moses Johnson by the reverent Mr. Gay of Hinsdell."

This passage explains what Alexander Kathan wrote in his Bible about the captivity of "sister Johnson" by the Indians. In the old Bible printed in 1761, we find the earliest date of births in Dummerston.

"Mar. ye 5, 1761, thursday Mary Kathan or Mary Sargent wife of John Sargent; her first child a son was born in fullom (Fullum) and province of New Hampshire. His name was Eli Sargent. He died Apr. 24, 1834, aged 73 years."

The second family that moved into Dummerston was that of

son of John Kathan who came to America in 1729. He was born Apr. 22, 1729, during the passage of his parents to this country. Margaret Baird, his wife, was born Aug. 21, 1732. They were married, Dec. 4, 1755, by Rev. Mr. Roberts of Leicester. Their children were Mary, b, Oct. 8, 1756, married Elihu Sargent, died Dec. 18, 1850; John, b.

Oct. 12, 1758, died Apr. 10, 1833, aged 74; Daniel, b. Oct. 15, 1760, married Olive Lamb, died Sept. 10, 1804, Olive his wife died Jan. 23, 1803; Thomas, born in Dummerston Apr. 30, 1764, died July 15, 1838; Elisabeth, born Dec. 25, 1767, died Jan. 13, 1828.

"I, Alexander Kathan, arrived in Fulham May 1, 1761, with my family from Worcester. Nov. 16, 1762, moved into my log-house. Nov. 6, 1783, moved into my new house west side the road."

It was, probably, not the first framed house built in town, as stated in another place. Alexander Kathan died Feb. 14, 1825, aged 95 yrs. 6 mos.; Margaret, his first wife, died July 14, 1803.

He married after her death, Dec. 31, 1806, Mrs. Mary Hart Davenport, who died June 22, 1830, aged 98 yrs. 3 mos. Alexander's mother died Sept. 22, 1766.

His father died Nov. 23, 1787. His wife's father, Mr. Baird, died May 3, 1782. John died June 3, 1802. His brother Charles resided in Putney where he built a house in the year 1768, "on the spot where Mrs. McLellan lives [1825] near Dr. Campbell's." As a military man, his rank was Lieut. Colonel. He died May 22, 1793, aged 50 years. His brother, Lieut. Daniel Kathan died Oct. 17, 1807, aged 67 yrs. Daniel's wife, Ruth Barrett, died Aug. 3, 1802, aged 57. Alexander's family Bible has the following information recorded:

"Mercy Baird died Apr. 23, 1790.

"Hosea Beckley, ordained minister in Dummerston Mar. 2, 1808; Court stopped at Westminster March 13, 1775;

"Sister Johnson was taken by the Indians, carried to Canada Mar. 6, 1758, and was redeemed by Gen. Schuyler in the fall. She died Oct. 18, 1779, up at the lake."

Also, we read in the same record that Alexander Kathan and wife joined the church in Dummerston, Mar. 11, 1787.

Religious sentiments and counsel for his family are written on several pages of this old Bible and many texts of scripture from which he had heard sermons preached by Rev. Aaron Crosby.

The first three settlers located, not on the high lands, as many have done in early settlements, but on the forest plains near the Connecticut. Capt. John Kathan, Alexander Kathan and Daniel Kathan built their log-houses near to the three principal brooks that flow into the Connecticut river in the east part of the town.

Capt. John Kathan settled near the brook north of Putney depot on land then a part of Dummerston; Alexander, near Canoe brook, and Daniel not far from Salmon brook. These families came from Worcester, Mass. Alexander kept a memorandum in almanacs for each year, of principal events in his farming business and other matters worthy of note. These almanacs were kept in file by stringing them on a leathern thong, and are now in possession of his descendants; some forty in number are in possession of a family in this town.

The earliest of these almanacs is for the year 1764, and the numbers are complete down to the year 1817, except 1795 and 1814. The oldest ones are the almanacs published by Nathaniel Low. Most of the file from 1781, are the almanacs of Isaiah Thomas. Mr. Kathan was in the habit of noting on the margin of these almanacs important events relating to his business and other affairs. Here are a few items in reference to the making of sugar:

"March 19, 1764, tapped trees, made 21 lbs. of molasses."

February 1765, tapped trees, and sugared off 18 pounds on the 26th."

"Apr. 6, 1778, made off, 10 lbs. of sugar; that's the first this season."

Here we find the date when the first meeting-house in town was raised.

"November 10th 1773, raised the meeting house."

"May 19th, 1780, remarkable dark day."

"April 5th 1781, a man and a horse crossed the river on the ice."

"The 2d Sabbath in the same month snow was knee deep in the field and solid."

"1785, snow 1st day of April, 34 inches deep on a level."

"19th, old snow knee deep, new snow."

"May 26th, put in seine and catch no shad."

"May 30, catch shad."

"March 31st. 1786, no snow."

"2d day of April, terrible storm of wind, and snow fell knee deep."

"17th. began to plow."

"March 29th. 1787, burnt out the bass-wood stub and scart out two flying squirrels."

"May 10th. 1788, the mountains covered with snow."

"Aug. 19th. a hurricane."

"March, 1803, what a sight of pigeons did fly all the 13th."

"June 6th. 1804, set tobacco."

"Aug. 29th. cut up tobacco."

"Mrs. Kathan sea a robin on the 9th of February, Robins here seen till the 17th."

"March 5th, sea two robins."

"July 12th. had string beans."

"the 22d, had new tatoss."

"February 1811, killed 110 rats in the corn house in one day."

Alexander cleared a piece of plain land thickly overgrown with old pines, on which he planted corn at one time, but the tall over-shadowing pines prevented his securing anything but a harvest of fodder. The first apple trees grown in town, he brought from Worcester, three in number, and set out on his farm. The kind of apples which these bore was called "cotton wool." The last one of the old trees stood till the year 1869, on land just north of the barn on "the old Kathan place." Mr. Kathan went to Deerfield, Mass. during the first years of his settlement, to get his corn ground. The first record of a grist-mill in Dummerston was Nov. 23, 1772, at which time the settlers voted "that the road be accepted from the meeting-house (lot) by the corner of Hosea Miller's lot, so on the south line of said Miller's lot to the Salmon brook, over the brooks down on the north side of said brook, to the Corn Mill thence to John Kilbury's thence to the great road on the south side of Daniel Kathan's barn."

On one occasion when Alexander Kathan was returning from Worcester or Deerfield, guided on his way by marked trees, a dark object appeared in his path not far in front of him. It was evening and near his home. Not being able, on account of the darkness to recognize what it was that obstructed his pathway, and not daring to risk too much by a nearer approach, he fired his gun and the dark object glided away into the forest. In the morning he returned in company with others to the scene of his adventure, and finding traces of blood followed the trail to a swamp, now south of the old burying ground near Oscar F. Bennett's, they discovered a dead bear. Bears were plenty in this town in those days, and frequently the family were kept awake during the night time by the howling of wolves near the sheep-pens where they were often seen standing on their hind feet with their paws resting against the pen, and barking furiously. Some idea of the dense growth of the forest trees and under-brush in those times may be had from the fact that one of Mr. Kathan's little children was lost for a short time in the woods only a few rods from the house, having been sent out by their mother to call their father to dinner.

The first house he lived in was built of round logs, the second one, of hewn logs. The third building was framed, and may have been the first framed house built in town. The old house was remodeled many years ago and the carpenter who helped do the work says, that the old roof was taken off, another story added, and what is now quite a good looking, two-story, white house was once the habitation of the second family that settled in Dummerston. By good fortune this building escaped destruction in Aug. 1843. A violent whirlwind or hurricane that prostrated several acres of forest trees on the hills west of the buildings, swept down across the plain, leveling the trees in its path, making a direct route towards the house around which it made a sudden turn in serpentine course, shaking up the stately old elms furiously, and spending its force not far to the eastward. The oldest sugar lot in town stands on this farm. Only thirty-one of the old monarchs of the forest are now standing, the largest of which measures 17 1-2 feet in circumference.

A grand-son of Alexander Kathan cut down in 1858, or 1859, one of the large trees in this old lot, and while working it up, the number of rings made by the annual growth from the place where the deepest incision was made in "boxing" the trees, were counted and found to be nearly one hundred.

In boxing the trees for sap to run, a place or groove was cut with an axe, instead of boring with a bit, as the custom is at the present day. With the aid of an iron gouge a place was made to receive the wooden spout. The sap was caught in bass-wood troughs. A section of wood from one of these old trees has been preserved. It shows the marks of three instances of boxing in perpendicular line, the central scar being in the form of the letter Y.

A great grandson of Alexander Kathan named Horace, 10 years old, was scalded with hot sugar so that he died, 9 days after the accident, Mar. 8, 1833.

He was helping his father take off a kettle of hot sugar. The leg of the kettle caught on the side of the arch, and tipped the contents upon the boy. His father caught him up and dipped him into a tub of cold sap which relieved him of agony a short time, but was not effectual in saving his life.

An incident relating to John Kathan, Jr. is given in Hall's History. In 1779, he refused to serve in the Vermont militia. June 17, of that year, John Kathan and Benjamin Jones, Jr. both of Dummerston, were informed by an officer that they were required to do military duty. On their refusal to comply, being subjects of New York, the officer took a cow from each and sold one of them at auction, and retained the other for the use of the state." Ezra Robinson and Ephraim Rice, also, of this town had cattle sold in the same manner because they refused to pay or serve in the militia. Children of:

Silas Butler, who married Sally McFarland, Jan. 25, 1816, is said to have owned the old tannery property, located south of Lt. Kathan's residence. The old building and well-sweep were standing in 1832, perhaps later than that date.

A portion of the old tannery-building was occupied for a dwelling. The old millstone, used in the bark mill, that lay imbedded in the earth many years, was recently removed, and now forms a part of the covering on a large water-course built 3 years ago on the Haven place.

FIRST BURIALS.

The first burials in town were made in the old grave-yard, formerly in Dummerston, now in Putney, about 40 rods northwest from the railroad station. In 1873, seventeen old gravestones were left standing in the yard, and at the present time only nine remain. The rest have been broken down and trampled in pieces by cattle. The grave of Capt. John Kathan, the first settler in Dummerston, is, therefore, left unmarked. Quite a number of the first settlers must have been buried in that yard; for in making the excavation for a cellar on its site a few years ago, seven bodies or skeletons were found, and the owner of the land states that his horses sometimes step into soft places where graves were dug.

Thus ends the record of the births, marriages and deaths in the first three families in town.

The following inscription was taken from one of the old grave-stones left standing in that cemetery of olden time.

"In memory

Colonel Charles Kathan he Died May 22 1793 in

The 51st year of his age

Time was I stood where thou doest now

And viewed the dead as thou dost me

Ere long thoult lie as low as I

And others stand and look on thee"

From the first settlement in 1752, down to the present time, families by the name of Kathan have been residents of this town. The last person, but one, who died here in the year 1883, was John Kathan, whose death occurred Dec. 7th. He was born in Dummerston, Mar. 23, 1833, and was great-great grandson of the first settler.

MARGARET (KATHAN) MOORE,

the eldest daughter of Capt. John and Martha Moore Kathan, was born, Oct. 6, 1730, probably in Worcester, Mass. She was married to Benjamin Moore, son of Capt. Fairbank Moore, May 11, 1755, and in less than three years after was taken prisoner by the Indians who broke into the house of Capt. Moore, her father-in-law, with whom she and her husband resided, at midnight Mar. 6, 1758, and killed her husband and the Captain, his father. She, startled from sleep by the terrible war-whoop of the savages, sprang from her bed and while the fierce attack was going on below, hurriedly dressing herself and her children escaped from the house. It was in the middle of the night, dark and cold. Not knowing what she did in her fright she had pulled on in dressing two pair of long woolen stockings that proved of good service now and it probably saved her life. She took a sled-road for the woods, that her husband had broke the day before to draw wood. With her two children, the youngest a babe of but three weeks old, she was soon overtaken by 'the Indians, who as soon as it was light discovered her footsteps in the snow. They took both of her children from her at first but soon returned her babe to her which they allowed her to carry; and they led or carried the oldest child that was but little over two years old. During the night the Indians finding in the house some beans and tallow, cooked the beans in about 20 pounds of tallow and put them up in bags for provision on the way; upon this they subsisted, traveling on foot to Fort Ticonderoga, which they reached on the tenth day from their departure; having crossed the Green Mountains in the most inclement season of the year; and from Ticonderoga they were taken by boat to Montreal in Canada, where Mrs. Moore and her children remained in captivity for two and a half years; her father's family in Dummerston, not knowing her fate till she was returned to them;—Col. Peter Schuyler having "paid a ransom of four hundred livres ($74) for her redemption from captivity."

She came back to her friends in 1762, and was married to Moses Johnson, Jan. 26, 1764, d. "up the Lake", 1779.

In her after life, it is said, she never reverted to her captivity unless first it was mentioned to her. The reason she gave for it was, during that time she suffered so much that it was painful to remember it.

At the time of the massacre, Capt. Fairbank Moore and his son lived upon the farm comprising the meadows now owned by the Insane Asylum proprietors, just north of that institution. They were killed in a skirmish, and also several Indians whose bones, have been exhumed from time to time by plowing and digging on these premises—supposed to have been their remains.

After the death of Capt. Moore, the above farm was purchased by Major John Arms. After his death which was by the kick of a horse, his son, Josiah kept the inn on the place, which was a favorite stopping place for Ethan Allen and the Bradleys in their day. Major John was the father of Captain John Arms whose children were Josiah, John, Alfred, (Doctor) Willard, and William Arms of Dummerston. We are indebted to the Vermont Phoenix, 1876 for some of these particulars last mentioned. Mr. Hall says that Hoyt, the author of Hoyt's Indian Wars, notices this transaction as having occurred in the month of September; another account says February, Hoyt locates Mr. Moore's residence in Hinsdale, another account near Fort Dummer. The relation given in the text is, however, believed to be correct. The farm on which Mr. Moore lived, is now occupied by Newman Allen Esq. To an account of this transaction, which appeared in the columns of the "Vermont Phoenix" in the year 1849, is appended the following note;

"Mr. Moore and his son alluded to above as having fallen victims to the Indians, are supposed to have been buried near the side of their log-house which was burnt. On Monday last, bones believed to have been theirs were found in Mr. Allen's barn-yard, covered with about one foot of earth and a board over them, but apparently no coffin or box around them. One of the skulls contained an ounce bullet, which was undoubtedly the cause of death."

[The apology made once or twice in these Kathan family papers, as, in the John Sargeant papers following;—for introducing matters of history that occurred on ground in Brattleboro, is handsome in the author, but scarcely needed; not only, as Brattleboro papers sent for publication in this work do not include this new and interesting information, but also as Mrs. Benjamin Moore and Mrs. John Sargeant belong certainly to the Kathan family, the two oldest daughters of old Capt. John Kathan. Margaret Kathan and Mary Kathan, both having been raised and having lived here until their marriage, and Mary, probably having been born here; and as the eldest daughters of the first settler, the first young women who lived in the town, could not well be spared from the Dummerston record of "ye olden time." Ed.]

was the first Anglo Saxon child born in Vermont. We write about this family because John Sargeant married Mary Kathan of Dummerston, daughter of Capt John Kathan. Their first child was born in this town Mar. 5, 1761. His brother Rufus was a resident of the town and bought his land of the proprietary in 1770. It is recorded in history, that Thomas Sargeant, a brother of Rufus, was a resident of Fullum. One Thomas Sargeant of Brattleboro bought a farm in Dummerston in 1793.

The earliest account we have of the family begins with Digory Sargeant who was born in Sudbury, Mass. The first name is spelled Dickery in Barber's Historical Collections of Massachusetts. He was one of the early settlers of Worcester, and in company with John Wing, George Danson, Peter Goulding and Jacob Leonard began a settlement there in 1685. The town had been previously settled by a few families in 1665, when six or seven houses were built, but soon deserted on account of Indian hostilities in connection with King Philip's war which raged at that time. From the time of the second settlement in 1685, when the whites returned with Mr. Sargeant and others, the settlers prospered well till 1701, when the Indians resumed hostilities on the frontier towns, and Worcester was again depopulated. All the settlers fled except Mr. Sargeant and his family. He determined to remain and brave the dangers of the Indian foe. He was not molested till 1703, or '04. The following particulars of his death are preserved. When the Indians surrounded his house, Sargeant, seized his gun to defend himself. As he was retreating to the staircase, he was shot down by the savages. Upon this, they rushed into the house and completed the work of death with their tomahawks and tore off his scalp. They seized his wife and five children and began a rapid retreat westward. Mrs. Sargeant overcome with grief and fatigue impeded their progress. As they were ascending the Tataasset or Tatnick hills, a chief stepped out of the file, and while pretending to be looking for game, came up behind Mrs. Sargeant in an unsuspecting moment and deprived his sinking captive of life at a single blow. The children were taken to Canada, where they remained a long time before they were redeemed by their friends. It appears from one record that Mr. Sargeant was twice married. His second wife was sister of George Parmenter of Sudbury. Martha was the eldest of his five children. She was born before 1699, and married Daniel Shattuck of Worcester, Apr. 16, 1719. She died in 1722. The other children were: John, Daniel, Thomas and Mary. Daniel and Mary never returned from captivity, but remained with their captors and adopted the habits and manners of the Indians. Thomas resided in Boston in 1715. John, his brother, had an eventful life. After his return from captivity, he entered the service of the province. During the old French and Indian war, he was a soldier at Fort Dummer. He was a lieutenant, and both his name and that of his son, Daniel appear on Capt. Josiah Willard's company roll, dated

Feb. 12, 1748. Lieut. John Sargeant, his son, Daniel, Moses Cooper, Joshua Wells and one other soldier started Mar. 29, 1748, from Fort Dummer down the scout path to Colrain, for oars and paddles. When a little more than a mile from the fort, they were fired upon by an ambush of 12 or 15 Indians. Moses Cooper was mortally wounded at the first fire, but managed with the help of a comrade to reach the fort. Lieut. Sargeant with the others retreated slowly, firing as they went. The woods were thick and the savages well covered. Wells was soon killed. The Lieutenant encouraged his son with the assurance that help would be sent from the fort; dared the skulking enemy to come out and fight like men, and firing as often as an Indian showed himself. When near the fort, Lieut. Sargeant was killed and his son was taken captive. The next day a company of seven men from Northfield under Capt. Ebenezer Alexander went up to fort Dummer, and found and buried the Lieutenant and his comrade. His grave was probably in sight of the fort. In a petition to the General Court, dated Nov. 29, 1738, asking for a grant of land, he says:

"About the beginning of Queen Anne's war yr Petitioner's father [Digory Sargeant] then [1704] living in Worcester, had the misfortune with your petitioner's mother and one brother to be killed by the Indian enemy: At which time yr petitioner with 5 brothers, and sisters were taken into captivity where yr petitioner remained 12 or 13 years.

When Inclined to go home met with great opposition as well from the papists as Indians: yet he came home and was at the sole cost of his redemption: That upon his arrival into his native country, he was put into the service under Capt. Kellogg, [and after under Capt. Willard] and so remains to this time: That he has been three times to Canada in the service of the Province since his redemption, and when the Truck-house [one of the small houses in the stockade] was burnt in 1737, he lost greatly."

A grant of 200 acres of land above Northfield was made to him by the legislature. The land appears to have been laid out at the lower end of Fort Dummer meadow. He built a house on this grant where he and his family lived at the time of his death. His age was about 54 years. In 1763, his widow, Abigail Sargeant and the other heirs sold the estate to Capt. Samael Hunt of Northfield. It is described in the deed as "161 acres with buildings thereon, which was a grant to the proprietors of Lunenburg in 1731."

The wife of Lieut. Sargeant was Abigail Jones of Springfield, Mass. They were married July 4, 1727. Their children were:

Daniel, b. Mar. 25, 1728. m. Dinah Jones of Springfield, Mass., July 20, 1751:

Abigail, b. Jan. 1730;

John, b. 1732, at Fort Dummer; the first English child born in Vermont, m. "tuesday ye 16 day of Dec. 1760. Mary Kathan, by Major Belles (Bel-lows)" died July 30, 1793;

Thomas, b. about 1734; lived at Fort Dummer, and Fullun; married, May 17, 1757, Anna, dau. of Joseph Stebbins, of Northfield, Mass.

Mary, born 1742;

Rufus, b. 1740; married about 1774, Susanna ———; died Nov. 23, 1826.

The children of Col. John Sargeant were:

Eli, born Mar. 5, 1761, "in Fullun" [Dummerston].

Levi, m. Lydia Daily;

Lucy, wife of Isaac Bigelow;

Abigail, wife of Robert Wells, and Mary, alias Polly.

The children of Thomas Sargeant and Anna Stebbins, his wife were:

Elisha, b. May 3, 1758;

Anna, b. June 18, 1760.

The children of Rufus Sargeant and his wife, Susanna, were John, Sally, Rufus and Susanna. A daughter of Rufus Sargeant, Jr. married James H Sargeant of Brattleboro, who now lives on the site of the house built by Col. John.

Col. Sargeant was captain of a company in the Lower Regiment "of Vt. in 1776, and was commissioned Lt. Col. of the Southern Regiment, Aug. 18, 1778."

His father had a brother James, and they together, purchased all the land in Brattleboro, lying between West and Connecticut rivers or what is now in that town, called West River. On account of the Indians, it was not deemed prudent to build and occupy, so they with their families took refuge in Fort Dummer, which was on the site of the present residence of Simon Brooks.

This brother James was the father of Thomas Sargeant, who was the father of Elihu, Calvin, Thomas and Luther. The two former living and dying at West River. Elihu was born May 3, 1758 and died, Dec. 1, 1833.

A writer of "historical notes" in the Vermont Phoenix Mar. 31, 1876, says that Col. John Sargeant built about 1762, a large, two-story, gambrel-roof house on the site of the present residence of James H. Sargeant, which became a noted rendezvous for the neighborhood, and also for entertainment for travellers and officers of military posts up and down the river. They were greatly annoyed by the Indians, and the inhabitants had many dangers and hairbreadth escapes to relate.

At the time the Colonel's house was building, his wife was living with her father, John Kathan, in Dummerston, where her first child, Eli was born. Eli and his brother, Levi, lived to an advanced age, and died on farms comprised in the foregoing purchase. Mary, a maiden sister, lived and died on the old homestead. Col. Sargeant was a distant relative of Mrs. Jemima Howe, afterwards Mrs. Tute, who was captured June 27, 1755, by the Indians at Fort Bridgman on Vernon meadow, a short distance below Fort Dummer. It appears in the record that Mr. Sargeant was married by Major Bellows, who was doubtless, Col. Benjamin Bellows of Walpole, N. H. His sister, Juda, married Capt. Fairbank Moore, killed by the Indians in Brattleboro, Mar. 6, 1758. She was born in 1708, and her brother, Col. Bellows, in 1715. Capt. Moore had two children, Fairbank and Benjamin. Fairbank married Esther Kathan, who was admitted to the church in Northfield, Mass., Nov. 28, 1756. He lived with his family in Putney, 1768, on what was known in 1825, as the Timothy Underwood place. It is recorded that a family by the name of Fairbank Moore lived in Walpole, N. H., in 1759. Benjamin Moore married Margaret Kathan, sister of Mary, the wife of Col. Sargeant, whose marriage was performed by Major Bellows. The statement is made in Northfield history by Sheldon and Temple, that Esther, wife of Fairbank Moore, Jr., was a daughter of Capt. John Kathan, but her name is not given in the family record in the old Sargeant Bible. The three sisters, as there recorded, are Margaret, born 1730, Mary, born 1734, and Martha, wife of Asa Holgait, born 1736. Their mother was sister of Capt. Fairbank Moore. Colonel Sargeant died at West River in Brattleboro, and was buried in the cemetery near his home. On the stone at the head of his grave, it reads thus:

*"Sacred to the memory of
who departed this life July 30, 1798, in the 66th year of his age*

Who now lies in the same town in which he was born, and was the first white man born in the state of Vermont."

His eldest child, Eli, the first child born in Dummerston, died at West River in Brattleboro, Apr. 24, 1834, Æ 73.

His wife was Elizabeth Gurton.

LIEUT. LEONARD SPAULD- ING,

who was the first representative to the Vermont Legislature, chosen from this town, was a resident of Dummerston, Nov. 23, 1772, when with two other persons he was chosen to draw a plan of the first meeting-house built in this town. From an old account-book it appears he was in Westmoreland, N. H., at work on a farm in May, 1772, which he bought of Abner Howe. He was a resident of Putney in the summer of 1771, where he had lived six years and perhaps, longer. In his old account-book, minus 19 pages, he charged under date March, 1766:

"Mikel Law to a quart of rum and mug of flip."

Lt. Spaulding settled in Putney soon after the close of the French and Indian war, during which he served as soldier. He made a clearing on the plane east of Putney village, now known as the Dea Jones farm. When cutting the timber he left the trunk of the largest tree higher than the rest and with his axe leveled and smoothed the top as much as he could. The log house was so built that the stump was in the centre of the room and served for a table till he could get time to make one, after removing his family from Westford, where they lived during his absence, in the French and Indian war. The ground answered for a floor to his cabin. A rustic bed, made of stakes and poles, overspread with hemlock boughs, served for a couch on which to sleep until his goods should arrive. When the new home was ready for the reception of his family, the Lieutenant returned to Connecticut and removed in the early spring to Vermont. He and one child, his wife and another rode on horseback. Thomas Love, his wife's brother, with three more of the children followed, driving the ox team and cart, loaded with a small amount of furniture and clothing.

According to the age of the fifth child, it would be in the spring of 1764, that his family came to Putney. The charges in the old account book show that the Lieutenant was not only a farmer, but also a carpenter and trader to some extent. He bought and sold many articles usually kept in a country store.

Numerous charges are made against customers for rum, flip and occasionally a "pot of syder." From 1766 to 1771, the following names of persons living in Putney are found on the book: Mikel Law, Samuel Allen, Jacob Thompson, Ichabod Gary, Andrew Mc Adam, Nehemiah Howe, Jethro Brown, Samuel Skinner, Joshua Parker, Lt. Edward Howe, William Winan, Mr. Hale, Benjamin Hutchins, R. Robens, Mr. Hartwell, Samuel Morse, Abraham Carly, Aaron Alexander, Lt. Benjamin Whitcomb, John Cole, Elijah Temple, John Scott, Leon'd Keep, Mr. Sawyer, Capt. Aaron Brown, Aaron Gary, Jona. Moore, Daniel Pearce, Daniel Whipple, Judge Lord.

Spaulding's house was burned, probably in the fall of 1771. He did not rebuild, but bought a farm in Westmoreland N. H., where he remained less than a year, and removed to Dummerston, bought a farm; built a log-house and some years after a framed dwelling now standing. The place is now owned and occupied by George Warwick.

Lt. Spaulding was the first man here, to start with his gun for the fight at Westminster, Mar. 13, 1775. He was knocked down and wounded in that skirmish. He immediately joined the army and continued in the service much of the time during the Revolutionary war. His wife and sons, Reuben and Leonard jr. managed the farm during his absence, yet he came home quite often on furlough. He was in the battle of Bennington [1777]. The day it was fought, his wife, who was in the garden gathering vegetables for dinner, heard distinctly the sound of the roaring cannon, nearly forty miles away. Others in her neighborhood heard the same noise and called it distant thunder; and no one thought differently until the news of the battle came.

Mrs. Spaulding was afraid of wild animals, and one night when her husband was absent from home, a bear came and tried to drive away the hog, which naturally refused to go. The squealing of the hog awakened the family; and the boys with the aid of a dog and burning torches, drove the bear away and rescued the future meat of the family.

It is related of Mrs. Spaulding that she went on horseback, alone, every two years to visit her aged mother in Providence, R. I. as long as she lived, who died at the advanced age of nearly a hundred years. When returning from one of those visits she brought home a small willow stick, used on the way for a riding-whip and stuck it into the ground where it was moist; and it grew to be a large tree; said to be the first of its kind in this town.

Mr. Spaulding held a lieutenant's commission, not only in the French and Indian war, but, also, in the Revolutionary war. He was wounded in the battle of White Plains, Oct. 28, 1776, in the thigh, by a ball which remained in his leg as long as he lived; and was troublesome at times.

Lieut. Leonard Spaulding, for his service in the war of 1776, he received a grant lying west of Lake Champlain in New York state. His commission and other papers showing evidence of service in the war were kept in the family many years; but Timothy Spaulding, a grand-son of Lieut. Spaulding, getting the impression he could secure a pension for the heirs, all of the papers were given up to him by Mrs. Anna (Spaulding) Laughton. He removed soon after to the West, where he died before an application was made to the government and the papers were never returned to the family.

Leonard Spaulding married, Mar. 5, 1756, Margaret, daughter of John and Elizabeth (Sprague) Love of Providence R. I. Her brother, Thos. Love, settled in Pownal, but removed to Bennington. The maiden name of Spaulding's mother was Persis Prescott. Joanna Spaulding was a sister of Lt. Leonard. She married Jesse Frost of Brattleboro and lived in what forms the ell-part of the house in which Dr. S. N. Bemis of that town now lives. She was born Mar. 29, 1739, died Nov. 1834, Æ 95 years, and was buried in the cemetery west of her residence.

Josiah and Samuel Spaulding were brothers, probably, of the Lieutenant.

They were with him at Crown Point in 1758. Jonathan Spaulding may also, have been his brother. The family were tall, strong looking persons; and it is said the sons of the Lieutenant were over six feet in height; the tallest one six feet seven inches.

The children of Lt. Leonard and Margaret Spaulding were:

Reuben, b. Nov. 19, 1756, m. ——— Gates, died, Jan. 20, 1794;

Betsey, b. June 22, 1758, m. Henry Stevens, Dec. 19, 1779, died Feb. 2, 1790;

Leonard Jr., b. Mar. 14, 1760, m. Priscilla Gleason, Dec. 9, 1779, d. Sept. 3, 1792;

Mary, b. Oct. 11, 1761, m. David Laughton, died May 12, 1782;

Sarah, b. July 19, 1763, m. Charles Wilder, Oct. 27, 1782;

Timothy and John, (twins) b. May 13, 1765, d. June 13, 1785, and Mar. 26, 1793;

Anna, b. Apr. 7, 1767, m. Samuel Laughton, Dec. 14, 1786, died, Jan. 13, 1849;

Esther b. Apr. 1767, d. July 1783;

Josiah, b. Mar. 30, 1771, m. Eunice Skinner, d. Dec. 3, 1798;

Olive, b. Oct. 17, 1773, m. 1st. David Wilson, Feb. 17, 1798; 2d. Daniel Mixer of Brattleboro.

Lt. Spaulding was born Oct. 28, 1728 and died of consumption July 17, 1788 $\text{\AA}$ 59, in a house which he built, now standing on George Warwick's farm.

He was buried at his own request in the grave-yard east of the Hollow, because, at that time, the cemetery where his children were buried was wet ground. No stone marks his resting place. Margaret, his wife, resided with her son, Josiah, on the home farm till his death when she went to West Dummerston after her farm was sold, and lived near her daughter, Mrs. Anna Laughton, where she died May 1, 1827, $\text{\AA}$. 94. Her grave is beside that of Mrs. Anna Laughton, who died Jan. 31, 1849, and no gravestone marks the place.

When Anna Spaulding was married, she wore a linen muslin dress of her own manufacture. She selected the nicest flax, hatched, carded and spun the same into a thread so fine that each skein consisting of fourteen knots, could be drawn through her open thimble. The dress was woven, cut and made by herself, and in texture resembled silk.

Josiah and Eunice Spaulding's children were Polly, born 1793; Timothy, Betsey, and John.

Leonard and Priscilla Spaulding were the parents of Thomas, b. Oct. 19, 1780, Leonard, 3d. Adam, John, William, and Squire, b. May 12, 1790.

Leonard (3d.) married Sally Fuller, of Putney. She was a sister of Mrs. Alvin Knapp. Their children, so far as known, were Rinda, who married Dec. 1, 1880, Asa Baldwin; Amy, married John Cudworth of Putney, and Priscilla married a Howe; Arba married 1st. Emeline, daughter of Benjamin Estabrook, 2d. Margaret Boyden, sister of Mrs. Electa (Boyden) Bemis. Harriet married Samuel Wilder; Charles; Alvin; Lovina; Lucina.

Children by the first marriage were: Clarissa E., Benjamin A.; 2d. marriage, Hoyt T., Anna, Nellie. Clarissa E. married Ransom C. Farr of Chesterfield, N. H.; Hoyt T. married Ella Mason. The parents and the other three children are not living.

Lieutenant is the title given on the town records; but on the grave-stones of his children, the inscription is Capt. Leonard Spaulding. He was a citizen of the town when it was organized.

The place where he settled and cleared the land was about 2 miles north of the meeting-house and long known as Spaulding's Hill. He was a prominent and capable man in business affairs and in continual service for the town until the year 1788, when he was unable on account of sickness, to act as one of the committee in finishing the building of pews in the meeting-house. July 2d., 1788 :

"the town met and chose Thomas Clark in lieu of Lt. Spaulding who is unable to act."

He deeded his farm to his son, Josiah, June 3, 1778. He also, deeded fifty acres to his son, John, June 23, 1778.

In the deed to Josiah, provision was made for Margaret, wife of Captain Spaulding; also, for Mrs. Betsey Stevens, Mrs. Sarah Wilder, Mrs. Anna Laughton, and Olive Spaulding, his daughter. He was then near his end with consumption.

Although the children of Lt. Spaulding, especially the sons, became large, muscular persons, all but one or two, died under 40 years of age of consumption, and their sickness was brief.

It is related by those who remember the circumstance; after six or seven of the family had died of consumption, another daughter was taken, it was supposed, with the same disease. It was thought she would die, and much was said in regard to so many of the family's dying of consumption when they all seemed to have the appearance of good health and long life. Among the superstitions of those days, we find it was said that a vine or root of some kind grew from coffin to coffin, of those of one family, who died of consumption, and were buried side by side; and when the growing vine had reached the coffin of the last one buried, another one of the family would die; the only way to destroy the influence or effect, was to break the vine; take up the body of the last one buried and burn the vitals, which would be an effectual remedy: Accordingly, the body of the last one, buried was dug up and the vitals taken out and burned, and the daughter, it is affirmed, got well and lived many years. The act, doubtless, raised her mind from a state of despondency to hopefulness.

"Hall's History of Eastern Vermont" gives us much of the following information In a *sermon preached by Rev. E. D. Andrews, on Fast day, 1825, he states that Leonard Spaulding in 1768, lived near where B. Reynold's resided in 1825. At the June term of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas in 1771, one Jonas Moore of Putney recovered judgment against Leonard Spaulding, of the same place, to the amount of forty pounds, including costs. A fiery facias having issued to satisfy the judgment the sheriff by his deputy seized some of Spaulding's effects and placed them in the charge of Moore, who was to keep them at his house until the day appointed by the sheriff for the sale.

Meantime, the 27th. of Jan. 1772, seventy or eighty men crossed from New Hampshire over Connecticut river and going in the evening to the house where the goods were deposited, broke open the door, seized upon and carried them away, and insulted Moore's family at the same time, "various ways."

This affair was owing to the enmity which existed between the supporters of the jurisdiction of New York and the favorers of the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. (For account of his imprisonment at Westminster, see record report by the town clerk.)

In 1776, the "Committee of Safety" cited the doughty old soldier of Dummerston to answer or "make suitable Confession to this Committee for his conduct in Taking Colonel Wells by military force; that mode of proceeding Being Contrary to the minds of this Committee, and also a Violation of a Certain Resolvc., formerly passed by this Committee."

*Preached at Putney. See Putney, this vol.

To this resolution is appended the following note: "Spaulding comply'd with the above Vote by making proper Confession, &c." Polite and valient, his apologies were ample, and the complaint was dismissed. This incident was copied from the records of the Committee of Safety for Cumberland County, July 25th. at which time Lieutenant Spaulding, a most patriotic citizen of Dummerston, was a member. The committee noticed the matter in order to wipe out the disgrace which had been cast upon them by the unwarrented act of the fiery Dummerstonian. Jacob Laughton, who was a cotemporary with Dr. Harvey, says, Mr. Hall in his History, in a conversation with him in 1857, said Lt. Spaulding was a resolute man and that when he was committed to the jail at Westminster, it took three or four Yorkers to conquer him.

Nearly one half the journal was used to keep accounts with the soldiers and from the kind of articles sold to them it is inferred that Lt. Spaulding sold sutler's stores. From these pages the following names of soldiers have been selected and may be valuable for reference:

Joseph Hartwell, Daniel Duglas, Jonathan Sheple, Leonard Parker, Oliver Parker, Silas Kent, Natha'n Lakin, Joseph Page, Nathaniel Parker, Thomas Scott, John Chamberlen, Benj. Nutting, Daniel Gilson, Moses Goold, David Shattuck, Stephen Foster, Zachariah Willis.

"Sept. 7d. 1758. Benjamin Farmer bought one powder horn one Inkhorn and one tump line belonging to Leut. Farvel that Died."

Many charges are made for "muton" "chas" and "Rumb".

The "tump line" was used during the time of battle by the Indians and the white men for the purpose of hauling dead bodies, or helpless wounded men from the scene of carnage. When officers or soldiers were seen to fall in battle, some soldier friend would creep up to the wounded or dead person; attach the "tump line" and by adroit movements haul the body away unobserved by the enemy. From June 17, 1758, to Sept. 9, many words used for "Parole" are recorded among which are Gage, Nichols, Whitehall, Moumouth, and Catarockquea.

Lt. Spaulding's old account book, that has been preserved with his journal, contains many accounts with citizens in Putney and Dummerston. The charges in Putney begin in Mar. 1766, and end in 1771. In 1770, he makes the following entry:

"To serving and returning a ret (writ) on Ben Hutchens before Judge Lord, and to service on said Hutchens before Judg Wells."

The book shows that he did business a part of the year, 1772, in Westmoreland, N. H., on a farm which he bought of Abner Howe. The earliest date for this town, then called Fullam, Jan. 6, 1773. The name does not change until 1775, to Dummerston.

[Of the papers contributed by Mr. Mansfield we shall next give what biographical account he has been able to gather of the fourteen men who signed the notification calling for the first town meeting, commencing with Ebenezer Haven, (see page 8,) and Enoch Cook, the first town clerk, chosen that day, and such other citizens of Dummerston as were named in that report,—the Kathan's and Lieut. Spaulding, having been previously given. Ed.]

EBENEZER HAVEN FAMILY.

Ebenezer Haven, lived in Hopkinton, Mass., in 1754, and was at that time 24 years of age. He removed to Oxford with his family in 1757 or '58, thence to Sutton, and in 1770, to Dummerston, and was one of the signers on the first call for a meeting to organize the town in 1771. He reached the age of 79 years and his wife, 70. He was probably a brother of Deacon Moses Haven, of Hopkinton, who was born in 1732, and m. in 1750. He was the son of Joseph, b. in 1689, who was a ruling Elder in Hopkinton, in 1731, and afterwards. The father of Joseph was Moses, a deacon in Hopkinton, but b. in Lynn in 1667, whose father was Richard, who came from England and settled in Lynn, in 1645, where, in 1692, he then living, it was "voted, that Sergeant Haven should sit in the Pulpit." Samuel Haven, son of Moses, b. Dec. 9, 1751, removed from Hopkinton to Shrewsbury, Mass. in 1800, and from the history of that town, we ascertained the information given above.

Ebenezer and Abigail Haven were the ancestors of the Haven families in this town. He was a blacksmith and was doubtless the first man working at that trade in Dummerston. He bought lot No. 14 of the original proprietors, June 26, 1770, and the farm is now owned by his great grandson, Orrin Haven, having been kept in the family name since it was first settled.

David Haven, a brother of Abel, died in 1865, aged 94 years, 6 months. Jairus born in Dummerston, was the fourth child of a family of whom Deacon Abel Haven was the youngest : Dea. Abel died on the farm now owned by his son, Joel M. Haven of Rutland. This farm was the only one in town on which good corn was raised in the cold summer of 1816. "Uncle" Jairus did the farm work that year and was in his old age quite fond of relating the particulars of his raising corn when so many failed to secure a crop. His life-work was farming, and he used a scythe in haying for nearly 80 years.

Abel Haven, born Jan. 1, 1799, died Apr. 20, 1864. Maria, his wife, dau.

of William and Hannah (Worden) Miller and grand-daughter of Capt. Isaac Miller, died Jan. 29, 1873. Dea. Haven—deacon of the Congregational church in this town many years—and his wife were good members of the church and very helpful in society, and were much esteemed. Their portraits were donated for this publication by their son, Dea. Joel M. Haven, of Rutland, who was born in Dummerston on the old Haven farm and was a farmer boy until the time when he became a clerk for Foster Wheeler, of Putney. Afterwards he went to Brattleboro and was clerk for A. E. Dwinell, then book-keeper and confidential clerk for Calvin Townsley until Townsley's store was burned. He then went West and engaged in farming ; but was not successful and returned to Brattleboro where he went into the dry goods trade with his brother-in-law, H. C. Fisher. The firm established a branch store at Rutland, of which he became the manager. Some years afterward he became treasurer of the Rutland R. R. company and has held that position many years. He engaged in various enterprises, chief among them being the purchase of the Bates House, making it one of the best hotels in the State and running it as a temperance house. His wife was Maria Dickerman, of Brattleboro, who became a prominent worker in the temperance cause throughout the State. Maria, his sister, married William Fuller, of Brooklyn, Ohio, and Caroline, the other sister, married Henry C. Fisher.

CHARLES DAVENPORT.

The earliest ancestor of whom there is any authentic record, is Thomas Davenport, of Dorchester, Mass., whose name first appears on any of its records as member of its church, Nov. 20, 1640 ; his wife, Mary, joining, Mar. 8, 1644. She died Oct. 4, 1691. He was made freeman, May 18, 1642, and constable, 1670. He probably lived on the eastern slope of Mt. Bowdoin, near the corner of Bowdoin Street and Union Avenue. He bought the house and lands of William Pigrom, Nov. 25, 1653, and William Blake, Feb. 5, 1665. He made his will, July 24, 1683, "being aged," leaving the homestead to his youngest son, John, after his widow's death. He died Nov. 9, 1685. His inventory of property amounted to £332, 16s, 8d. He had nine children. The fourth child was Charles, baptised, Sept. 7, 1652, in Dorchester, where he died, Feb. 1, 1720. He married Waitstill, dau. of Quartermaster John and Katharine Smith of Dorchester, Jan. 11, 1659, who died Aug. 9, 1747.

Charles Davenport was ensign, and held many town offices. He was selectman most of the time from 1700 to 1714. His homestead on Washington Street was on the south side of Mt. Bowdoin. His inventory amounted to £2700.—There were 9 children in his family. The eighth child was Charles, b. in Dorchester, Feb. 15, 1700, m. May 31, 1722, Jemima, dau. of Thomas and Experience Tolman of Dorchester. He inherited the homestead by his father's will. His wife, Jemima, died Feb. 17, 1735. He sold off the homestead and removed to Worcester, Mass., where he had four children by a wife, Joanna. His first five children were born in Dorchester, the others in Worcester. He had 10 children.

The 4th child was Charles, the subject of this sketch, and great grandson of Thomas. He was born

Mar. 5, 1730; married Apr. 16, 1755, at Worcester, Mary Hart, born Mar. 7, 1734, who died June 22, 1830, aged 96. He died in Dummerston, Apr. 25, 1805. She married 2d, Alexander Kathan. Descendants of Charles Davenport are now living in this town, Newfane and Chesterfield, N. H.

CHARLES DAVENPORT,

was one of the first settlers in this town and signed the first call for a meeting of settlers. In 1774 he lived on the "green" as it was called in the town records. The exasperated citizens met at his house, Oct. 29 of that year, and chose a committee who released Lieut. Leonard Spaulding from confinement in the jail at Westminster. He moved a few years after down on to the plain near Isaac Miller's and, for many years since, the home of John Stearns. A large apple-tree is now standing near the house that was set out by Mr. Davenport more than one hundred years ago. The tree measures 12 feet 6 in. in circumference and is probably one of the largest and oldest apple-trees now standing in the county, if not in the State.

The children of Charles and Mary (Hart) Davenport were: Elizabeth, b. Feb. 5, 1756, m. Fairbanks Moore, residence in Canada.

Mary, b. Oct. 12, 1757, m. John Miller;

Jemima, b. May 16, 1759, m. Joseph Gilbert, a soldier of the Revolution, a resident of Dummerston for a time and later in Hadley, N. Y.;

Susanna, b. Nov. 12, 1774, died Feb. 27, 1796. The first five children were born in Worcester, Mass., and the others in Dummerston.

Halls History of Eastern Vermont, states, Charles Davenport, a skillful carpenter from the patriotic little village of Dummerston, was the man who replied to a threatening speech informing the rioters that they "should be in h—ll before morning," and who said that if the sheriff should offer to take possession of the Court-house, the Whigs would send him and his men to the same place in fifteen minutes." [See previous paper from the town clerk]. The twin children, Thomas and Catherine, were doubtless the first twin children born in town, but evidently, not the first births. According to the family record, Mr. Davenport moved to town between the years 1763 and 1766. He taught the first school in town.

ENOCH COOK,

the first Town Clerk, died Feb. 4, 1797, $\text{\AA}$ 74 yrs. His wife, Lucy, died Aug. 17, 1806, $\text{\AA}$ 82. His son, Enoch Cook, jr., died Aug. 15, 1838, $\text{\AA}$ 76. signed the notification for the first town meeting in 1771. A town meeting was held at his house, May 19, 1772. He was chosen, at that time, with Isaac Miller and Cyrus Houghton, commissioners of highways. No further record of him. His name disappears from the records after 1772. I wrote for further information concerning Samuel Wiswall, but did not get it.

MAJ. JOSIAH BOYDEN.

was one of the five persons, including Solomon Harvey, John Butler, Daniel Gates, Jonathan Knight, forming a committee, who released Lt. Spaulding from confinement in the jail, Nov. 8, 1774. [See pages 10 and 27].

Josiah Boyden, sen., came from Framingham, Mass., to this town, soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, and settled on the farm where Timothy Brown now lives. His wife died before he came. He had a large family. In a few years he removed from Dummerston with Jonathan, his son, and two or three other children, to the interior of Vermont, leaving here Josiah, jr., Isaac, Thomas, Nathaniel, and three daughters. The sons settled near where their father had lived. Thomas located in the lot west of the Haven farms. Josiah, jr., married Lydia Whitney, of Petersham, Mass., birth-place, Watertown, and settled north of Canoe brook, but afterwards removed to a farm since known as the Henry Cressey place; thence to a place south of the Hollow, on the west side of the road at the top of the hill. He bought the grist-mill, since owned by Joseph Dix, which was probably the first one built in town. He was major in the Revolutionary war.

His father, sometimes called "Col. Si," was in the French and Indian war. Isaac, brother of Josiah, Jr., was born Jan. 1, 1750. His birth-place and his mother's maiden name are unknown. He married Elizabeth Laughton, born Mar. 25, 1750, and settled south of Canoe brook in what has been called the Knight pasture and since owned by Willard Dodge. Red rose bushes are still growing on the old house-spot in the pasture west of Edward Chapell's residence. His brother, Thomas, married Abigail Haven and had two children who died in childhood.

Isaac, who married Elizabeth Laughton, had two sons: Thomas, b. Mar. 6, 1783, and Isaac Jr., b. July 13, 1785.

After Thomas became of age, he spent a few years in a store at Putney. He married Margaret Laughton, and lived on the paternal farm, taking care of his parents and an aged grandmother. During the winter season he taught school. He did much town business and was chosen to the state legislature several times.

Isaac, his brother, studied medicine with Dr. Abel Duncan, and closed his studies with Dr. Alexander Campbell, of Putney. He married, May 7, 1809, Phebe Perry, of Putney, born Feb. 5, 1784, and removed to Windham, where he practiced medicine. Children:

Phebe P., b. Feb. 3, 1810, married 1st, Beman Bemis, 2d, Amasa Clark; Lurancy, b. Nov. 23, 1814, d. 1815;

Isaac and Mary, twins, b. July 3, 1821; Isaac m. Fanny Wheeler, Mary m. Chester Denison. Both daughters went West and are still living.

Dr. Isaac returned with his family to Dummerston and lived with his uncle, Major Josiah, and caring in part for him, as he was helpless from the effects of palsy. He was thus afflicted 4 years before he died. He and his wife were buried in the yard east of the Hollow, beside the graves of Thomas and Nathaniel Boyden.

Nathaniel, b. Sept. 1730; was never married; died 1801.

Major Josiah, jr., was born Feb. 15, 1744; never had any children; died Jan. 4, 1818, $\text{\AA}$ 74, and Lydia, his wife Jan. 28, 1839, $\text{\AA}$ 91 years.

CAPT. ASA BOYDEN,

a nephew of Col. Wm. Boyden, born Mar. 4, 1777, and died Oct. 11, 1848, $\text{\AA}$ 71. Martha Minot, his wife, born Mar. 28, 1785, died Oct. 11, 1856, $\text{\AA}$ 71. It is a somewhat remarkable incident that each were born in the same month in different years, died on the same day of the same month, in different years; but were each 71 years' of age at the time of their death. Asa Boyden when quite young, went to live with his uncle, Col. Wm. Boyden, who had no children. He made Asa his heir, who always lived with his uncle William and took care of him and his wife in their old age.

Jonathan Boyden, jr., married Ruth Jefferson, Mar. 14, 1787.

Capt. Asa had a brother, Alvin, who lived in Newfane.

Jabez Butler, married Deliverance Whitney. She was sister of Lydia, the wife of Josiah Boyden, jr. Butler lived near where James Reed now owns, north of the brook on the west side of the road. He removed thence to the old tavern where Nelson Willard now lives.

The children of Thomas and Margaret (Laughton) Boyden were:

Betsey, b. Aug. 13, 1811, m. Church Miller; Anna, b. Dec. 23, 1812, died Oct. 10, 1833; Electa, b. Oct. 11, 1817, m. Bradley Bemis; Margaret married Arba Spaulding.

In 1814, Thomas Boyden bought of his uncle Josiah, jr., his mill and farm, giving him and his wife a life-lease on the place, as the old gentleman was helpless at that time. After his death, about 1819, his widow, Lydia (Whitney) Boyden, married Cornelius Jones, of Chesterfield, N. H., who died in Nov. 1833. She died at her nephew's, Henry Whitney, in Putney, Jan. 1839, $\text{\AA}$ about 92.

Judith, a sister of Josiah, jr., married Sylvanus Ballard. He built what is now, 1883, the west room of the house in which Job Knight lives. About 1792, he sold his place to Isaac Boyden, and removed to Chesterfield, N. H., where his wife, Judith, died July 4, 1806, in her 75th year. They had several sons and a daughter, Elizabeth, who married 1790, John Day of Chesterfield. A sister of Judith Boyden married Mr. Pike and lived in Stratton. She was his second wife and had no children. The Dummerston records state that Lucy Boyden was married to John Butler, Oct. 16, 1788, and that Samuel Atwood married Hanna Boyden, Nov. 17, 1788.

JOSIAH BOYDEN, SEN.,

was a soldier in the French and Indian war. On one occasion, he was with a company of soldiers sent to rescue a little village in the eastern part of Mass., from an attack by the Indians, who were burning the dwellings and killing the inhabitants. The soldiers discharged their guns at the Indians, killing several of them. The Indians then, with a savage yell, turned upon the soldiers with their tomahawks. A stalwart Indian with his weapon of death raised above his head, started for Boyden, who was a man of superior strength, above medium size, quick and bold in the presence of danger. He turned his gun, struck the Indian a blow that knocked him down, snatched the tomahawk from his hand, and sunk it deep into his head, thus dispatching his enemy in an instant.

His son, Isaac Boyden, served in the Revolutionary war, a little more than one year. Josiah, Sen., was a blacksmith; and in the fall after he settled in Dummerston, he built a log-shop, burned a coal-pit, and began work at his trade.

One of his arms was somewhat stiff from the effects of a wound in or near the shoulder, made by the tomahawk of an Indian. His shop stood on the west side of the brook that runs west of Timothy Brown's buildings. The site of the shop and old coal-pit near it may be seen at the present day.

The house in which Major Boyden lived when he bought the grist-mill at the Hollow, was afterward sold to Joseph Crosby and removed to its present location where Franklin Crosby now lives.

During the first year that Isaac and Elizabeth Boyden lived on their place south of Canoe brook, about 1782, Mrs. Boyden, one day, went to the spring, a few rods from the house, for a pail of water. When she returned in a few minutes, she found a large black bear in her room looking about to see what he could find. The bear had pushed open the door, which Mrs. Boyden had carelessly left unlatched, and entered the house. It was startled by her sudden appearance at the door; but she turned quickly and hurried around the outside of the house, thinking that the bear would follow her tracks. She judged rightly, for on making the circuit and reaching the door, she found the room vacated, dodged in and fastened the door against bruin. Looking out the window in a few minutes, she saw the bear going into the woods, and was happily relieved by her stratagem. Some of the clothing spun, wove, and made for her first child, Thomas, born Mar. 6, 1783, is in possession of her granddaughter, Mrs. Electa Boyden Bemis, having been kept one hundred years.

Thomas Boyden took the job of raising up the old meeting house in 1817, and putting beneath granite underpinning. He hired Henry Houghton of this town, who married Sally Perry, sister of Dr. Isaac Boyden's wife to help him. Houghton was an excellent mechanic and had served 7 years in Montreal to learn his trade. He made the pulpit and some of the pews in front, in the old church. Mr. Boyden learned the art of surveying land and was a surveyor many years. After his death the compass and chain which he used were sold to Samuel Knight.

MAJOR JOSIAH

and wife, not having any children, took several orphan children to care for as their own. The first was his brother, Thomas's little girl, Lydia, a namesake of his wife. She died at the age of 3 years. Another child whom they took, was Jason Duncan, son of Daniel and Zurvilla Duncan. His father died in the Revolutionary war, leaving a wife and three young children. The boy was honest and faithful, and when he died at the age of 12 or 13 years, Mr. Boyden and wife mourned for him as for their own child. His mother died Oct. 30, 1812 aged 65. Her daughter, Zurvilla, m. Levi Goddard. The other daughter, Beulah, married her cousin, Jason Duncan and lived in Newfane. Mrs. Duncan was left without a home at the time of her husband's death. Isaac Boyden, Joseph Temple Jr., and others in that neighborhood, built for her, at their own expense, a small house which stood on the west side of the road south of the Isaac Reed place. She was aided by them still more in harvest time, each year, as long as she lived. Zurvilla, her daughter, learned to weave many different patterns of table-linen and bedspreads. Beulah, her sister, taught school several terms in that district.

Dorcas Haile was another child taken into the family of Major Boyden. Her mother died and left two little girls.

Her father lived west of the road not far from where Mrs. Joel Wheeler's buildings now stand. She m. Samuel Adams, Nov. 7, 1805, and several years afterward removed to Brookline.

THO'S CHITTENDEN.

"MAJOR BOYDEN"

CHARLES PHELPS of Marlborough in the Co. of Windham.

He was highly esteemed for his integrity and judgment, in all business transactions. He was often chosen as the guardian of orphan children and to settle the estates of the deceased, which he did to the satisfaction of all concerned. The widow and the fatherless always found him the judicious adviser and the faithful friend.

For a man in the ordinary walks of life, he had also acquired an uncommon knowledge of the condition of the world and took a deep interest both in its political and moral state, and was especially interested in the African race, for which he thought others felt far too little, and his sympathies were decidedly in favor of the colonization movement.

COL. WILLIAM BOYDEN

was chosen overseer of the poor at the first town meeting in 1772, died Sept. 19, 1822, aged 76. Joanna, his wife, died Feb. 5, 1847, aged 92 years. His brother, Isaac, died June 9, 1813, aged 63. Elizabeth, his wife, died Feb. 8, 1834, aged 84. Thomas, son of Isaac was the husband of Margaret Boyden, who died Jan. 6, 1879, aged 91 years.

BARZILLAI RICE,

one of the fourteen signers for a settlers meeting, 1771, was chosen 2d constable at the first town meeting, in 1772. His wife's name was Silence. No record of their deaths. Dec. 8, 1778; Josiah, b. Sept. 23, 1781; It will be seen that Oliver Rice was born before the twin children of Charles Davenport; also Levi Robinson, son of Ezra and Sarah Robinson, was born Oct. 21, 1765. Hall, in his history relates two or three incidents of Barzillai Rice's experience as deputy sheriff in 1782.

The ancestors of

a first settler in Dummerston, were residents of Billerica, Mass., where he was born, Oct. 15, 1718. He descended from Samuel Dutton 3, John 2, and Thomas 1. His parents were Samuel and Hannah (Hill) Dutton, married about 1713. Their eldest child, John, was born Oct. 18, 1715. She was a widow when married to Mr. Dutton. Her father was Joseph Walker.

Samuel of Dummerston, married in Bedford, Aug. 19, 1740, Martha Lane, b. in Billerica, Mar. 17, 1721. Their children, born in Bedford (formerly a part of Billerica), were Pattee, b. Apr. 10, 1742; Samuel, b. July 11, 1743; Hannah, b. Apr. 21, 1745; Seth, born Apr. 9, 1747; David; Stephen; and Asa, born 1759. No record of others.

The family came to Dummerston with four sons before 1770. David m. Polly Higgins, 1782; Stephen's wife is not named in the record; Asa m. Polly Tarble about 1783. He died Feb. 11, 1836, aged 76; Polly, his wife, died Apr. 22, 1827, aged 68. Their children were Polly, b. Oct. 23, 1785; Patty, b. Aug. 3, 1787; Susan, born June 8, 1789; Asa, b. May 13, 1791; Sibyl, b. Jan. 4, 1793; Sally, born Mar. 2, 1796; Lucy, b. Dec. 17, 1797; Stephen, b. June 24, 1801. Asa Dutton 2d died Mar. 23, 1868, aged 76 yrs. the same age as his father when he died. Mary, his wife, died Dec. 4, 1864.

Samuel and Martha Dutton settled on lot No. 74, now the well-known Rice farm, which he sold in 1777, with improvements, to Ephraim Rice for $500, and in the same year, bought of Jonathan Knight lot No. 49, where he remained, during life. He was living in 1802, and his wife, Martha, in 1786 when the farm was deeded in equal shares to Asa and Stephen.

Samuel Jr. bought of proprietors in 1770, lot No. 122 (in the Hague). He sold it in 1782, and purchased lot No. 51, the farm where Daniel W. Gates now lives. It was his home the rest of life. He married, late in life, Anna (Nancy) Chamberlain of Chesterfield, N. H., for his second wife, who survived him 33 years, and died Oct. 20, 1862, aged 87. He left considerable property for his family.

Samuel, lived half a mile north of his father's residence, where no buildings are now standing, but an orchard of young apple trees surrounds the locality.

ALONZO DUTTON,

whose portrait is here given was born Aug. 20, 1803.

Winslow, b. 1805; Mary, b. 1808, m. Oct. 7, 1833, Daniel P. Kingsley, of Brattleboro, died July 18, 1851;

Cylinda, b. Feb. 27, 1812, m. Mar. 27, 1830, Manor Smith; Mannasseh, b. Aug. 1823, died Sept. 14, 1850.

Mr. Dutton bought Sept. 6, 1819, the farm near Connecticut river which Alonzo, his son, has owned many years.

He married Oct. 25, 1827, Harriet, daughter of Enos Goss, who died June 9, 1872, Æ 65. Children:

Adin A., b. Oct. 28, 1828, and Sarah F., b. July 17, 1837, d. Dec. 12, 1859.

He married 2d, Mary, widow of George Hildreth, June 12, 1873.

Adin A. married Jan. 1, 1850, Fanny M., daughter of John Kathan, and lives with his family, in the two-story house on the parental farm which he and his son, Myron F., have managed several years. Children: Mary E. died young; Myron F.; Hattie A., married Adin F. Miller; and Jennie F.

They make the ninth generation, of the Dutton family, as here recorded,—the whole record covering a period of nearly 250 years.

Alonzo Dutton was town representative in 1854, and has been selectman 7 years. He and his wife are pleasantly situated near his son's residence, and, being past hard labor, he takes pride in the cultivation of the finest garden in town, in which are grown several varieties of choice grapes. He has been prospered as a farmer and gained a competence for old age by a life of hard work and habits of economy. His son and grand-son have made many improvements on the farm. The well-built slate stone walls along the roadside, the well cultivated and productive fields, the neat-looking buildings, shaded in part by rows of stately maples, are evidences of good management by progressive and diligent farmers.

ASA DUTTON,

died Feb. 11, 1836, Æ 76; Polly, his wife, died Apr. 22, 1827, Æ 68. Their children were:

Polly, b. Oct. 23, 1785; Patty, born Aug. 3, 1787; Susan, b. June 8, 1789;

Asa, b. May 13, 1791; Sibyl, born Jan. 4, 1793; Sally, b. Mar. 2, 1796;

Lucy, b. Dec. 17, 1797; Stephen, born June 24, 1801. Asa Dutton 2d. died Mar. 23, 1868, Æ 76; [see page 40] Mary, his wife d. Dec. 4, 1864, aged 68.

NATHANIEL FRENCH,

settled in Dummerston, on what is called the "Luke Norcross" place, in 1768. He was brother of William French, killed at the Westminster massacre, also of Asa, who married Mary Rice Apr. 17, 1783, Rebecca, who married Sam'l Dutton. Joel, who married Polly Bailey Oct. 29, 1794. Asa and Mercy French were the parents of Jonathan French, who died in this town, Jan. 18, 1864 aged 73.

NATHANIEL FRENCH SEN.,

the father of William, killed at Westminster, and Nathaniel Jr., died June 8, 1801, aged 81 years. He was born in Billerica, Mass., Feb. 2, 1720, and descended from William 3., John 2., William 1. His mother, Elizabeth Frost, was born in the same town, Aug. 31, 1723, dan. of William 3., James 2., James 1. They were married Sept. 28, 1744. Elizabeth (or Betsey), his wife, died Sept. 20, 1777. One Joanna French died Sept. 9, 1800, aged 72. One Jonathan French with two other boys, Frost and Richardson from Billerica, were killed by the Indians June 16, 1748, while on their way from Hinsdale east of the Connecticut river, to Fort Dummer.

Nathaniel French Sen. was a resident of Brattleboro at the time his son was killed. In 1784, his house was the most north-eastern dwelling in that town and was very near the southern line of Dummerston. The name Nathaniel French appears in the census of 1771, in the list of both towns, and Hall, in his History of Eastern Vermont, makes the mistake of supposing there was only one Nathaniel French whose name was twice recorded, being claimed by both towns.

The fact is, that father and son had the same name, the former residing in Brattleboro, the latter in Dummerston, when the census was taken. The French family in 1769, resided in Fort Dummer, but afterward, removed to the home in which they lived in 1784. The site of the French house formed a part of the farm known in 1857 as "the old Willington place," since owned by Church Miller and now owned in 1881 by Milton Miller.

The son came to this town when 21 years of age, marked out and cleared up the land which made him a good farm near West river. The large button-wood tree now standing in front of the house was set out by him. Betty, his wife was a widow Duncan. Mrs. Norcross, the grand-daughter, lived and died on the old homestead. The blood of William French, shed at Westminster, was the first blood shed in the Revolutionary war. Frank Moor, Esq., the genial editor of the Songs and Ballads of the American Revolution "had in his possession a ballad published in 1779, in which reference is made to the death of William French, as follows :

"But Vengeance let us Wreak my Boys
For Matron, Maid, and Spinster;
Whose joys are fled whose Homes are sad.
For the Youth of Red Westminster."

The children of Nathaniel Sen. and Betsey French were Betsey, b. March 13, 1776, d. May 16, 1776; Samuel, b. Mar. 13, 1777;

William, b. Oct. 9, 1778; Ephraim, b. June 24, 1780; Betsey, b. Oct. 27, 1782; Lydia, b. July 9, 1784;

Ollie, b. Mar. 10, 1786; Nathaniel, b. Nov. 17, 1789.

Nath'l French Sen. died June 10, 1811, aged 64; his wife died Mar. 10, 1828, aged 72 years. Samuel, son of Nathaniel Sen. m. Sarah Gates, June 15, 1800; William m. Lydia Estabrook, Oct. 4, 1801; Ephraim married Priscilla Duncan Oct. 14, 1804;

Betsey m. Jesse Manley Sept. 27, 1810; Lydia m. Amasa Manley Jan. 26, 1806; Ollie m. Moses Roel, Nov. 22, 1807; Nathaniel m. Sally Walker—1811.

Louisa French, widow of Luke Norcross, died of typhoid fever, Nov. 17, 1881, aged nearly 74 years. She was a daughter of Ephraim French, and grand-daughter of Nathaniel French.

ISAAC MILLER.

The original survey parchment of the town of Dummerston, made in 1767, is signed by Ebenezer Waters. Nearly all the parchment is much faded. Probably Isaac Miller was one of the company who made the survey, as he was employed that year by the heirs of the late Gov. Dummer to lay out the township called Dummerston. If Isaac Miller had any claim or right to the township of Walpole, N. H., as stated in a biographical sketch of Major Charles Dana Miller of Newark, Ohio, and it must have been long before "1763," for John Kilburn purchased "the whole" township and was a settler there in 1749, according to the history of Walpole, published in 1880.

The history of Northfield, Mass., records the event that "John Kilburn started from Weathersfield, in 1740, stopped at Northfield with his family where he was taxed 1741, and then moved on to No. 3 (Walpole). The town was chartered and organized in 1752, from which time officers for the town have been chosen annually, and so late as 1763, about 15 families resided in the place.

Col. Benjamin Bellows, who it is claimed, got the land away from Miller after he had rightfully obtained it, had trouble with Kilburn; but he bravely replied, "No! I bought the whole and paid for it, and it is all mine, and I will have all or none." May it not be that the following letter, written by Isaac Miller, explains the whole trouble he had about the ownership of land? The letter was taken from the papers of Col. Israel Williams, now in the Mass. Historical Society at Boston. The writer is indebted to Hon. George Sheldon of Deerfield, Mass. for a copy of the letter for this publication, and he wrote:

"I give you the paper just as I copied it, some part an abstract, some verbatim, only I did not follow the spelling, as I should, were I to publish it."

Sept. 4, 1772, Isaac Miller writes to Col. Israel Williams as the last survivor of 16 to whom was granted the Equivalent Lands above Fort Dummer. He has a copy of the deed from Connecticut and has been informed there was a deed from the natives of the same land to 16 gentleman, but of larger extent than both deeds had been confirmed by the Board of Trade & Plantation.

"I was employed some years ago by Gov. Dummer to take care of the above farm to see that the timber was not destroyed & the owners had agreed with me to lay out one part of the above said farm into a township but the wars with the French & Indians prevented any further proceedings at that time. So all things lay dormant until the death of Gov. Dummer & the wars ceased & the heirs of Gov. Dummer employed me again to lay out a part of said farm into a township in the year 1767 & my having a large family caused me to remove from Worcester to the Equivalent farm and settled a town in said farm called Dummerston, not thinking but our title was as good as any in the British Dominions. But Col [Samuel] Wells agent from New York came and demanded $1440 for a new Patent with a quit rent of 2s 6d each 100 acres. I told our people I should do no such thing. We had a good title from Conn., the natives, and a charter from New Hampshire, I shall not go to York for a Patent, but Wells and his Yorkers try all that lies in their power to disturb us and make dissenters among us." Begs advice, information & assistance from him & Col. Patridge. "Our lines have fallen in arbitrary places (Gennings Patent) these Jacobites are pleased to call our lands." &c.

The Equivalent Lands were sold at Hartford, 24th and 25th of Apr. 1716 in 16 shares to 21 persons among whom were Anthony Stoddard, Esq., Boston, William Brattle, Cambridge, clerk, - 1 share each; William Dummer, Boston, merchant, his brother, Dr. Jeremiah Dummer, one half share each. The shares were allotted in June 1716. The whole of the land alluded to as Dummer was known by the name of Dummerston previous to 1753, when the Equivalent Lands together with a "considerable quantity of other lands," surveyed by Joseph Blanchard of Amherst, N. H., in the year 1750, were divided into three townships one of which was called Fullum. The name was changed back to Dummerston to commemorate the name of Wm. Dummer, the oldest proprietor who died 1761, aged 74 yrs. The town was called by both names about 25 years, the time of the charter. The large family of Isaac Miller referred to in his letter, when he removed to Mass. in 1770, numbered 12 children.

PAPER FOR THE MILLER FAMILY, FROM MR. MILLER OF NEWARK.

MILLER: MAJOR CHARLES DANA, was born in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, September 3, 1836, and moved to Newark in the spring of 1857. His family has an ancient and honorable lineage, dating back over two hundred years in America, and ante-dating from its emigration to America into traditional genealogy another century in Scotland.

The Millers, of Scotland, were of Saxon origin, and followed the leadership of Edward, who conquered the Picts and founded Edinburgh, A. D. 449. The history of the family is rather obscure, until about the year 1600, when the country was distracted by civil war, assuming a religious character between Protestantism and Catholicism. The Millers took sides with the Protestants, and later with the Presbyterians or Covenanters, when persecuted by James the First, in his efforts to establish Episcopacy. The laws against Presbyterianism were so arbitrary that it led to great disorder and opposition by the inhabitants, and many personal encounters passed between the liberty-loving Scots and the minions of the king, in the enforcement of obnoxious laws. The name of James Miller is found twice recorded in a list of those who paid fines for transgressing the laws in the city of Edinburgh, and is recorded in this quaint style:

"The compt of mony resanit in fra sick persone as hes transgrest aganest the statutis and ordinances of the guld toune; the namis of the personis that pay it, and soun that evrie man pay it, begining at Mychelmas. 1608 yiers, till Mychelmas the yier of God. 1609 yiers, the time of thair offices of baill yiers, as follows: James Miller, for being found be the gaird, at twelve hours at even, with one sword drawin at James Hayrie, £4. James Miller, for the bluid wyte of Patryk Chalmers, £9 18d."

The oppression of the Covenanters led many to seek the shores of America where they could worship God without restraint, and one Senior Miller and his son James (who are the direct progenitors of this family in America), emigrated from Edinburgh about the year 1660. They settled in Charlestown, near Boston, and joined the established Presbyterian church at that place. We find recorded in the Genealogical dictionary of the first settlers of New England. "James Miller, the Scotsman, Charlestown, admitted to First church, December 17, 1676, and made freeman, May 23, 1677, and died July 14, 1690. His wife, Mary, joined the church August 5, 1677, being baptised that day with her eight children—James, Mary, Robert, Job, Abraham, Isaac, Mercy and Jane.

The record of his father's death, Aug 1, 1688, calls him 'Sen,' an aged Scotsman about seventy."

Isaac Miller, the son of James, removed to Concord, Massachusetts, and afterwards to Worcester about the year 1718. His son Isaac, born in Concord, May 7, 1708, married in Worcester one Sarah Crosby, and reared a large family. In 1770, the year of the Boston massacre, he removed to Dummerston, Vermont, which town he surveyed and settled. John, the son of Isaac, jr., was born in Worcester, December 20, 1756, and lived and died a farmer in Dummerston. His son, James, who was born in Dummerston, December 16, 1783, emigrated to Ohio in 1814, and settled in Knox county, what is now Miller township, named in his honor. His son, James Warner, born in Dummerston, Vermont, July 8, 1807, settled first in Newark, about the year 1826, afterwards in Mt. Vernon, where he married in 1833, and raised a large family, the second son of which, Charles D. Miller, is the subject of this sketch.

The genealogical order of the eight generations as far as authenticated, will then stand as follows: First, Sen. Miller, born in Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1613; second, James Miller, born in Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1640; third, Isaac Miller, born in Charlestown, Massachusetts, about 1670; fourth, Isaac Miller, jr., born in Concord, Massachusetts, in 1708; fifth, John Miller, born in Dummerston, Vermont, in 1783; seventh, James Warner Miller, born in Dummerston, Vermont, in 1807; eighth, Charles Dana Miller, born in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, in 1836.

In order to present the history of this family more in detail we must return to the Scottish ancestors.

Many of the Scotch Millers attained eminence in literature and science. The ancestors of Hugh Miller, the great geologist, were a seafaring race. Among the great writers were John Miller, of Lanarkshire, professor of law in the university of Glasgow; James Miller, of Ayr, physician and chemist, and editor of the fourth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica; James Miller, professor of surgery in the university at Edinburgh; Thomas Miller, of Glenlee, baron and lord justice clerk of court of sessions.

The ancient coat of arms of this family, adopted by the various Scotch branches, bears a similarity in the chief points of the field; the only variations appearing in minor objects in the divisisions according to the fancy of the bearer, or as conferred by heraldic law. The chief points, as borne by all the Scotch families, are: first, the color of the shield (white); second, the Moline cross, which represents the figure of the iron that supports the upper mill stone; third the wavy bar in the base, and last, the mullet, or rowel of a spur. A description of the arms borne by the American branch of the family, as near as can be authenticated, and as expressed in heraldic terms, is as follows: Argent, a cross moline, azure. In chief, second, bordure of three cinquefoils, gules, lozenge between two mullets; sinister chief lozenge between two mullets. In fess, hand with first and second fingers extended, two arms with hands clasped, moline cross, sable, between four hearts; in base wavy bands of vert; crest, lion rampant with moline cross, sable, between paws motto, Optima Coelo, Unione Augetur.

A very complete record has been preserved of the family of Isaac Miller, jr., the grandson and great-grandson of the Scottish emigrants. He was a staunch Republican in the troublesome times preceding the outbreak of the Revolution. Being a surveyor by profession, he became useful in the settlement of the then new country north of Massachusetts, but his enterprises met with disaster through the machinations of the tools of the king, who had set a mark upon all Republicans. In 1763, he, with others, were granted a township of land in New Hampshire, which they settled and payed for, but by a subterfuge the British court, then in session in Worcester, re-granted it to General Bellows, a tory. He moved his family in 1770, to Dummerston, Vermont, which town he surveyed and settled. Isaac Miller, jr., had twelve children. Vespasian was a soldier in the old French war, and afterwards followed the sea. Hosea was a farmer. Rosanna married Major Joseph Negus, of Petersham. Among her descendants are Mrs. Gen'l R. B. Marcy, Mrs. General George B. McClellan, Mrs. Major W. B. Rossell, of the United States army. Sarah married Silas Wheeler, of Petersham. Tiltonson emigrated to New York State. Patience married Dr. Thomas Amsden, of Petersham. Joseph was a soldier of the war of the Revolution, and served seven years with distinction, being promoted to the rank of major, and merited the friendship and confidence of Gen'l Washington. Isaac was a captain in the Revolution, and was badly wounded early in the war near Boston. Marshall was a farmer and left many descendants.

John, the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was a Revolutionary soldier, and subsequently became very prominent as a citizen of Vermont. Catharine married a Mr. Knapp and reared a large family. William, the youngest, was a soldier in the latter part of the Revolution and rose to the rank of major.

John Miller, who was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, December 20, 1756, had eight children— Lewis, James, Levi, Sally, Polly, Rosanna, Susan, and John B. Rosanna and Susan are still living—the former eighty-six and the latter eighty-four years of age.

James Miller, who was born in Dummerston, Vermont, Dec. 16, 1783, was educated at Williams college. In the war of 1812 he was a member of the company of Captain Hayes—the father of President Hayes. He emigrated to Ohio in 1814, and was six weeks making the journey in wagons. He bought of the government a section of land in what is now Miller township, Knox county, which was then a howling wilderness. James Miller was a gentleman of culture and highly esteemed by his neighbors for his sterling worth, industry, and enterprise. He married Sarah Warner, the eldest sister of Luke K. Warner, of Newark. They were married in 1806, near Wardsborough, Vermont, eight years before their departure for the West. She was an accomplished and educated young lady, of rare personal beauty, and seemingly too tender for the hardships of pioneer life, but she lived to see the primeval forest on her husband's land replaced by smiling and fruitful fields. They reared a family of eleven children—James Warner, Madison, Volney, Henry H., Mary M., Rosanna W., John F., Harriet M., Sarah Warner, Dana, and Lucinda A. Of this family now residing in Newark may be mentioned James Warner, his sons, Charles D. and Philip D.; two daughters, Elizabeth V. and Susan R.; John F. Miller and one son, Edwin S.; also, Mrs. H. C. Bostwick, daughter of Madison Miller.

James Warner, the eldest, was born in Vermont, July 8, 1807, and emigrated to Ohio with his father. In 1826 he went to Newark and engaged with his uncle, Willard Warner, who kept the old "Green House," on the present site of the Park hotel. In 1830, he moved to Mt. Vernon and engaged in business. In 1833, he married Mary G. Bryant, daughter of Gilman Bryant, Esq., one of the pioneers of Knox county. He reared a family of ten children—James Bryant, Charles Dana, Elizabeth V., Edward Stanley, Sarah Warner, Philip Dennis, Mary Gilman, Francis Warner, Jennie Ella, and Susan R. James Warner Miller engaged in business in Mt. Vernon for over forty years, and was widely known as one of the most industrious and enterprising merchants. He removed to Newark in the spring of 1879, where he now resides.

This closes the succession of the paternal ancestors of Charles Dana Miller.

His maternal ancestors were also of old revolutionary stock. His mother, Mary Gilman Bryant, was the daughter of Gilman Bryant, a pioneer of Knox county, whose father, David Bryant, was an officer in the Revolution, and a cousin of William Cullen Bryant, the poet. David Bryant married Mary Gilman, the daughter of Colonel Jeremiah Gilman, in whose regiment (the New Hampshire line) he served. The genealogy of the New Hampshire Gilman's is thus narrated:

In May, 1638, Edward Gilman, with his wife, three sons, two daughters and three servants, came from Norfolk county, England, in the ship called the "Delight," of Ipswich, and settled in Hingham, Massachusetts. Moses, the third son of Edward Gilman, lived in New Market, New Hampshire, and had six sons Captain Jeremiah, born in 1660, had Thomas, Andrew, Joseph and others. The last two sons were captured by the Indians, in 1709, and taken to Canada. At a war-dance, Joseph was burnt. Andrew was sold to the French, and imprisoned, but obtained favor of the governor and was permitted to work for wages until he earned a sum sufficient to purchase his freedom. He returned to his old home, married, and had one son—Jeremiah—and three daughters. Jeremiah was born about the year 1721. When the Revolutionary war broke out, he was commissioned a colonel and commanded a regiment in the New Hampshire line. His daughter, Mary Gilman, married Lieutenant David Bryant, who served in his father-in-law's regiment during the war. Lieutenant Bryant was the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch.

The genealogical successions of the nine generations in this line, therefore, stand as follows: First, Edward Gilman, born in Norfolk, England, about 1600; second, Moses Gilman, born in Norfolk, England, about 1630; third Jeremiah Gilman, born in New Market, N. H., in 1660; fourth, Andrew Gilman, born in New Market, New Hampshire, 1690; fifth, Jeremiah Gilman (second), born in New Market, New Hampshire, about 1720; sixth, Mary Gilman, born in Vermont, about 1760; seventh, Gilman Bryant, born in Vermont, 1784; eighth, Mary Gilman Bryant, born in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, 1814; ninth, Charles D. Miller, born in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, 1836.

Nicholas Gilman, who was a delegate to the convention in 1787, and signed the constitution of the United States, and the Hon. John Taylor Gilman, governor of New Hampshire, were descendants of Edward Gilman. Governor Lewis Cass was a descendant of Moses Gilman.

Charles Dana Miller received a good academic education, which he greatly improved in after life by much reading and travel. He moved to Newark in 1857, and engaged in business with Luke K. Warner, doing a large and successful trade in the grain products of the county. When the war broke out in 1861, he enlisted as a private in Captain Coman's company C, Seventy-sixth Ohio regiment, and was successively promoted for meritorious services to first sergeant, sergeant major, first lieutenant and adjutant, captain and major by brevet. The latter rank was conferred by the President of the United States. He was of light frame and delicate and nervous temperament, and seemingly ill adapted to endure the privations of a soldier's life, but in his case, as well as in many others, actual service proved that physical proportions and strength were counterbalanced by spirit and energy. During his whole term of service of three years and a month he never permitted himself to be excused from duty, although suffering physical disability, contracted by his devotion to the service. He was twice slightly wounded, at Vicksburg and Resaca, but continued on duty without reporting his wounds. He was engaged in the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh with credit, and during the Siege of Corinth, when the adjutant of the regiment and adjutant general of the brigade succumbed to disease, he was detailed to perform their duties, at the same time he performed the arduous work as orderly of his company. It was here that his qualifications pointed the road to promotion, and his commanding officer, without solicitation, obtained a commission for him as adjutant of the regiment, to fill the vacancy of the late adjutant, who had resigned. He continued to perform the duties of adjutant for nearly two years, never missing a dress parade while with the regiment. In 1864, when his regiment re-enlisted as veterans he was promoted to a captaincy, and placed in command of his old company C. He commanded this company through the active, glorious Atlanta campaign, and in Aug. 1864, was appointed acting assistant inspector general, performing the laborious service pertaining to that office in a large brigade of nine regiments.

Major Miller commanded the highest esteem and confidence of the colonel of his regiment. He was conspicuous for his devotion to the cause of the Union arms in battle and in camp. At Arkansas Post he was mentioned in special orders for his gallantry. At Atlanta, on the twenty second of July, 1864, he led his company in advance of the regiment, bearing the colors, and in the face of a scorching fire, drove the enemy from earthworks and re-captured a fine battery of parrot guns.

He presented a conspicuous target in this engagement, but escaped the missiles aimed at him. His first lieutenant (Arnold) was shot three times by his side. At Ships Gap, while on the staff of Colonel Milo Smith, he directed the flank movement which resulted in the capture of two South Carolina companies.

On the twenty-eighth of July, near Atlanta, he stood for four hours encouraging his men while breasting a fearful storm of musketry to which the regiment was subjected. The lists of engagements he participated in numbers forty or fifty, but the principle battles and sieges which will be prominent in history, may be mentioned:

Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Siege of Corinth, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, Siege of Vicksburg, Jackson, Dallas, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta, July 22d and Jonesborough.

After the expiration of his term of service he received an honorable discharge, November 18, 1864. The war practically ended in the West at that time. He returned to Newark and again engaged in his former business.

In May, 1865, he married Lucy Gilman Jewett, daughter of David D. and Lucy Jewett, of Newark. She was a noble woman, a devoted Christian, a fond wife and mother. This union, so promising of long happiness, terminated in her early death, which occurred Jan. 2, 1869, leaving two infant children—daughter and son—Lucy Jewett, born March 4, 1866, and Charles Dion, born November 17, 1867.

In 1875-76, he engaged in the commission business in Chicago, retaining, however, a branch business at Newark. In 1877, he returned to Newark and continued in the grain trade, under the firm name of Miller & Root, and is at the present time transacting a large business in the products of the county. Major Miller has always been an out-spoken adherent to the principles he fought for during the war, and although he has never aspired to civil office, he has been somewhat conspicuous in his advocacy of "stalwart Republicanism." He has taken a lively interest in the organizations and re-unions of ex-soldiers, being one of the first projectors of the Soldier's Society of Licking county, through whose instrumentality the great re-union was held in 1878.

He has been continuously elected the secretary of the society, and he prepared, and had published, the admirable report of the great re-union which gives a very complete record of Licking county's participation in the war for the Union.

Major Miller's early inclinations were decidedly toward the study of a profession instead of mercantile pursuits. He inherited a taste for drawing and painting, and has followed the natural bent, more or less in an amateur way during his leisure moments. His eye is almost perfect in its comprehension of forms, distances and colors with rare taste for landscape gardening and rural adornment. He has been an industrious student of science and history, his mind favoring geological research more than any other. He has written many able articles for the press upon subjects in harmony with his tastes.

In religion he was brought up in the doctrines and faith of the Protestant Episcopal church, and became a member of that denomination before entering the army, but his general religious views are of the most liberal character, free from bigotry and disposed to reconcile and harmonize religion with science in its broadest sense.

Isaac Miller, father of Vespasian, removed his family from Worcester, Mass., to Dummerston, Mar. 5, 1770. The following sketch of him is in Ward's History of Shrewsbury, Mass. Two men, who were refugees of that rebellion, boarded at her father's a few weeks, and, in making themselves useful, set out a number of young apple-trees in the orchard near the house. Six of those trees are now standing. One was recently, May, 1879, cut down and measured 34 inches in diameter and 9 feet around it.

JACOB THOMPSON,

at whose house a town meeting was held Dec. 28, 1772, was chosen first constable in 1774. No family record. Benoni Thompson, b. Apr. 19, 1797, m. Susanna —, may have been his son. Olive, Jonathan, Michal and Dolly were children of Benoni and Susanna.

SOME OF THE CONTEMPORARIES of those who signed the notification for the first town meeting of Dummerston.

The town of Dummerston numbered among its early inhabitants men who were unfriendly to the jurisdiction of New York, and who regarded the order of the King in Council, by which Connecticut river was declared the eastern boundary of that province, as especially tyrannical. Such were pre-eminently the views of the physician and clerk of this patriotic village, and the records which he kept, in virtue of the latter office, exhibit on almost every page traces of his peculiar disposition. He was chosen town clerk May 18, 1773. The dislike which he in common with others entertained towards the government of New York, had no doubt been increased by the aristocratic bearing of some of the county officials who held their appointments from the Colonial Legislature; and the abuse of power which these men sometimes exhibited in their functionary character, was used as an argument against those from whom they had received their authority. At a town meeting held May 17, 1774, the people omitted to choose town trustees. The zeal of the eloquent clerk in stirring up the recollection of his readers upon this occasion may be seen on pages 4-8, record history.

The next meeting was called June 10, 1774, at 4 o'clock, p. m., at the house of Enoch Cook, and Joseph Hildreth, Enoch Cook and Solomon Harvey were chosen trustees to fill the places left vacant at the regular election.

Fully on their guard, and ready to treat as tyrants those who should endeavor to deprive them of any of their privileges, they afterwards sent delegates to the Westminster convention, and were among the foremost in advancing the objects for which it had been convoked. Nor was it long before they had an opportunity to carry into action the spirit which they had evinced in that rock-ribbed village, which allowed full scope to their patriotism, and ended in confirming the jealous watchfulness with which they had resolved to guard their rights, which the warm-blooded Doctor Harvey, the "village Hampden" of Dummerston, who, judged by his zeal and courage, seems to have possessed. Doctor Harvey was the leader on this occasion. He has shown in his narrative records, how the insolence of Britain was checked by the valor of himself and of his compeers, and it is but right that he should tell the story in his own quaint and energetic mode:

[see paper for town record page 9 to 12]

Such is the graphic and impartial narrative of one who was the chronicler of events in which he bore an important part, Mar. 15, 1775, when about 500 soldiers assembled at Westminster in order to punish the murderers of William French etc., the beating of a drum, heralded the approach of Solomon Harvey, Practitioner of Physic, at the head of a body of 300 men. In the centre walked four of the sheriff's posse, who had been intercepted on their way home. The whole party halted in front of the Court house. An investigation was had, which ended more favorably than the poor prisoners had expected. The stern old doctor disarmed them, and dismissed them with a pass signed with his own name, to which was prefixed the title of Colonel. The courts were broken up at Westminster at that time. In an account of the meeting of the inhabitants of Dummerston held Aug. 22, 1775, occurs an entry which shows that the people were engaged in preparing an elaborate account of the disturbances which had happened in the month of March previous. The entry was made by Jonathan Knight, town clerk, in these words:

Voted that it is the Sence of this town that the Letters that are in the hand of Dr. Harvey are Not any Evidance in the Case which the Commite is Collecting; for the Evidance which tha are to Colect is the Bad Conduct of the Cort from its fust Setting up the Cort, Down to the fust of March Last; and that these Letters only Shue that the Peple ware Displeaised at the Earbitary of offiseirs of the Cort and ware Raday to Rise and Stop the Cort be fore that time; and we think those Letters Show Like wise the unity of the People and purfix the time; and we think it Best not to have these Letors goe to Westminster."

At a town meeting held Dec. 21, 1775, it was voted;

That Jonathan Knight, Enoch Cook, Joseph Hildreth secure the town records that are in the hands of Dr. Solomon Harvey and transcribe it into a town book."

This is the latest account we can find of Dr Harvey. He probably moved from this town before the close of the Revolutionary war. His farewell letter as town clerk is recorded on the town records, for which see town records.

A part of this sketch is from "Hall's History of Eastern Vermont."

Dr. Solomon Harvey, the efficient town clerk in Dummerston, was also, a practitioner of physic, "and when Dr. Jones rode bareheaded from Westminster at the time of the courthouse fight, to Dummerston, for re-inforcements, Col. Solomon Harvey led a company of 300 men from this town and Putney to the scene of action, Capt. Leonard Spaulding inspected the men." The Doctor removed from Dummerston in 1776, to Chesterfield, N. H., where he died about 1820. He took an active part in the affairs of the town during the Revolution. In 1788, he was chosen to represent Chesterfield in the convention that adopted the Federal Constitution. Selectman, 1789, '92; town clerk from 1800 to 1817. His wife was Mary ———. Only one child's name is recorded, Mary, b. in Dummerston, Apr. 22, 1773.

DANIEL HOUGHTON, who was mortally wounded during the massacre at Westminster, came originally from Petersham, Mass., and previous to his death was a resident of Dummerston. The idea was general for a time, that he would recover from his injuries, and it is for this reason that his name is not often found in connection with that of William French. But in the records of this town the "murdering of William French and Daniel Houghton" is spoken of as an article of history, which was then received without doubt and in the account at the meeting that held in this town on the 6th of April, less than a month after the event, is a memorandum of a committee who were appointed to "go to Westminster there to meet other committees, to consult on the methods for dealing with the inhuman and unprovoked murderers of William French and Daniel Houghton." Houghton was wounded in the body and survived only 9 days. He died at Westminster in a house situated a little northwest of the Court-house, and but a short distance from it. It was then occupied by Eleazer Harlow. Most of those who were wounded were taken to the house of Azariah Wright. He was buried in the old grave-yard at that place, not far from the last resting-place of French. For many years there was a stone, shapeless and unhewn, which marked the spot where he lay; but even this slight memorial has at length disappeared from its place, and no one can now mark with accuracy the locality of his grave.

Doctor Thomas Amsden, whom we have mentioned elsewhere as one of the physicians of this town was one of the 17 coroner's jury, who were assembled Mar. 15, 1775, to inquire into the cause of the death of French. The original report of the investigation is still preserved and Dr. Amsden's name is first on the list of jurymen.

CAPT. JOHN WYMAN.

On a gravestone in the cemetery at Dummerston Centre, is the inscription; "Capt John Wyman, an officer of the Revolution, Died July, 23d, 1823, aged 80 years." Captain Wyman was born in Cambridge, Mass., in 1743. His rank in the Revolutionary army was lieutenant, and his service was in the Rhode Island Continental Line. He was placed on the pension roll Apr. 15, 1818. Annual allowance $240. Sums received $1276.07. This information the writer obtained from an old pension roll printed about 1835, which also contains the names of all persons who were or had been pensioners belonging to Windham county. When writing for Miss Hemenway's publication ten years ago, we obtained the information that Capt. Wyman was one of the number who dressed in the costume of Mohawk Indians, went on board of the British vessel in Boston harbor in 1773, and "Took the old tea and done as they oughter, And tipped it all our right into the water."

Capt. Wyman's home in this town was where Henry French now lives. He was a tanner by trade, and marks of the old tan-vats are now visible on the flat south of the barn near Salmon brook. His disposition and character were of a belligerent nature. He was all military, and was fond of relating his exploits and deeds in Revolutionary times. Bunker Hill was his favorite theme. He selected the spot on his farm where he wished to be buried and called it Bunker Hill. It was on high land west of the house, back of which extends a beautiful plain. He was buried under military honors, a company of soldiers, or military men, being present on the occasion, from out of town. A liberty pole was erected near his grave. After a few years his remains were removed to the cemetery where they now rest, and over which a marble slab was raised by his relatives, bearing the inscription we have quoted.

Of the many songs about Capt. Wyman that he or some one else used to sing in his day, the following verse is a sample :

Believe me Sirs, now if you please,
A ball took of my breeches' knees;
From a loud cannon it was sent,
As I against the Britons went.

A little episode of a war-like character occurred in this town, in which Capt. Wyman figured prominently. He got into a dispute with a prominent man of the town. Bela Shaw, we believe was his name. From words they came to blows, the Captain got knocked down to the floor by Shaw. The Captain indignant threatened prosecution; what resulted the doggerel tells,

In Mr. Shaw, he picked a flaw.
Who then to have some fun, Sir,
The other night did not do right
And knocked John Wyman down Sir,
He knocked him down upon the floor, Sir
Where he did long remain;
At length he rose with head so sore
That loud he did complain.

"Bela Shaw," said he, you, me, have hit
And now for what you've done
I'll go and get a 'justice' writ
As fast as I can run."
But Shaw was wise and did advise
With him he'd arbitrate:
Two mugs of tod, they did award
As the price of Wyman's pate.

Capt. Wyman was one of the number who took offence at hearing what they called a "tory sermon preached by Rev. Hosea Beckley during the war of 1812. His text was in Rev. XII, 7. "And there was war in heaven." "England," he said, "loved us, and we declared war against her. France hated us and we loved France." Capt. Wyman would not hear Mr. Beckley preach afterward for a long time. On one occasion, when Mr. Beckley was to exchange with another minister, he called and notified the Captain of the event, and that it would afford him an opportunity to attend meeting in his absence. This act restored him to favor and he again attended Mr. Beckley's meeting.

LIEUT. DANIEL GATES

married Sarah Moore and their children were: Daniel, born Apr. 3, 1777, m. Polly Newton, Apr. 1, 1805;

Sarah, b. Jan. 5, 1779, m. Samuel French June 15, 1800; Persis, born Sept. 17, 1780, m. Christopher Ormsbee, May 1, 1803;

Ira, b. May 12, 1783, died Mar. 5, 1812; Eli, b. Mar. 22, 1786, d. Dec. 15, 1792;

Joel, b. May 9, 1788, m. Susan Dutton, Mar. 6, 1828; Martin, born Feb. 25, 1791, m. Rebecca Winslow, May 3, 1826.

Lieutenant Gates bought the land on which he settled in this town in 1774. His native place was probably Worcester, Mass., from which town Jonathan Gates came in 1777. Their relation to each other, if any, is not known. Lieut. Gates was a successful farmer and also prominent in the business affairs of the town. He was prompt and efficient in all his dealings. His ability as an officer in the Revolutionary army was seen and acknowledged at the capture of General Burgoyne and secured to him the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens, who held him in grateful remembrance. He died very suddenly Nov. 6, 1807 aged 56, when absent from home on business. He went to Worcester, Mass., with a neighbor of his, and a Mr. Joy of Putney. They returned Nov. 5, as far as Oakham, Mass. He retired at night in good health but awoke about 20 minutes to three in the morning; and complained of great distress at his heart. Stimulants were administered, and he was relieved for a time. He died in a few minutes on retiring again to his room. He was an ardent lover of his country and an early advocate for its freedom and independence. Sarah, his wife, died Mar. 9, 1829, aged 81.

Daniel Gates, who married Polly Newton, removed with his family to Truxton, N. Y.; Children: Asa, born Feb. 11, 1806; Sally Moore, b. July 14, 1807; Salona and Sirena, (twins), b. Mar. 30, 1809; Justin, born Jan. 3, 1811; Joel; Martin.

Joel and Susan (Dutton) Gates had two daughters, Sarah and Mary. The younger sister married Hiram Knapp: she died and he married, 2d, the elder sister, Sarah.

Martin and Rebecca Gates were the parents of Martin W., born Feb. 19, 1727, m. Rosella Cook; Sarah M., b. June 6, 1828, m. Fred A. Fish; Daniel, born Nov. 24, 1831, m. Emily Ormsbee; Emma m. Lewis H. Lynde.

Martin Gates died Dec. 21, 1859, aged 68; Rebecca, his wife, is now living at the age of 83.

Martin W. with his family, removed to Seward, Kansas, in 1877, where he died Jan. 21, 1882. He was chosen selectman in 1862, and served very acceptably during four years and at a time when more than usual responsibility rested with the officers of the town in connection with the war of the Rebellion.

Lieut. John S. Gates married Hannah —, and was a brother of Lieut.

Daniel Gates, and settled on the river and in the northeast part of the town in 1770. It is recorded that John Gates settled on an adjoining lot the same year. It is possible that John S. and John Gates may be one and the same person. His name is also written J. Shephard Gates, and in 1784, is recorded as Shephard Gates. In 1793, John Shephard Gates is the only name recorded as the head of a family in that part of the town. Hence the conclusion that Lt. Daniel Gates had only one brother living in Dummerston. He probably had a sister who married Reuben Spaulding, for when Spaulding died he was not buried in the family lot of his father, Lieut. Leonard Spaulding, but was buried in the lot belonging to Lieut. Daniel Gates. It is said that Reuben Spaulding married a Gates, and after his death in 1794, she remarried and left town.

Lieut. John S. Gates was chosen selectman in 1782, '83, '84, '85, and at other times up to 1806, in all, 12 years, making the longest term of service as selectman, in this town, except that of Jason Duncan, who served 17 years.

The children of Lieut. Gates and Hannah, his first wife, were John, born Apr. 11, 1776, m. Polly Goodwin, Aug. 23, 1803;

Asa, b. Feb. 14, 1777; Lucy, born Jan. 25, 1779; Shephard, b. Oct. 1, 1780, m. Polly Dutton, Dec. 27, 1807, died Apr. 1861, Æ 88;

William, b. Oct. 8, 1782, d. Nov. 18, 1821; James, b. Mar. 21, 1785, d. Dec. 26, 1816;

Hannah, b. Mar. 12, 1787; Polly, b. Apr. 3, 1789, m. 1st Stearns Wilder, Sept. 4, 1814, 2d, Artemas Knight.

Hannah, the wife of Lt. Gates, died Feb. 15, 1813, Æ 62, and he married, 2d Lucy Witt, Oct. 16, 1814, and died Feb. 28, 1827, aged 81.

Minor Knight m. Lavilla Gates, June 13, 1836. She had a sister, Maria. They were nieces of John S. Gates.

The children of Shepard and Polly Gates : Alanson, b. Oct. 5, 1808, and John S., b. June 24, 1811, d. May 22, 1849.

Shepard Gates died Apr. 8, 1869, aged 88, and Polly, his wife, June 23, 1863, aged 77.

Phineas Gates was a resident of this town 10 years. It is not certain that he was related to any one of that name in Dummerston. He married Rebecca, dau. of Elder Woods, of Putney West Hill, and they were residents of Worcester, Mass., in 1788. They lived in Petersham, Mass., in 1791, came to this town in 1798, and occupied the red building east of the common for a few years. Their children were Nancy and Polly (twins), b. June 3, 1788. Sophia, b. Jan. 11, 1791; Henry, b. June 17, 1792; Lucy, b. Nov. 19, 1793; Oran, b. Feb. 19, 1797; John, b. Dec. 3, 1798; George, b. Oct. 16, 1800; Fanny, b. Sept. 9, 1802; Eliza, b. DUMMERSTON IN THE FIGHT

AT GUILFORD JAN. 30, 1784.

Among the 300 militia gathered for the purpose of driving the Yorkers out of Guilford, was a company of 20 men from Dummerston, led by Lieut. Daniel Gates. The ordnance department was composed of one old cannon, almost useless, from Dummerston, and was superintended by Ebenezer Haven and Isaac Miller.

During the affray near Massachusetts line, one man was mortally wounded and Joel Knight of this town was slightly wounded in the arm by a bullet.

Thomas, brother of Samuel, sen., also from Rutland, bought half of Samuel's lot, Nov. 29, 1779, and a part of the adjoining lot, No. 57, in 1784. Deacon Thomas, as he is called, was a shoemaker, or cordwainer, as the record reads.

1788, Samuel deeded his farm in equal shares to his sons, Samuel, jr. and Jacob. The children of Samuel and Susanna were Samuel, jr., David, Amos, Jacob, James, Mary, Susanna, Esther, and Sarah who died in childhood.

David married Mary, dau. of Capt. Leonard Spaulding.

John, jr., son of John, sen. and Mary Crawford, was born Aug. 11, 1714. He m. Esther, dau. of Mr. and Esther (Alley) Davis, of Concord, Mass. She was b. Sept. 9, 1717, and died at the residence of Thomas Boyden, Apr. 27, 1813, in her 96th year. Her husband d. Feb. 26, 1799, and they were buried near the graves of Isaac and Elizabeth Boyden. Her grave is unmarked, but Thomas Boyden made and erected the stone now standing at the grave of her husband. He was a shoemaker and made fish seines. Their children were James, Jacob, John, jr. called the 3d, Elizabeth, Ann, Esther, Sally and Solomon.

James m. a Gates.

Elizabeth, b. Mar. 25, 1750, m. Isaac Boyden.

Anna m. 1st, about 1777, Parmenas Temple, had two children, Anna and Parmenas, jr. She m. 2d, March 25, 1788, Lemuel Presson, half brother of Samuel Presson, and with her two children, removed to Northfield, Mass.

Sally m. Solomon Cook, a brother of Enoch Cook, sen.

Esther m. Ezekiel Hagar. They and her brother James and wife removed to the south-eastern part of Maine.

Jacob married and lived near Boston. He responded to the first call for soldiers to meet the British and was mortally wounded in one of the early battles of the Revolution. He fell in the ranks, rose again, and started for a thicket. He did not reach it, as his strength failed from the loss of blood, which flowed fast from a wound near his knee. His body was not recovered and it was devoured by wolves.

His son, Jacob, wanted to revenge his father's death, and enlisted at the age of 16 years, a mere stripling youth. When he was ready to march the neighbors proposed to have his gun and equipments weighed, and then weigh the boy. The result was that the boy weighed one pound less than the burden he had to carry. He could not endure long marches and carry so much weight. His gun was exchanged for a drum and he did good service for four years as a drummer. His deafness was caused by standing too near the discharge of cannon in a hard fought battle. He was known as "deaf Jake." His brothers also, were soldiers from the commencement in the same war. John, sen. and John, jr. were in the French and Indian War. Samuel, sen. was in the Revolutionary war and was present with Col. Ethan Allen at the capture of Fort Ticonderoga.

Huntington, who married a daughter of John Laughton, sen., was a cruel tory. The family of his wife's brother, Samuel, sen., who was then a soldier, were short of grain. They heard that Huntington, who was living in Warwick, Mass., had grain to sell, and sent Samuel, jr., a boy of 16 or 17 years of age, to that town, a two days journey on horseback, to buy rye of him. The boy was instructed to stop over night at some place near his uncle's for fear that he might not be kindly received. Next morning he started early and arrived at Huntington's just after breakfast and found there six British officers, who had been his guests over night and were preparing to leave. Huntington was giving them information which he had gathered about the rebels in the army and at their homes, saying that his wife's folks were all rebels and some of her brothers were then in the rebel army. The officers mounted their steeds and rode away. When he went into the house, his wife reproved him for speaking to the officers, as he did, about her relatives. Her reproof added fuel to his hot temper, and he cursed and swore that he would give the British all the information he could gather, telling his wife that, if any of her brother Sam's boys should come into his house, he would take his gun and blow his brains out. Young Laughton heard his threat and thought it time to do his errand with the tory and be off. He bought two bushels of rye, paid him the money and left without being recognized by the family. They were too much excited to ask his name, and his morning visit did not raise a suspicion that he had come any great distance.

Huntington never allowed his wife to visit any of her relatives after the war. Her parents once made her a visit, but he was so much displeased about it that they never had an opportunity to see their daughter again.

Susanna Laughton, who married Thomas Davenport for her first husband, had by this marriage two children, Lucy and Pardon. When Lucy was about 6 years of age, her father went to New York to get work and never returned. His daughter lived in the family of Isaac and Elizabeth Boyden until she was 18 years old, and afterwards married Clark Knight. Pardon, her brother, went to Newfane to live, married, and had a large family. One of his sons, Alonzo C. Davenport, is now (1883), a merchant in Brattleboro.

Capt. Samuel Laughton, jr., once the boy who went to Warwick for rye, was born Jan. 5, 1758, and m. Anna, dau. of Capt. Leonard Spaulding, born in Putney, Apr. 7, 1767. Of their children, Margaret m. Thomas Boyden; Anna m. 1st, Jonathan Tenney, 2d, Nathaniel Herrick; Roswell died in childhood; Wealthy did not marry; Electa m. Rodney Laughton; Susanna m. Wm. Chase; Betsey m. Benj. Butterfield; Persis m. Nathaniel Bixby; Samuel and Sally never married.

Mrs. Isaac Boyden, the daughter of John Laughton, jr., often told her grandchildren and others, the following Revolutionary story :

Her father and family then lived near Boston, and when the British troops were landing in that city, a man rode past their dwelling at full speed, on horseback, just as they were rising early in the morning, calling, "To arms! To arms! The British are landing in the harbor. Be ready to march immediately." All was excitement. Her father put the guns in order, and told his two sons to get what lead they could find and run it into bullets. The number of balls were not sufficient, and Mrs. Laughton took from the table a pewter basin and had it made into bullets. The girls cut patches for wads, while the mother got breakfast. Very little was eaten and the father and two sons were soon on the march for conflict. Instructions had been given for the mother and daughters to get sheets ready for bandages and scrape what lint they could. It was a wise precaution, for bandages and lint were needed before sunset. This event was June 17, 1775, and the battle scene was on Bunker Hill. On that day, Mr. Laughton and his two sons saw the brave Dr. Joseph Warren fall mortally wounded.

John, 3d, son of John, jr., married Lucy Chase, of Newfane, where he went to live, and had several children. Solomon and John were two of his sons. John was born about 1760, and married about 1791, Sally Black. The parents lived with their son, Solomon, during the decline of life. The father died and was buried in Newfane; the mother, who survived, was brought on a bed, she being quite sick, to Dummerston, and lived with her son, John, until her death. She was buried in Newfane. "Aunt" Margaret Boyden worked for the family when she was a girl and took care of Mrs. Laughton during her last sickness. John and Sally (Black) Laughton (or Lawton as they spell the name) were the parents of Solomon, b. Sept. 3, 1793, Asa, John, Sally, Franklin, and Mary Jane.

The wife of Samuel Laughton, sen., was often called on to visit the sick, as there were few physicians in those days. She responded to all the calls for aid in sickness, and often went in winter time on snowshoes across the lots to visit families 2 or 3 miles away. On one occasion she visited a sick woman whose husband had not got reconciled to the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor. Having brought some tea with her for the sick woman, she watched her opportunity to steep it while the man was out at work, gave it to her patient and then drank some herself. Before she had finished her cup, the man came in, smelt the tea and stormed furiously, saying it cost too much human blood, to drink it, it was like drinking human blood and he would not have tea used in his house. Mrs. Laughton could not be frightened and deliberately finished drinking her tea in the presence of the enraged man.

DEA. THOMAS LAUGHTON

was a soldier in the French and Indian war, which begun in 1754 and lasted 6 years. On one occasion he was pursued by Indians, and in endeavoring to escape, was obliged to cross a swamp. The passage was difficult, as the mud and water were quite deep in many places. One of the worst places, he crossed on a log. When he was near the opposite side of the swamp, he discovered the Indians were ahead of him and, in fact, had surrounded him. He retraced his steps immediately to the log on which he had crossed a few minutes before, and secreted himself beneath it in the water. He remained there a long time, and in order to breathe, he kept his nose just out of the water close behind the log, so that he escaped the notice of the passing Indians. They crossed and recrossed the log under which he was secreted without discovering him although they had a little dog that crossed on the log with them. Mr. Laughton enlisted in the Revolutionary war, but his son, took his father's place and served as a substitute for his father. He was killed at the battle of White Plains, Oct. 28, 1776. It was only a partial engagement, but the Americans were obliged to retreat. In endeavoring to escape across the fields, he jumped over a fence and, by accident dropped his gun. He thought it not safe to go on without his gun and returned to secure it. He was not seen, after that, by his fellow soldiers, and they concluded he was killed by the enemy.

Dea. Laughton moved to this town from "Old Rutland," Mass., near the close of the Revolutionary war. He died Nov. 12, 1814, aged 83. Rebecca his wife died Jan. 12, 1818, aged 82.

was in the Continental service at the age of 17. He wintered at Valley Forge with Washington's army in 1777. One night he stood on guard over a house in which Gen. Washington was an inmate. At drybreak, the General came out and said, "Pretty cold morning is'nt it, soldier? Do you suppose a little peach brandy would hurt you? "I think not," replied Bemis. The General sent him the brandy. On another occasion Washington wished to pass into camp where Bemis was on guard. He halted the General, presented his gun and called for the countersign. "You can let me pass," said Washington, "I am one of the officers." "You must give the password first" said the soldier. "You have a fine gun there soldier." "Yes," replied Bemis, "Guess I can kill an Indian six or eight rods off. Stand out there; you can tell." The General held out his hat, showing the countersign inside, and was allowed to pass on. As he went by, he slapped Bemis on the shoulder and said, "I wish I had a whole regiment of soldiers like you."

SAMUEL STEARNS, M. D., LL. D.

Dr. Samuel Stearns became a resident of Dummerston about 1796, and practiced medicine in this town several years. He was of a roving character and, previous to his residing in Vermont, had traveled in nine of the American states, and in England, Scotland, Ireland, and France. He was born in Lancaster, Mass., in 1747, and was, as expressed in his own language:

"early taught by parents and ministers to fear God and honor the king. I was also instructed in the various branches of grammar, arithmetic, algebra, geometry, trigonometry, navigation, surveying, astronomy, music and medicine. I always had a natural inclination to do good; to walk in the paths of righteousness, and to shun vice and immorality."

When quite young, he removed with his parents to Paxton, an adjoining town, where, at the age of 26, he engaged in the practice of medicine and compiling and publishing almanacs. His medical practice was fair, and his fame as an astronomer led many of the inhabitants to consult him on the turn of future events. Nothing had occurred to change the current of his existence till after the Revolutionary war. He was suspected of being disloyal to the American cause and it became evident that he was a tory. For that reason his practice fell off and his friends deserted him, except those who were loyal to the king. He did not flee from the royal lines, but chose to remain and endure the sneers and insults, which were freely bestowed upon him, until 1780, when he was arrested. His experience for the next seven years is given in his own words in a petition dated, Brattleboro, July 18, 1799, and addressed to his Excellency Robert Liston, Philadelphia, Penn., which was the seat of U. S. government at that time, and by him to be transmitted to the king:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:—

The petition of Samuel Stearns most humbly,—That when the unhappy dissensions commenced between Great Britain and your Majesty's American colonies, he was an inhabitant of Paxton, in the county of Worcester, in the province of the Massachusetts Bay, where he followed the practice of physic and the making of astronomical calculations. That a number of years he suffered persecution in consequence of his loyalty to Your Majesty, and attachment to the British government, was made a prisoner on the twenty-third day of September. A. D. 1780, accused of holding a traitorous correspondence with, and affording aid and comfort to the enemy, supposed to be Your Majesty's armies, but was liberated by giving bonds for his appearance before the Supreme Judicial court in April following. That on the third day after he was thus recognized he received information that his adversaries had issued a second warrant with the design to put him in close confinement, and finding that his life was in great danger, fled for protection to Your Majesty's army, then at New York. That he resided within the British lines, during the remainder of the war, and Congress having ratified the treaty of peace between Great Britain and America, he returned to said Paxton in the year 1784, with a design to collect sundry debts due to him and ascertain the value of the property he had left and remove his family to Nova Scotia. That although it had been in the 6th article of said treaty, that no prosecutions would be commenced against any person, etc., for, or by reason of the part he had taken in the war; and that no person would on that account, suffer any future loss or damage, either in person, liberty or property, yet in less than two days after his return he was seized and imprisoned in the goal in said county of Worcester, under the pretence of being brought to trial, in consequence of the accusations already mentioned. That, without any trial, without the finding of any bill against him, and without his being allowed anything to eat, drink or wear, at the expense of the county or state (water excepted) he suffered two years and eleven months confinement in a very disagreeable prison, although it had been customary to allow states' prisoners something for their subsistence even if they had been thieves, highway robbers and murderers, and although he frequently petitioned the general court or assembly of the commonwealth of Massachusetts praying for liberation and the enjoyments of those rights which were granted to him as one of Your Majesty's subjects in the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and America. That, for a long time he was treated with neglect and contempt, but was at last discharged from confinement on the 28th day of July, 1787, by order of said General Assembly. Then he was liberated in a very distressed condition, being destitute of house and the common necessities of life, but went with his claims for the loss of his houses, lands, etc.. to Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, in hopes it was in the power of the commissioners appointed by Your Majesty to inquire into the losses, services and sufferings of the American loyalists, to grant compensation. That he found that it was not in the power of the commissioners to receive his claims because they had not been delivered to them previous to the beginning of May, 1786, at which time he was in prison: He, therefore, went to Great Britain, petitioned for relief and had some compensation granted for what he had suffered in the time of the war, but not anything that he knows of, for his sufferings since the establishment of peace.

That he returns his sincere thanks to Your Majesty for those favors, and further begs leave to mention that he returned to America in the year 1791; and having been informed that the commonwealth of Massachusetts had paid for his board whilst he had been a states' prisoner, went into that government to visit his friends in the year 1793, when he was unexpectedly seized and imprisoned in the goal in the county of Bristol, for not paying said board. That he suffered four days, eighteen hours and fifteen minutes close confinement in said county of Bristol, and lost by this prosecution 141 pounds, 16 shillings and 6 pence, sterling. He also lost, when imprisoned in Worcester, 273 pounds, 19 shillings and 9 pence, sterling, in consequence of his non-appearance before the Supreme Judicial Court, when he resided within the British lines in the time of war, the greatest part of which sum was paid to the said commonwealth by his bondsmen, who were also imprisoned. That said imprisonment also prevented his collecting the debts that were due to him in said state, which amount to 368 pounds, 6 shillings and 6 pence, sterling, including the principal, which, joined to, amount to 784 pounds, 2 shillings and 9 pence, besides the two years, eleven months, four days, eighteen hours and fifteen minutes imprisonment which he has suffered repugnant to the requisitions of the articles of peace. That he has petitioned to Your Majesty's commissioners in Philadelphia, and these appointed by the President and Senate of the United States of America, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of all losses and damages as divers merchants and others. Your Majesty's subjects have sustained in consequence of their being debarred by sundry lawful impediments from collecting their debts in said states, praying that they the said commissioners, would aid and assist him in obtaining compensation, but they esteem themselves as not empowered to act upon the subject because his imprisonment is considered not as lawful but as an unlawful impediment to his collecting his debts. That he understands that a number of Your Majesty's subjects in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, who formerly belonged to Massachusetts, are debarred from receiving compensation for their debts in the same manuer, although it does not appear by the records that the General Assembly of Massachusetts ever repeated the laws they made in the time of war for the purpose of protecting the American loyalist, and which were repugnant to the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and America, till the year 1787. That it appears by an article of Congress passed in the year 1794, that no foreigner is allowed to sue any state within the limits of the United States of America. Therefore, he sees no way to obtain compensation for the injuries and abuses that he has received than that of imploring Your Majesty's most gracious aid and assistance. He therefore prays that Your Majesty will be pleased to aid and assist your petitioner, and all others, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, who have been injured by violations of the treaty aforesaid, "for whom no provisions appear to be made at present for their relief" in obtaining compensation of the United States in such a way and manner as Your Majesty in your wisdom may see fit.

Sworn before me this 23d of July, 1799,
 Luke Knowlton,
 Member of the Honorable Council for the State of Vermont in America and Justice of the Peace throughout the State."

The five or six years succeeding his release from imprisonment, in 1787, were spent in various parts of the United States and Europe. In 1789, he was for a short time engaged in editing the Philadelphia Magazine. He published an almanac which was printed in Bennington. In 1790, he published a work entitled "A Tour in Holland, by an American." It was printed in Worcester, Mass., though he was then in Europe. In 1791, he had published in Dublin a work entitled "Dr. Stearns's Tour from London to Paris." His "American Oracle" was published in New York, in 1791. It was printed for, and sold by Hodge & Campbell, & Co.

In this book, he states that he is the author of a treatise entitled "The Mystery of Animal Magnetism Revealed to the World." In 1801, he published by subscription "The American Herbal." It contains the names of subscribers, mostly in Vermont and New Hampshire. In the "American Oracle," under the head of chronology, is the following item:

"Dec. 29, 1782, Dr. Stearns, having made the calculations, publishes the first Nautical Almanack that ever was printed in America."

That credit is accorded to him at the present time. His "New Hypothesis Concerning the Cause of the Aurora Borealis" was formed while he was in Vermont, as thus recorded in the Oracle.

In the evening of the 26th of January 1788, as I was sitting in a large room in the state of Vermont, the weather being very severe, a cat jumped into my lap, whose hairs were stiffened with the cold; and, as I stroked them I observed that they emitted coruscations, and I began to conclude that they were the electrical fluid."

In a few minutes afterwards, he noticed the Northern Lights and reasoned that the atmosphere might likewise emit sparks, or electrical light, if it is properly stiffened with the cold, and agitated by the different currents of air. When in London, Jan. 27, 1791, he wrote a poem to commemorate his new theory of the Northern Lights.

The Oracle comprehends an account of recent discoveries in the arts and sciences. In it he records.

"Jan. 26, 1790, Dr. Stearns receives a letter from Dr. Herschel, informing that Mrs. Herschel, sister to the Doctor discovered a comet on the 7th instant."

Thus it is known that William Herschel LL.D., F.R.S., the celebrated astronomer, married a sister of Doctor Stearns.

In the Boston Athenaeum Catalogue, Samuel Stearns is credited with his degree M. D. and LL.D. It has been stated that he obtained his degree in England, but it is not known that he was a graduate from college. He says in his preface to the American Oracle, dated New York, Sept. 12, 1791, that philosophy, the liberal arts and sciences have been the objects of his early and unremitting study. The practice of physic, and the making of astronomical calculations engaged his attention for upwards of twenty years. He had a familiar acquaintance with the latest and most approved authors upon the liberal and mechanical arts and sciences, attended lectures upon physiology, chemistry, magnetism, electricity, optics, astronomy, and other branches of natural and experimental philosophy.

He invented a Tide-table for the Sea Ports of the North American continent, was astronomer for the Provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick: also, for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of Vermont.

Dr. Stearns was married before 1780, and his wife was not living at the time of his first imprisonment, for, while in jail, he wrote a poem, dated July 15, 1786, advertising himself for sale as a widower. He married twice while living in Dummerston. The second wife, Sarah, died in this town and was buried near the grave of Capt. John Metcalf. The following inscription was copied from the slate stone erected to her memory:

"The Honorable Mrs. Sarah Stearns, the amiable Consort of the Hon. Samuel Stearns, One of the Senators of the University of Aberdeen in Scotland, Physician and Master of the Canon and Civil Laws, died in this Town, Oct. 14, 1801, aged 54 years 10 months and 22 days."

The same inscription is recorded on the town book. His third marriage is recorded in the same book. The lady was the widow of Alexander Kelly, Sen. he died Jan. 15, 1803. She was the widow Albee when married to Mr. Kelley, Mar. 13, 1797, and her former residence was Bellingham, Mass.

Dr. Stearns was married to Mrs. Elizabeth Kelley, of Dummerston, Nov. 10, 1803, by Samuel Mead, Rector of the Church in Alstead, N. H., in the presence of the following witnesses,—Jason Duncan, Sarah Duncan, Jabez Butler, Experience Butler, Delia Butler, Thomas Lewis, Mehitable Lewis, Thankful Grever, Polly Town, Mary Grimmell and Philenda Smith. In the marriage certificate, he states that he was "one of the Royal Pensioners of the Kingdom of Great Britain." Thus it appears that he was successful in petitioning the king for aid.

Dr. Stearns while a resident of Dummerston, lived in the east part of the town. In 1804, he occupied what has since been called the "Birchard place." He owned one-half acre of land and one-third of the store. Jabez Butler and Asa Houghton owned the remaining two-thirds. He sold the land and his share in the store, the same year, to Butler and Houghton. The store was 40 by 60 ft. and was the first one burned on that site, when occupied by Roger Birchard. Asa Houghton, born in Bolton, Mass., Feb. 3, 1775, was a nephew of Dr. Stearns. He was in trade in this town but died in Putney, Sept. 10, 1829, where he has a daughter now living. He was an uncle of Simon W. Houghton, Esq. of Putney.

Dr. Stearns had a sister, Martha Stearns, who married Simon Houghton grandfather of Simon W. Houghton, Esq. now living in Putney. She was born in Lancaster, Mass., May 30, 1750, died Apr. 3, 1823. Her husband was born Oct. 15, 1737. Both died in Bolton, Mass., a town taken from Lancaster.

A lady now living in Dummerston, nearly 88 years old remembers the Doctor quite well. He was called to see her mother, who was sick of a fever, and she describes him as a nice looking man. His hair was white and combed straight back from his forehead and worn in a quene. During his visit to the sick woman, the doctor looked in the mirror two or three times to see whether his hair was all right.

Just how long he was a resident in this town is uncertain. His home was in Brattleboro at the time of his death. In the northwest corner of the cemetery south of Brattleboro village is a slate-stone bearing the following inscription:

*Sacred to the Memory of Samuel Stearns, LL.D., who Died Aug. 8, 1810 aged 63 years.
Self-taught.*

*Nature was his preceptor, philosophy
His mistress, and astronomy his prompter.
Disappointment ever succeeded his best
Endeavors; he deserved better.*

*Ingratitude was the reward of his labors.
Peace to his ashes.*

Note: Dr. James Conland of Brattleboro is entitled to much credit for looking up the history of Sam'l Stearns. The writer of this sketch is much indebted to him for valuable information taken from a paper read by him before the Brattleboro Professional club and published in the Vermont Phoenix, June 8, 1883.

Dr. Samuel Stearns was an inhabitant of this town many years. His torryism made it unpleasant for him to remain with the patriotic citizens of this town and he left for Canada and remained till peace was declared, after which he again returned. Before his return he spent a few years in England where he had the degree of LL.D. conferred on him. He was born at Lancaster in 1736.

THE WIDOWER IN JAIL EXPOSED TO SALE.

A NEW SONG. (BY DR. SAMUEL STEARNS.)

Ye ladies all who have a mind
In Matrimony to Engage
With me that's honest good and kind
That is nigh to fifty years of Age.

I am but of a middling Size [Sound
My Limbs are strait, ther'e good and I have a pair of bluish Eyes,
And with good health I do abound.

I have myself once married been;
It happened in my younger Age;
More than a thousand Days I've seen
Since My companion left the Stage.

My children, they all married be
And all alone I must Remain
Unless that I should chance to See
One that will Marry me again.

Hence, tho' in Prison I'm Confined
I do expose myself to Sale
And Advertise that it is my mind
To Marry tho' I am in Jail

I want a wife that is clean and neat,
That is neither Bashful nor too cold,
Whose shape, Deportment, all complete,
That is not stingy, nor a Scold.

Let such an one now visit me
Whilst in the Prison I'm Confined
And if with me, She can agree
Ourselves, in marriage we will bind.

Some Ladies often almost Cry
Because Confined in Jail I be
And whils't they're even passing by
They dare not stop to Visit me;

Because they think that in these Days.
Some people of them would make sport
If they in such Religious ways
Should once begin the men to court.

The Ladies wish me out of Jail,
Are sorry for my Dismal fate
But as I'm now exposed to sale
I hope they will no longer wait;

But Visit me without delay
That so a Husband they may find
Who to a Wife both Night and Day
Will always be exceeding kind.

Let our Great Men soon make a Law
That the Kind Ladies shall not fall
To often Visit men that Draw
Their fancies, tho' they be in Jail.

FINIS.

Composed by a Prisoner, July 15, 1786.

Note: these verses, written by Samuel Stearns were copied by the writer from the original unpublished poem, long in the possession of J. F. Stearns of Dummerston and given by him sometime before his death, to Dea. Simon W. Houghton. John F. Stearns died Nov. 25, 1872, aged 82, and is supposed to have been a relative of the doctor. The value of these verses is chiefly of a historical character, giving as they do, a description of the doctor in his own language, stating his age and circumstances in life. He was "nigh to fifty" in 1786, and must have been born in 1736, as Dea. Houghton, his sister's grandson, claims. Therefore his age should have been 73 and not 63, as engraved on the slate-stone. Mrs. Houghton always said that "Poor Samuel," as she was wont to call her brother, was much older than herself, who was born in 1750. Dea. Houghton claims also that Dr. Stearns came to Dummerston several years before 1790, and the claim is made good by the Doctor himself, who says in his book that he was in Vermont in Jan. 1788.

In the deed the farm is described as a certain tract of land in the N. EARLY ROADS.

The first committee to lay out roads in this town were chosen in Mar. 1771; Samuel Wiswall, Alexander Kathan, and Enoch Cook. At the same meeting, Benjamin Jones and Alexander Kathan were chosen surveyors of highways.

Nov. 23, 1772, the town voted to accept all the roads, as then laid out except the one leading from the meeting-house to Daniel Kathan's. After an adjournment of two hours, during which time all difficulties were adjusted so that when business was again resumed, the town voted "by a grait majority" that the road be accepted as it then run from the meeting-house, past Hosea Miller's down across Salmon brook, by the "Corn Mill" (in the Hollow) out to Daniel Kathan's and the "grate road" leading from Putney to Brattleboro. In 1773, there were only three highway districts in town. For that year, John Shepherd Gates was chosen surveyor for Dist. No. 1 in the eastern part of the town, Hosea Miller for No. 2 in the central part, and Samuel Dutton for No. 3 in the southern. June 15, 1773, John Shepherd Gates surveyor in No. 1, was instructed to have the inhabitants, living on the road leading to Putney by John Kathan's, work out their share of taxes on that road, exclusive of the road lately laid by J. Shepherd Gates' to Putney. No further record of roads was made on the town books, as now existing, till 1780, when the selectmen laid out a road from William Boyden's, past Thomas Holton's, Samuel Laughton's, down across Salmon brook and up to Lt. Daniel Gates' house where John Miller now lives. That part of the road from the brook to John Miller's is not travelled at the present day. The same year, the road was turned a few rods north of Daniel Gates' and made to run "as strate a course as the land will admit of to the meeting-house."

Before the road was straightened, the course was farther to the eastward. The road extending north to Lt. Spaulding's was probably laid out and accepted in 1772.

In May 1781, the selectmen laid out a road beginning near where Dea. Leroy Wilder now lives, running north-easterly, northerly, then northwesterly, "to the road that leads from West river to the meeting-house." A part of this road is the one now leading past Luke T. Bond's place. The road was turned in 1780, from where Stephen L. Dutton now lives, and laid out down to the road now leading past Hiram Knapp's residence, to Brattleboro.

June 1782, a road was laid out from the house of Nathaniel Haven to Paul Wilson's land, then on his lot to the road "that goes to Shep. h. Gates'."

In 1783, Josiah Boyden had a road laid out from his house to the road leading past the Temple farm.

The old road from the meeting-house to West river, went south, past Enoch Cook's, where it turned southwest, and then westerly, to the top of the hill, extending down by the Benjamin Estabrook place, straight west, past Benjamin Alvord's and Jonas Walker's place, then northwesterly to the river.

The old road leading east from the meeting-house was changed in 1782, and instead of running on the north side of Thomas Clark's house, where J. E. Worden now lives, was made to run south of his dwelling-house and was several rods farther south than the present road, leading from the common to the top of the hill on the west side of the Salmon brook.

In 1781, the selectmen laid out a road from Rufus Sargeant's place west by Elihu Sargeant's northwesterly to Josiah Kelley's, then north to Richard Kelley's: which is the road now travelled from Parker Morse's, where Rufus Sargeant lived, west by the George Hildreth place, round past the Joseph Nourse farm, even to the Hollow. The river road to Brattleboro, in those times, went from the place now owned by John Presson, over the hill by the Stephen French place, past Samuel Wheeler's, then southerly, coming out at the Willington place now owned by Milton Miller.

The road now running west, above George Knapp's place to West river, was laid out Jan. 16, 1781. The western part, ending near Addison Knapp's house, was laid out in 1783.

The road laid out across Dea. Jesse Manley's land to Putney line, was accepted in 1797. Josiah Spaulding gave a bridle-road through his land to Abraham Farr's house, and it was established in 1797. Abraham Farr lived south from the Simeon Reed place on Putney west-hill.

In 1797, the town established a bridle-road from Mr. Haven's, to Elijah Brown's also, turned the road from the Rice place to Stephen Dutton's, and accepted one from Daniel Zwear's to the "great road" over West river. No other roads are on record up to 1797, but several more must have been laid out previous to that year.

HOW THE EARLY SETTLERS LIVED.

WHAT THEY ATE: — In all the New England settlements, one common article of food was bean-porridge. It was eaten for breakfast and, oftentimes, for supper. Dinner, usually, consisted of boiled meat and some kind of vegetables, most frequently turnip. These were boiled in a large iron-pot or kettle..

To make bean-porridge, a sufficient quantity of beans were boiled with meat and turnip. When these were removed, the residue with the beans, was made into porridge. In cold weather enough was made at once to last several days. It is said in the old rhyme that it was "best when it's nine days old." However that may be, it was customary every morning, to "hang the kettle on" and serve the porridge smoking hot. After milk became plenty, that, with brown bread was eaten, usually, by families, for their evening meal. The brown bread was baked in a stone or brick oven often built separate from the house. On baking days, when the oven was sufficiently heated, the coals were removed with the "fireslice," and the oven swept clean with the "oven broom." The "bread-peel," a kind of wooden-shovel, was used to place the bread in the oven where it was baked on the bare heated stone or brick. The grandfathers and grandmothers claimed that no bread baked in a pan or dish ever tasted so sweet as it did when baked as they were accustomed to have it done.

Pumpkins were baked in the same way as bread, and also furnished a common article of food. A ripe pumpkin, having a very hard shell was taken, and a hole was cut in the stem-end some five or six inches in diameter, the piece being kept whole which was taken out. The seeds and all the stringy substance were then scraped out clean. Thus prepared, it was partly filled with new milk and covered with the piece taken out, placed in a well-heated oven and left to bake six or eight hours. It was allowed to cool in the oven, and, when served, was eaten with milk. Some scraped out the pumpkin and ate it in bowls—others turned the milk into the pumpkins and ate from the pumpkins.

Governor Chittenden in his youth often made a hearty meal in this way. Pumpkins were very much preferred to squashes by the early settlers, and few of the latter were raised.

Turnips and parsnips were raised in large quantities and were the most common vegetables. Very few potatoes were grown and scarcely a barrel would be disposed of by a large family in a year. Sweet corn, which is so extensively used at the present day, was unknown, and when corn was wanted to boil or roast in the green state, yellow corn was used. Considerable quantities of wheat were raised, but it was not much used in every-day life. Wheat-cakes were a luxury to be enjoyed when company was present. Barley cakes were eaten, and buckwheat was not much relished except as hoe-cakes and "flapjacks." Boiled and baked Indian puddings were a common diet, and Judd says in the history of Old Hadley that some families had 365 of these hard boiled puddings in a year. The style of living in "ye olden time" has been celebrated in song.

"Pottage and puddings without eustards and pies,
With turnips and parsnips are common supplies;
We have pumpkins at morning and pumpkins at night,
'Twas not for pumpkins, we should be in a plight."

Great quantities of meats were eaten. These consisted of beef and pork and the wild meats obtained in the forests, such as bear, deer, moose, wild turkeys and smaller game. The streams and rivers abounded in fish of which large quantities were caught and eaten by many families.

WHAT THEY DRANK.

It is granted that cold water was used when nothing stronger could be obtained; but strong drinks were much used, and the grandfathers were full of expedients to make them. Malt beer was a common beverage.

"If barley be wanting to make into malt,
We must then be contented, and think it no fault;
For we can make liquor, to sweeten our lips,
Of pumpkins, and parsnips, and walnut tree chips."

From the settlings in beer-barrels, our grandmothers made "Emptyings," a kind of yeast, so called because the barrels were emptied for the settlings.

Flip, a strong drink, was usually made of beer heated foaming hot with a red hot "loggerhead," and then pouring in a glass of rum. Punch was also a common drink and was passed round to the company in bowls. This kind of drink was so called because it originally contained five ingredients — water, sugar, tea, lemons, and arrack, a kind of spirit. The word means five. Later, rum was the kind of spirit used, and milk was added to make milk-punch.

Black-strap was a cheap kind of drink and was drank when nothing better could be afforded. It was made of rum sweetened with molasses. Toddy and egg-nogg furnished other varieties of drink. As soon as the people obtained orchards, cider was drank in large quantities by all classes, rich and poor. Hop-beer was also brewed and drank in large quantities. All drinking of the common people was social, all drinking from the same mug or bowl.

WHAT THEY WORE.

Garments for summer were made of tow-cloth or linen spun from flax. Wool was raised in considerable quantities and furnished the materials for winter garments. Carding, spinning, weaving, and coloring were done by the industrious females, and the cloth manufactured into garments and bed-clothing. Flax was raised in large quantities.

Instead of being mown or reaped, it was pulled and the dirt shaken very carefully from the roots. This was by general consent, the work of women and girls. The flax after it was pulled was laid out and rotted for several weeks to make the fibre suitable for breaking and preparing for spinning. The young women of nearly every family could spin and and most of them could weave. The male members of a house-hold usually went barefoot in summer time, and females in some cases went without shoes. The women were very careful of their shoes, and in some instances they would in going to church, carry their shoes, and at some convenient place before arriving, put them on.

Shoemakers or cordwainers, as they were called, were accustomed to go about from house to house, and make for each family in a neighborhood, a year's stock of boots and shoes, which was called "whipping the cat."

THEIR CONVENIENCES OF LIFE.

The style of living was necessarily simple. Their first houses were rude structures made of unhewn logs. The open spaces between the logs were filled with clay and mud, and the roof was shingled with bark or rived splints.

The interior, usually consisted of one room lighted with one or two small prison-like windows. A rough stone chimney was built at one end of the room, having a fireplace capable of receiving wood 4-feet in length, and children might sit in the corners and look up at the stars. More light was often conveyed into the room from the large chimney than from the dim little windows. One room was made to serve the purpose of kitchen, dining-room, dormitory, and parlor. Later, when boards could be procured, a more comfortable and convenient house was built, generally with two rooms, a board floor and brick chimney, on one side of which was a brick-oven. The most important apartment was the kitchen with its capacious fire-place, andirons and bellows, the crane and pot, suspended from it, showed that the day of stoves had not arrived. The commodious high-backed settle made a comfortable seat protected from the wind, whistling through the crevices. There would be found the spinning-wheel, plied by the good housewife as she found leisure; and the trusty firelock and powder-horn hung over the fireplace ever ready for any emergency.

For dishes, wooden plates were first used, then pewter, and later, "Queen's ware," which were kept in a sort of cupboard called a "dresser."

"THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS,"

was the tallow-candle or tallow-dip as it was often called. Later, the oil-lamp came into use, and lastly, kerosene and gas. Matches had not been invented, and the utmost precaution had to be taken lest their fires should go out. Fire was kept by burying a brand deep in the ashes. When the fire was out, it was necessary to obtain it from some neighbor or strike a light with the aid of flint and steel. The invention of "locofoco" matches was hailed with delight.

The line of distinction between the rich and poor, the cultivated and uncultivated, was more distinctly drawn in the early days than at the present time. They were very careful to give no titles where they were not due, and, also, as careful to write the titles of persons in affairs that were passing. Mister and Mistress were respectful forms of address for persons of rank, or ministers and their wives. In a list of 100 free-men of olden times, you will not find above four or five distinguished by Mr., although they were men of some substance. "Good man" and "good woman," often abbreviated to "goody," were the common titles.

were few but exceedingly social. Husking and quilting-bees were frequent in the farming communities. Housewarmings, house and barn-raising, the old fashioned muster, and the fourth of July nearly completed the list of entertainments.

TRAVELLING

was performed on foot or on horseback. At every house was the horse-block or convenient place to mount the horse. A man, his wife and two children could ride conveniently on the back of a strong horse. The husband held one child in front, and the wife rode behind him on a pillion, holding another, and with one hand clinging to her husband.

Before fields were fenced, cattle were kept in one drove and guarded by a man who from the nature of his employment was called a hayward.

Swine were guarded or looked after by a committee of nine persons chosen annually called "Hog-Haywards." Isaac Miller Jr., had the honor of being elected to that office in this town in 1780.

TITHING-MEN were peace officers, and were so called because they originally had charge over ten families in a neighborhood.

DEER REEVES

were officers to inform against persons who killed deer out of season, which according to law, was between January 1st and Aug. 1st.

CHURCH HISTORY

CHAPTER I.

THE OLD MEETING HOUSE: — The history of building the old meeting-house began with the first town meeting of the settlers, Mar. 4, 1771. Action was taken to secure a lot on which to build. Isaac Miller and Benjamin Jones were the committee to choose the lot. Nov. 23, 1772, the settlers accepted the lot chosen by the committee, and appointed Joseph Hildreth and Enoch Cook to forward the building. Charles Davenport and Lieut. Spaulding drew the plan of the house, 50x40. May, 1774, the town took action in regard to hiring preaching the year ensuing. The building of the house had so progressed that the town-meeting was held there on May 16, 1775.

It is inferred that the committees, Cyrus Houghton and Joseph Hildreth, did not succeed in hiring a preacher for that year, as, Aug. 22, 1775, it was voted in town-meeting that John Hooker, one of the heroes from Dummerston in the fight at the court-house at Westminster, 1775, "should carry on public worship on the Lord's day." We conclude that no person was hired to preach till 1776, when it was voted Apr. 25, "to hire preaching this year," Lieut. Leonard Spaulding, Jonathan Knight and William Boyden were chosen a committee for hiring preaching.

Nov. 19, 1776, Jonathan Knight was chosen to get, of the proprietors a lot of land to settle a minister on; Barzilla Rice, Lieut. Leonard Spaulding and Joseph Hildreth were chosen a committee to give instructions to Mr. Knight about getting the lot of land; and, as it had been previously voted to hire preaching, it is inferred that that year, as the same committee were instructed "to treat with him about the tax due him, and how much he must have before he goes away."

The committee were paid for their trouble and the interest on the money was paid to Mr. Dudley, which they had borrowed. At the same meeting the town voted to set apart, Nov. 1776, for a day of public thanksgiving in this town. There are no further town records till February 1780. The records for the intervening time have been lost.

When Rev. Joseph Farrar was hired to preach, the house was in a very uncomfortable condition. There were but few, if any, pews built till 9 years after the church was organized, in 1779. In 1788, a committee was chosen for building pews, and a porch over the front door. Gallery-pews were sold that year to furnish money to build other pews and finish more pews in the gallery. Windows, having glass, were not furnished for the house till 1790, at which time $60 was raised for that purpose. These windows were finished in 1791, and the committee drew orders on the town for making the sashes, glazing and putting them in, July, 1783; and voted for finishing the porch 60x60, and yet after it was finished, it was not considered of much service to the town, for Aug. 15, 1786, it was voted to sell the "present porch to build a pound." Dan Hibbard and Moses Taylor agreed to build the pound 30 feet square of round poles for the porch. At the same meeting the town voted to build "stocks, and to have the post of the stocks be the whipping post." At the time the pews were built in 1788, the town voted to build another porch over the front door, 14 feet square in order to save room for four pews. The amount realised for the sale, of pews, 37 in number, was 700. In 1794, the house was plastered for the first time at an expense of $150; furthermore, Charles Davenport Jr. was hired by the town, that year, to sweep the meeting-house, once per quarter for the sum of 75 cents.

[Information received since the above was in type.]

John Hooker should, also, be included in the committee for building the church, chosen, Dec. 28, 1772.

The pews were sold Nov. 20, 1786, for $479, and were built in 1788, with money thus received: 36 were sold and one reserved for the town, making 37 in all. In the first paragraph, May 1774 should be April 25, 1776.

THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH in Dummerston was organized Aug. 18, 1779, with 16 members:

REV. JOSEPH FARRAR, FIRST PASTOR:
members: Joseph Farrar, Thomas Holton, Joseph Temple, Aaron Brooks,

John Crawford, John French, Joseph Temple Jr., Amos Rice, Mary French, Sarah Holton, Sarah Town, and Hannah Brooks, The Ecclesiastical Council which organized the church, represented the churches in Patney, Brattleboro, and Chesterfield, N. H.; Jonah Goodhue was moderator.

It is not stated in either church or town records, at what time Mr. Farrar began preaching in this town. He was probably installed in Aug. 1779. The first two children were baptised August 29, 1779, daughters of Samuel and Susanna Loughton, Esther and Susanna. The church records were first kept on loose pieces of paper and some of them being lost, the account is imperfect.

When Mr. Farrar was first settled, the town gave him a deed of the farm on which he resided during his ministry. The town acted in concert with the church in the management of its affairs, so far as respects the settlement and dismission of ministers, and payment of their salaries. During his pastorate, about 5 years, 129 children were baptised—a large number compared with the infant baptisms in more modern times. It may in part be accounted for by the fact persons not in full communion, were allowed to present their children in this ordinance. Frequent records are made to this effect. Certain persons renewed their covenant and became entitled to baptism for their children. Besides 32 persons were received into full communion; a few by letter, the rest by profession, and a large proportion were heads of families. These additions were scattered along, equally over the time of his pastorate. There was no special ingathering at any one time, and this constant increase would indicate faithfulness on the part of the pastor and a healthful growth of the church; and it is probable that others were received into the church besides those who appear on the record.

The church chose its first deacons in 1783: Amos Rice, Thomas Loughton, and Nathaniel Holmes. Mr. Farrar was dismissed May 12, 1784, by an ecclesiastical council in which were represented the churches in Westminster, and Hinsdale, and Chesterfield, N. H.

May 31st. the town voted to accept the referees: John Sessions, Luke Knowlton, and John Bridgman, mutually chosen on the 13th Inst. by Mr. Farrar on one part, and the church and town committee on the other. July 22d., the town voted to have the selectmen and their investors take the deed of Rev. Joseph Farrar, in behalf of the town. Also, voted unanimously to secure John Shepherd Gates, William Boyden, and Thomas Clark, the present selectmen, who have taken the deed of Mr. Farrar in behalf of the town, and make good all cost and damages that may accrue to them by reason of any suit or suits brought against them on account of their obligations given as aforesaid. In September the committee settled with Mr. Farrar and paid him the amount due on his salary.

Some information concerning

and family. Neither the church records, nor the town records of Dummerston, furnish any information in regard to Rev. Joseph Farrar's place of residence before he was settled here in the ministry or where he went after his dismission. During the summer of 1882, we chanced to see a copy of the "History of Marlboro, N. H." and learned several families, having the same name, Farrar, resided in that town.

This history and a correspondence with the author, Charles A. Bemis, furnished this information. The name Farrar signifies iron, and was, doubtless, first used to designate a locality where that metal was found. As a family name it was first known in England from Walkeline de Farrars, a Norman of distinction attached to William, Duke of Normandy, before the invasion of 1066. From him, all of the name, in England and America, are descended. His son, Henry de Farrars, was the first of the family to settle in England, soon after the Conquest. The family became very numerous in England. Among the original proprietors of Lancaster, Mass., were two brothers, John and Jacob, as early as 1653. Tradition says they came from Lancashire, England.

Jacob, left his wife and children in England till a new residence was prepared for them in Lancaster, 1658. He died in Woburn, Mass., 1677. His eldest son, Jacob, b. in England, probably about 1642, m. 1668, Hannah, dau. of George Hayward. He was killed by the Indians, Aug. 22, 1675. George, second son of Jacob Jr., b. Aug. 16, 1670, m. Sept. 9, 1692, Mary Howe, and settled in that part of Concord, now Lincoln. He died May 15, 1760. His wife d. Apr. 12, 1761. Daniel, the second son of George and Mary (Howe) Farrar, b. Nov. 30, 1696; m. Hannah Fletcher; settled in Sudbury, and died about 1755. Josiah, the eldest son of Daniel, b. Sept. 1722; m. 1745, Hannah Taylor of Northboro. Her father, John Taylor, was a man of considerable note and a tory of the Revolution, whose name was borne by a former governor of New Hampshire, John Taylor Gilman. Daniel, a brother of Josiah was born in 1724; m. 1748, Mary—.

Phineas, a son of Josiah, was the father of Calvin, whose eldest daughter, Caroline Eliza, married Levi Brown of Waterford, Maine, and became the mother of Charles Farrar Brown whose nom de plume was "Artemas Ward."

Rev. Joseph Farrar was the third and youngest son of George Farrar of Lincoln, Mass., and was born probably in that town, June 30, 1744. He was doubtless, a great-grandchild of George Farrar, b. 1670, and whose death occurred in 1760. He graduated at Harvard college, 1767, and married July 28, 1779, Mary Brooks of Grafton, Mass., b. Feb. 4, 1755, and who lived to be over one hundred years old and celebrated her one-hundredth birth-day by attending church. Rev. John J. Putman preached, on the occasion, from Prov. XVI. 3. "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness."

The history of Dublin, N. H., states that Rev. Joseph Farrar was the first settled gospel minister in that town, ordained June 10, 1772; dismissed June 4, 1776, and enlisted in the Revolutionary army, serving for a time as chaplain and leaving the army became the first settled minister in Dummerston.

After leaving Dummerston he became the first settled pastor in Eden, 1811; (Vol. II. Vt. His. Gaz.); 1815, removed to Petersham, Mass., where he died Apr. 5, 1816, aged 72 years. Children of Rev. Joseph and Mary Brooks Farrar:

Joseph, b. Apr. 4, 1780; resided in Petersham, Mass.

Mary, b. Oct. 18, 1781, died Apr. 13, 1786;

Joel, b. July 28, 1784, died April 13, 1786;

Reuel, born Nov. 5, 1786; settled in Petersham, Mass;

Anna, b. Feb. 10, 1789. Sally, b. Jan. 20, 1794;

Humphrey, b. Aug. 13, 1798; settled in Petersham, Mass.

The salary of Rev. Mr. Farrar was 40 pounds or $133 2-3 a year. A part of his salary was paid in hard money, the rest in produce and wood. June 15, 1782, the town "Voted to except Wm. Negus & Lieut. Leonard Spaulding, to provide wood (24 cords) for Mr. Farrar one year from this Day for Ten Dollars or three Pounds."

After the dismissal of Mr. Farrar, was employed in the ministry. The records of the church during his ministry, as well as previous to it, are very defective. Mr. Crosby commenced his ministry in 1784, and preached about 3 years without settlement. His salary was raised from year to year by the town. In December 1786, a call was given to him to settle and a salary offered to him, £66 per year, to be paid in grain. One third part in wheat at 4s. 8d. per bushel; one third in Indian corn at 2s. 8d.

Mr. Crosby accepted the call and the salary giving any individual tax payer liberty to pay his share of it, in either kind of grain that would be most convenient for him to spare. This privilege was given on condition that it be paid within three or four months when it became due. During Mr. Crosby's ministry there were 180 baptisms and about 50 admissions to the church.

Difficulties arose in the town in those days: and an unhappy contest was continued for a long time, relating to the "ministerial lot of land." Some person engaged in this contest, destroyed the town-records, extending over eight pages; and as no church records were kept, no particulars can be given.

All that is to be found on the church book is the record of baptisms and admissions. By those who remember Mr. Crosby, he is said to have been "a good man;" but in the latter part of his ministry, "an abused man."

There was a meeting of the church May 8, 1804, for the purpose of dismissing of the pastor. The reason given for asking a dismission was "want of health." The church voted to comply with his request. Four churches were represented in the council: Brattleboro, Newfane, Marlboro, and Westminster. The council met May 16, 1804. Rev. Hezekiah Taylor, pastor of the church in Newfane, was chosen moderator, and Rev. Sylvester Sage of Westminster was appointed scribe. After Mr. Crosby made a statement of the condition of his health and of his desire not to be a hinderance to the established ministrations of the word and ordinances of the gospel, the council expressed the unanimous opinion that it was expedient that his request should be granted. The church appears to have been in a harmonious state, were attached to their minister, and parted reluctantly with him, as also did the council.

Mr. Crosby removed to Newfane and resided during the remainder of his life with a son who owned a farm there,—[As recorded in the history of Newfane, as also an account of his death.—ED.]

Children of Rev. Aaron Crosby and Mary, his wife, were: Mary, born Nov. 25, 1776, at Cherry Valley, New York; Eli, b. Nov. 7, 1778, at Blanford, Mass.

After Rev. Joseph Farrar, the first settled minister in town was dismissed, the town voted, a sum of money to supply the pulpit, and in 1785, the Rev. Aaron Crosby was paid for that service, and became afterward, the second settled minister for this town.

Oct. 17, 1785, the town "voted to raise money or Produce to pay the Rev'd Aaron Crosby for the Half year which is to come."

John Miller, a grandson of the collector, has in his possession the original bill of which the following copy is made:

History of Vermont which he had nearly prepared for the press, when he was suddenly arrested by death—leaving no other patrimony to his bereaved family, but the work in manuscript, upon which he had bestowed much labor, and which was published in 1846, for the benefit of his widow. He died Oct. 15, 1843, Æ 64 years. Rev. Amos. Foster of Putney preached the funeral sermon, taking for his text, Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Ps. 116:15.

ORVIS FAMILY.

SAMUEL ORVIS was from Framingham, Ct., and came to Northfield, Mass., Jan. 30, 1718, where he was offered 30 acres of land, on condition that he would come with his family and stay 4 years. In 1720, he sold land to Rev. Benjamin Doolittle and his home-lot to Stephen Belding.

William Orvis was probably a son of Samuel, and born in Shrewsbury, Ct., 1709. He was in Winchester in 1743; Northfield, 1749, and died June 14, 1774. His first wife, Anna, died Aug. 19, 1746. He married 2d, Martha, in 1750, who died Sept. 30, 1754, and in 1755, Elizabeth Severance for his third wife. His son, William, born May 8, 1740, removed to Leyden about 1785. He married about 1764, Mindwell, a sister of Thomas Holton who afterwards was a resident of Dummerston, to which place William removed, and died Jan. 11, 1801, aged 61 years.

William Orvis, sen. was in the old French and Indian wars. His name was on the roll of Lt. John Catlin's men from Dec. 10, 1747, to June 10, 1748. Lt. Catlin, with 39 men, was posted at Fort Shirley in the winter of 1747. The name of William Orvis also appears in the list of proprietors of Northfield, Mass., in 1751. He owned and paid taxes on 100 acres, lot No. 16, 4th division. He was in the last French and Indian war, 1756, and his name appears on Capt. John Catlin's muster roll, 2d Co., "in service at the westward," Oct. 13 to Dec. 11. "History of Northfield by Temple and Sheldon."

BUTLER FAMILY.

JABEZ BUTLER was a Revolutionary soldier. He died and was buried in the cemetery east of the Hollow. During his last sickness he requested that he might be buried with military honors. He was laid out, in his uniform, having on a military hat, boots and spurs.

His sword was sheathed and fastened to a belt-buckle around his body. Thus uniformed he was laid in the coffin and buried with his head to the northwest and feet to southeast. Two graves, one each side of his, are made in the same way. No stone marks his resting place. In accordance with his request, a certain number of bricks was laid in mortar on his grave and on that foundation was built a fence three rails high, made of 3-inch scantling, set diamonding in the posts and painted white. The fence has long since gone to decay and the brick foundation broken up and much scattered.

ABEL BUTLER married Rebecca, dau. of Thomas Laughton, sen. Children: Rebecca, b. Apr. 24, 1788; Abel, born Jan. 5, 1790; Lucy, b. Apr. 4, 1792; Sally, b. 1794, d. 1795; Sally (2d), b. Jan. 7, 1796; Candace, b. Apr. 12, 1798.

JABEZ BUTLER, brother of Abel, m. Deliverance Whitney, May 12, 1781, a sister of Maj. Josiah Boyden's wife.

SILAS BUTLER, brother of Abel, m. 1st, Mercy Orvis, May 15, 1796, 2d, Sally McFarland, Jan. 25, 1816. The children by the first marriage were Hiram, b. Apr. 14, 1799, Mercy, born June 14, 1802; Maria, born Sept. 27, 1804.

JOHN BUTLER, another brother of Abel, married Lucy Boyden, Oct. 16, 1788. She was a sister of Col. Wm. Boyden.

Polly Butler was a sister of Abel, Silas, Jabez, Calvin and John. She married Pairla (Perley) Town, Sept. 5, 1803, and they lived at the "upper mill" near the George Knapp place. Her parents died when she was young.

Abigail, wife of John Butler, died May 10, 1785, aged 50, and they, John and Abigail, may have been the parents of these Butlers, though not certain. Possibly Paul Butler was their father.

Abel and Rebecca Butler lived several years on the place now owned by Milton Knapp. They removed from town many years ago.

PETER BUTLER married Betsey Laughton, Apr. 30, 1795. She was an aunt of Asa Laughton, who died 1883. After the marriage of Peter, he lived for a time in the same house with Jabez Butler. The house stood on the north side of a little brook which runs through the farm of James Reed north of his buildings. A son of Peter, six or eight years of age, was drowned while fishing with older children in the brook where it enters the land now owned by Sylvanus Kelley.

Calvin Butler married Obedience Holton and the name of one child, Ira, is recorded, born Nov. 11, 1787.

JOHN BUTLER, who married Phebe Chase of Brattleboro, Aug. 7, 1791, lived where Lemuel Dickinson now resides. Their children were Whitney, b. May 12, 1792; Philinda, b. Mar. 19, 1796; Ora, b. Oct. 15, 1798. John was a cousin of Abel Butler.

SMITH BUTLER m. Thankful Houghton, Dec. 20, 1780, who died Dec. 27, 1783, aged 27.

SIMEON BUTLER married Nabby Rice, June 10, 1789.

LUTHER BUTLER married Hannah Wilson of Putney, Aug. 25, 1790.

TEMPLE FAMILY.

MOSES TEMPLE was the ancestor of the Temples who settled in Dummerston before 1770. According to the usual difference in time from generation to generation, he was born 1665. His son, Richard, was the father of who was born about 1718. Joseph sen. was a native of Massachusetts and a cooper by trade. He married Mary, sister of Samuel Laughton. Children:

Joseph, b. in Worcester, Mass., Dec. 23, 1743; Parmenas m. Anna, dau. of John Laughton jr. about 1777.

Amos, unmarried; Samuel m. widow Wing; Daniel, unmarried; Joanna married 1st. John Crawford, 2d. Aaron Wilder Dec. 26, 1784;

Phebe "died of nervous headache."

Joseph Sen., Joseph Jr. and John Crawford were among the members of the Congregational church when first organized in 1779.

Joseph Sen. set out seven small elms near his son's house, now occupied by Alonzo Bradley. Only one of these trees is left standing. It measures 18 feet around, is nearly 100 feet in height and estimated to contain 8 cords of wood. It stands in the roadside a few rods north of the house, and a statelier looking tree, the passer-by will seldom find.

It is also related of Mr. Temple that on one occasion, when he was returning on horse-back from a visit to Worcester, a violent storm of wind arose. While passing through the woods, he saw trees falling in every direction and hurried on to escape the impending danger. Soon after leaving the woods, he looked back and saw that the hurricane had swept down the whole forest through which he had just passed. The same storm did much damage in Dummerston. On the Miller farm joining the Temple place, a wood lot was blown down, in which the cows out at pasture, had taken refuge, and it was supposed that all the cattle were killed by falling trees. On making search for the cows, the men took knives with them for the purpose of removing the hides. As they approached the woods, they heard the cow-bell sounding, and very soon found all the cattle safe in an enclosure, made by the fallen trees, from which they could not escape till a passage was cut.

JOSEPH TEMPLE, JR., settled on lot, No. 36, in the town survey, made in 1767. He walked from Worcester, bringing what few things he had in a pack on his shoulders. His first work on the new farm was in cutting a large hollow bass-wood and fitting it for a place in which to sleep. He was obliged to build fires near his sleeping place at night in order to keep away wild animals. His log-house was built about 70 rods S. W. from the present buildings on the farm and its site may still be seen whenever the land is ploughed. That portion of the farm on which it stood, including several acres of land was sold many years ago, and it is now a part of Joseph Miller's farm. Mr. Temple's parents came from Worcester to live with him on his new homestead. His father was in poor health and died of consumption some years afterward.

Joseph Jr., married 1st. Elizabeth Wilder and had two children that died in infancy. He married 2d. Lois Hubbard of Chesterfield, N. H. She and her parents were residents of Rutland, Mass., and her brother, Ephraim, came to Chesterfield before 1770. Her father married 1st., Ruth Gates, 2d, Sarah Billings. Lois, Ruth, and Ephraim Hubbard were children by the first marriage. Ruth m. Francis Maynard. Ephraim m. 1st. Lucy Willard, 2d. Thankful Butler, wid. of Josiah Butler. The children by the 2d marriage were Amos, who m. Leah Farr; Oliver m. Lois Baker; James m. ——— Browning; Jonathan; Joel m. Phebe ———; Molly m. Jason Reed.

The children of Joseph and Lois Temple were:

Elizabeth, b. Oct. 27, 1772, m. Anthony Mason of Putney, Jan. 20, 1793;

Lois, b. Jan. 1, 1775, m. Samuel Murdock.

Sarah, b. June 21, 1778, m. Lewis Fisher of Putney, Feb. 19, 1806;

Joseph, b. Jan. 18, 1781.

The father of these children was in the skirmish at Westminster, Mar. 13, 1775. He was knocked down and, for a time, supposed to be dead. His skull was fractured on the left side of the forehead, and the scar remained during life. He had a pewter basin, which he carried, with a blanket, in his knapsack. It was hit by one or two bullets which did not penetrate, but left depressions. The marks were so plainly to be seen that the basin was kept as a relic, in the family many years. At last a tin peddler secured the trophy for old pewter, but not by fair means. He took advantage of Joseph Temple's (3d) good nature, crushed the basin with his hands, spoiling it for a relic, and then paid the price which Mr. Temple asked for the spoiled dish.

Joseph Jr., deeded the farm to his son, Joseph, Mar. 16, 1802, who m., Dec. 29, 1803, Amy, dau. of William Perry of Putney, a sea captain. Their children were:

Amos, b. Sept. 9, 1804, m. Marilla Bennett.

Amy, b. Jan. 24, 1807, m. Alfred Bennett, Nov. 12, 1829;

Sally, b. 1809, married Calvin Bradley Nov. 12, 1829;

Emeline, b. Dec. 12, 1814; Zilpha, b. Mar. 19, 1819, m. Willard Dodge, Sept. 5, 1837.

When Mr. Temple and wife became aged, he deeded the farm, Apr. 9, 1859, to Alfred Bennett and continued to live with him on the old homestead.

Mr. Bennett had four children: two died young. Harriet, his daughter, m. Alonzo Bradley; Joseph F., his son, m. Augusta Bradley, and his father, Alfred, deeded the farm to him Jan. 8, 1872. He died May 23, 1872, aged 69.

Joseph F. Bennett died Oct. 15, 1875, leaving a widow and one daughter.

Jason Duncan was the first school-teacher in town. When a young man, he taught a small school in a dwelling-house on the river road in the eastern part of the town. [It is, also stated on page 36, that Charles Davenport taught the first school]

Samuel Duncan was a distant relative of Dr. Abel and first cousin to Judge Duncan. Samuel lived and died on the place where Clark Rice once lived. No buildings are now standing in the place. He had a family of 11 children. Samuel, his son, died on the same place where his father had lived.

Billerica was first settled about the year 1653, and among the names of the first principal settlers are John Rogers and Thomas Richardson, probably, ancestors of the wives of John and Simon Duncan.

"During the French and Indian war, Aug. 5, 1695, the Indians made an attack on the inhabitants of this place. In the northerly part of the town, on the east of Concord river, lived several families, who, though without garri- sons and in time of war, felt no apprehensions of danger. Their remoteness from the frontiers might have contributed to their apparent security. The Indians came suddenly upon them in the daytime. They entered the house of John Rogers while he was sleeping, and discharged an arrow at him, which entered his neck and pierced the jugular vein. Awakened by this sudden attack, he started up, seized the arrow, which he forcibly withdrew, and expired with the instrument of death in his hand. A woman being in the chamber, threw herself out of the window, and, though severely wounded, made her escape concealing herself among the flags.

A young woman was scalped and left for dead but survived the painful operation, and lived many years afterwards. A son and daughter of Mr. Rogers were made prisoners. Thomas Rogers and his son were killed."

Very early, next morning, the Doctor came in haste and asked excitedly about the patient and the medicine. After learning that the medicine had not been given as he ordered, he said, after looking at it, "You did well not to give it to the woman, for if you had it would have killed her dead as the devil." "The fact is," said he, "people wait till they are almost dead, then send for drunken Dr. Baker.

He sold it to Ephraim Rice Jan. 9, 1779, who, with Joanna, his wife, and six children, came from Petersham, Mass., where their children were born. Elijan, his son, bought the farm in 1787, which in time came into the possession of his son, Clark Rice, who greatly improved the place. He was an excellent farmer, read many books and newspapers on the subject of agriculture, and was aided by the judgment of his friends, who were alike interested in "book-farming."

The value of the farm was more than doubled during his management. On account of his declining health, he sold his farm to R. D. Bradley, Esq. of Brattleboro, for the sum of $9000.

Like his parents, Elijah, and Anna Rice, he and his family were Congregationalists and very constant in their attendance at church. He was not only a very enterprising farmer; but was much interested and helpful in the affairs of the church and society and in 1838, was chosen to represent the town in the state legislature. He set out many fruit-trees on his farm, which at the present time are very productive.

The orchards have in some years produced 500 barrels of apples.

An incident remembered in the town :

MAJOR WILLIAM MILLER

and Hannah, his wife, lived in the eastern part of the town on the Connecticut river road, and owned good lands. They were the parents of eleven children. Mrs. Miller was always kind to the poor and ever willing to relieve the wants of the suffering. About the year 1786, there was in this section an alarming scarcity of grain for family food.

The Millers parted with all they that they could to the needy, and the last bushel of wheat, except a baking of flour for their own family was ground and eaten before the new grain had been cut. The destitution was much greater on the newly cleared and rougher hill-land of Halifax.

Joseph Worden came one night, at a late hour, from that town, and stopped at Miller's. Mrs. Miller rose from her bed, baked the last flour she had by the fire, and gave him a part of the loaf for his supper. He said that he had never tasted anything so good in his life, for he was weak and weary, and had tasted no bread for several days. The next day the men went into the wheat-field, picked off the ripest ears, threshed out a bushel or more, and had it ground. Mrs. Miller was sifting some flour for baking, when Mr. Worden, her brother, came to her, the tears standing in his eyes, "Sister," said he, "wont you put the bran into my bag?" This proof of his family's want so affected her that she gave him more than half of all the flour she had, and the happy man started for home, knowing that he could now relieve the necessities of his family."

HERRICK FAMILY.

The traditions of this very ancient family claim their descent from Ericke, a Danish chief, who invaded Britain about the year 911, during the reign of Alfred, the Great, and, having been vanquished by that prince, was compelled, with his followers, to re-people the waste districts of East Anglia, the government of which he held as a fief of the English crown. He was afterwards defeated in battle by Edward, the son and successor of Alfred, and was subsequently slain by his own subjects for alleged cruelty in his government. The Norman invasion found this name represented by Eric, the Forester, who resided in Leicestershire, and was an extensive land-holder. Henry Eyryk, a lineal descendant from Eric, the Forster, was seated at Great Stratton, in the county of Leicester, England, at a very remote period. His grand-son, Robert Eyryk of Stratton, by his wife, Joanna, had William, who bore the title of Sir William Eyryk, Knight of Stratton. He was commissioned to attend the Prince of Wales on his expedition into Gascony, 1355. From him descended Robert Eyrick of Houghton, who was living in 1450.

Thomas Eyrick of Houghton, settled in Leicester, and died in 1517. His second son, John Eyryk, or Herrick, born 1513, m. Mary, daughter of John Bond, Esq., of Ward End in Warwickshire. He died Apr. 2, 1589, leaving a large family, among whom was William, b. 1557. He was a member of Parliament from 1601, to 1630, knighted in 1605, and was known as Sir William Herrick of Leicester, London, and Beau Manor Park. He married 1596, Joan, daughter of Richard May, Esq., London, died Mar. 2, 1652-53, aged 96.

Henry, the fifth son of Sir William, was born at Beau Manor in 1604, and was named by command of the unfortunate Prince Henry, the eldest son of James I. His sponsors were Sir David Murry, Sir John Spillman, and Lady Aston. He came to this country and settled in Salem, Mass., June 24, 1629. He married Edith, daughter of Mr. Hugh Laskin of Salem, and became the ancestor of the numerous race by that name in this country. He and his wife were among the thirty who founded the first church in Salem, in 1629. He died in 1671, leaving seven sons and a daughter, who are named in his will. Of these, Thomas and Benjamin, the eldest and youngest, and the daughter, Elizabeth, died childless. The other five sons are regarded as the patriarchs of their respective branches of the posterity of Henry and Editha Herrick. They are known as Zacharie of Beverly, Ephraim of Beverly, Henry of Beverly, Joseph of Salem, and John of Beverly.

George Herrick of Salem, another ancestor of the family, was an emigrant from England, and came to Salem in 1684 or 5. He was marshal and deputy sheriff in 1691, 2. & 3; & 1695. His wife's name was Martha.

It was taken from the southwest corner of his farm, lot, No. 54. The Lincolns built on this land a large tannery and a dwelling-house. The tannery stood a few rods west of the house at the foot of the hill east of the common. It fronted to the south and the upper part of the building was entered from the old road, leading past the tannery. Several of the tan-vats were in the basement of the building. Amasa Lincoln sold his half of the property to Allen Lincoln, Mar. 11, 1817, and removed to Newfane. Allen continued the business till Nov. 21, 1821, when he sold out to Adin Thayer, who on the same day sold to Asa Knight.

Jacob Amsden, a tanner, bought of Asa Knight and soon after sold to Luther Thayer, who put into the tannery, a steam apparatus for heating the vats. About 1830, the tannery was burned, and a much smaller building immediately built on the spot. The business however, soon declined, and the new building was removed, attached to the dwelling-house on the place and converted into a shoe-shop.

Henry L. Porter rented the place for a time and worked at shoe-making. After two or three more changes, Adin Thayer bought the property and sold the same to Lewis Holton, who did an extensive business in making fancy morocco shoes. Mr. Holton, his wife; and two children, died of erysipelas in Jan. 1844, and the place was sold at auction to Wm. O. Miller. William Luck, an Englishman, rented the shop for a time. He served a regular apprenticeship in England and was an excellent shoemaker. No workman could make a more handsome boot or shoe than Mr. Luck. He served for a time in the British army, but deserted and came to this country. What was once the tannery, then a shoe-shop, is now the building joined to the west side of Wm. O. Miller's residence. He never learned to read or write. On one occasion he had a sign painted for his shop. His name and occupation, in lettering, required two lines; but when the painter showed him the sign, he refused to take it, saying, "what man can read twice across that board while riding past my shop?"

DISTRICTS AND INHABITANTS IN 1793.

In connection with the old tax bill for 1802, it will be interesting to know in what part of the town most of the families lived near the close of the last century. From the report of a committee for dividing the town into school districts, Dec. 10, 1793, of whom Jonathan Knight was chairman, the following information is obtained: The Centre School plot for the Town of Dummerston was

The oldest tax bill we have examined in this town, was for the year 1806. It contains a list of 295 tax-payers who were to pay a tax of one cent on the "general list" of said Dummerston, and is signed by Samuel Porter and Seth Hudson, selectmen of the town. At that time there were eight tax-payers in town, by the name of Kathan, and twelve named Miller. The most singular name on the list is Zwear. Asa Dutton was the largest tax-payer, his tax being $4.65. The only man now living (1871) whose name is on this bill, is Jonas Walker who still resides in town at the venerable age of 90 years. The tax bill for 1807, shows that Henry Willard was the largest land holder at that time, and owned 418 acres. Thomas Clark stands next having 416 acres. The tax is an assessment of one cent on each acre of land for the purpose of building a State Prison. The tax for 1808, was one cent on a dollar of the grand list, and it appears from the examination of other bills, that it was the general rate of taxation in those days. It was the custom also to make a new bill for each kind of tax assessed for the year; and this plan was followed until sometime after Wm. O. Miller received the office of constable and collector. Mr. Miller was chosen in 1844, and has collected the taxes each year since, except two, making a service at the present time (1879) of 33 years. The tax-book now in use, of which Joseph Steen of Brattleboro has a copy-right or claim of some kind, and which Mr. Miller himself used for sometime previous to the year 1867, at which time he suggested to Mr. Steen the method now used, has the names and grand list written on the left hand page and exhibits on the right the different kinds of taxes, including town, state, school and county. The tax-book for 1871, when this article was first written contains 380 names, and of this number fourteen are Millers and but two Kathan. Among old deeds we mention two that are ancient; one is dated 1739, the other 1754.

STAUBBACH FALLS*

is a new name for a very beautiful fall near West river, in The Hague, on a stream called Fall brook, because the descent from its source is so precipitous. What is now called Staubbach Falls has long been known as "Fall Brook Falls." It is a charming retreat in the forest, and exceedingly romantic. A winding path, shaded by evergreen trees, leads up from the highway beside the brook, along the southern bank to the waterfall. The steep, rugged banks, prostrate, decaying old trees, projecting rocks, moss-grown and covered with ferns, give a primitive look to the locality. The ravine is deep and its northern bank just below the falls rises to a height of more than a hundred feet. The brook runs over a ledge nearly perpendicular and 60 feet in height. Years ago the fall was 10 or 15 feet more than it now is, as freshets have washed in a quantity of large stones at the foot of the ledge. The brook is three miles in length and has its source on Putney West Hill.

WARNING OUT OF TOWN.

The custom of warning persons out of town, who, in the opinion of the selectmen, were liable to become a "Town charge," went into practice here soon after the organization of the township. The following warrant, copied from the old records, shows the kind of instructions then issued to the constables by the selectmen:

"State of Vermont Windham County Dummerston Apr. ye 2d, 1781 To Either of the Constables in the Town of Dummerston Greeting: In the Name & behalf of the freemen and by the Authority of the same we command you forthwith to Warn all the tranchent Persons that is not Inhabitants in this Town that have not been in the Town one year from this Date that is liable to be a Town Charge to Depart forthwith out of the Town with their Families if any they have."

The order does not state what constitutes a freeman, or an inhabitant beyond one year's residence. In order to be exempt from being warned out, it was probably necessary to be "native born," or the owner of some real estate. To the authorities there must be some visible means of support, something external in the appearance of the new comer, or he must leave within a year from his time of advent. If he had "but a thousand a year," known only to himself, he must go according to the warning. Good habits, honesty, uprightness, and educational accomplishments, would not qualify a man for citizenship.

According to the order issued Apr. 2, 1781, the families warned out, were John and Susanna Fuller; heirs, Lyman and Raymaund Fuller; Woods and family; Nancy Woods; Ebenezer How and Lucy, Patty, and Charity How; James Coats; Israel Rich and family; Adam Fleeman; Margaret, Solomon, Adam Jr., Mary Magdalene, and Eunice Fleeman; John Day; Anna and Margaret Day; David Russell; Caty Morse; Abner Bemis; Catherine Bemis; Joseph and Jemima Bemis. Date of warnings Apr. 14, and 18, 1781.

Very little is now remembered in regard to the condition of these families, warned out of town that year, except that of Joseph and Jemima (Stoddard) Bemis. Mr. Bemis was about 24 years old, had one child at that time and had served through the Revolutionary war, He must have been all right physically. He did not "depart immediately," but remained to earn a living without "Town charge," bring up a family of six children, buy and pay for a good farm, inherited by his children, and died at the advanced age of 79 years, a respected, worthy citizen. His son, Joseph Jr., born in Dummerston, Aug. 5, 1786, is now living (1884) in New York State, in his 98th year.

POVERTY YEAR.

The year 1816, well remembered by the oldest citizens, as the cold season or "Poverty-year." It was known in New England as eighteen-froze-to-death. There was frost every month in the year, though August was exempt from frost in some localities. The mean mercurial temperature that year was about 43°. Snow fell in June and frost cut down the growing corn. The early frosts of September destroyed the unripe corn, which some farmers vainly tried to save by early husking and spreading. Famine stared every one in the face and it was a hard year for all, though some of the river farmers had fair crops when all others failed. The crop of English grain was heavy and this saved the inhabitants from partial famine. The only field of corn that ripened in this town, that year, was on the "Haven farm," and the crop was raised by "uncle" Jairus Haven, a man now [1881] living at the age of 92 years. He is very deaf, but when he is made to understand that something is desired from him about 1816, he is pleased to relate his success in raising corn that year. About 15 miles up the river on the New Hampshire side in Walpole was a wealthy farmer, Thomas Bellows Esq., who had a good crop of corn.

He had more than he needed for his own use, and what he had to spare was sold in small quantities at the price in years of plenty to such men as needed it for their families and could pay for it only in day's labor, and were obliged to carry it home in a bag on their backs. Speculators were hard hearted in those days, as now, and took advantage of the situation of affairs to speculate in corn. One such man called on the "Squire" to purchase corn and inquired his price. He was much surprised to learn that it was no more than in years of plenty, and said he would take the corn, "How much would you like," inquired Mr. Bellows? "I will take all you have to spare," said the speculator. "You cannot have it," stammered the Squire, for he had an impediment in his speech. "If you want a bushel for your family, you can have it at my price, but no man can buy of me to speculate in this year of scarcity." The story was told to George B. Bartlett, a visitor in Walpole some years since, and it so impressed him that he embodied it in a little poem, we christen

THE OLD SQUIRE.

In the time of the sorrowful famine year
When crops were scanty and bread was dear,
The good Squire's fertile and sheltered farm
In the valley nestled secure from harm:
For the Walpole hills, in their rugged might Softened the chill winds deathly blight,
So the sweet Connecticut's peaceful stream
Reflected the harvest's golden gleam:
And the buyers gathered with eager greed
To speculate on the poor man's need;
But the good Squire said "It is all in vain;
No one with money can buy my grain;
But he who is hungry may come and take
An ample store for the giver's sake.
The good old man to his rest has gone,
But his fame still shines in the golden corn,
For every year in its ripening grain,
The grand old story was told again.
Of him whose treasure was laid away
In the banks that seven-fold interest pay;
For to feed the hungry and clothe the poor
Is a speculation that's always sure.

EARLY MILITARY HISTORY.

GOING TO WESTMINSTER.

The early records of this town furnish but little information of a military character. The first warlike event in which the inhabitants manifested much excitement, was the fight at Westminster in 1775, when William French was killed, and Daniel Houghton mortally wounded. The company from Brattleboro, including French, stopped on their way to the court-house, at Ebenezer Haven's in this town, and were quite merry and boisterous. They laughed and joked about the grand time they should have in preventing the court party from taking their seats. Mrs. Haven thought they had cause to feel sober, and told them, their joy would be changed to sadness before they returned, a prophecy that was indeed, verified.

THE DUMMERSTON YORKER,

Alexander Kathan, was in the fight on the side of the court party, or "torries," as they were called; and so indignant were the citizens towards him, that he was arrested and sentenced to remain on his farm one year, and not step off from it under penalty of death. A neighbor on the farm joining his, watched him daily during the whole year, and always kept a loaded gun with him, while at work in the field, for the purpose of shooting him the moment that he should step over the boundary. "It was lucky for him," said the man, "that he strictly kept within his limit, for I should have shot him as quick as I would an Indian." In July, 1777, as soon as the news of the battle of Hubbardton reached here, a company of militia was sent from this town to Castleton where the main body of the army under Gen. St. Clair, was stationed, and remained in the service till after the battle of Bennington was fought in August.

THE DUMMERSTON FRIGHT.

About the year 1780, the inhabitants in the northwestern part of this town, and a few families living near them, in Brookline, became alarmed at sounds which they heard in the woods. They had, occasionally, heard the firing of a gun in the morning and during the forenoon; but they quieted their fears for a time. Towards night the sounds became more frequent, and a smoke having been seen in the forest, they felt sure that Indians were coming to murder them and destroy their property. They hastily gathered what few valuables they could carry, and with their families and teams fled to the older settlements a few miles farther to the south-east. All the inhabitants on the way were alarmed and joined in the flight. When they reached the dwellings of those families living on the hills in the central part of the town, some were persuaded to stop there, as it would be a good place for defence; but several of the more timid ones, went farther on towards Brattleboro where there would be greater safety, for they declared the Indians would come beyond the top of the hills. A guard was stationed by those who remained on the hill, and every thing in readiness for an attack. The hours passed slowly during the night; and to while away the time and keep awake, potatoes were roasted and eaten, the guard frequently visited and every precaution taken against surprise.

Morning dawned at last, and still no signs of the approaching enemy. Two brave men, well armed, were sent back towards the scenes of depredation to ascertain what damage had been done by the Indians. On their approach to the place, they saw the door of one house standing open and also heard a noise inside— "There ! there !" exclaimed one "the Indians are here, they are plundering my house !" They went cautiously to the door, guns in hand, ready for an encounter, when suddenly a loud grunt was heard and out rushed an old porker, the only occupant of the building. The men laughed heartily, went farther on, learned the causes of their alarm, and returned to the company.

A heavy snow had fallen the day previous to the alarm and continued to fall the next day.

The weather being a little warm, the snow had lodged on the trees in large quantities, causing the limbs of some to break and fall. The inhabitants had mistaken these sounds for the report of guns. The smoke which was seen in the distance, was caused by a party of surveyors, who had stopped in the woods and built a fire ; and the hog had got access to the house after the wind had blown open the door. No lives were lost, and the inhabitants returned to their homes unmolested.

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.

WILLIAM NEGUS,

who died about 1817, nearly 90 years of age, a soldier in the French and Indian War, lived on a farm about one mile S. W. of where the old meeting-house stood. His orchard of apple-trees bore fruit first of any in that section. He owned the first cider-mill in town. The apparatus for the pressing consisted of a large heavy timber fastened loosely at one end, between two posts, and free at the other, under which was the floor of the press ; above this was a windlass used for raising the end of the heavy timber. At first the timber was sufficiently heavy to press out the cider ; afterwards, weights were added to finish the work. The pomace was generally ground a second time, and water sometimes hot, poured on, so that the last pressing would be sure to squeeze out all the cider. Whenever cider was made in the mill, Mr. Negus helped to do it, and the boys were not allowed to eat apples or drink cider, while he was present, for the reason that they were scarce in those times.

He was muscular in form, quite tall, and much stronger than men in general. His chest and shoulders were very broad and his hands uncommonly large. He used to say very little about his fight with the Indians ; but many stories have been told of his great feats of strength.

On one occasion, when he was hauling timber to build a house, the hired man was obliged to drive the team along the brow of a hill. There was danger of the log's rolling downward and injuring the team ; so Mr. Negus took a large lever, stepped over on the lower side, placed one end on the ground near the log, and the other on his shoulder. "Drive on," said he to the hired man ; but the log which was 20 feet long and large enough to make a stick of timber 8 inches square, instead of going as he expected, rolled up on the lever close to his head. He stood firm, meanwhile, and straight up like a goose in a shower, till the driver could stop the team and roll the log back again. "Did it hurt you" inquired the driver? "No," said he, "but it pressed my bones pretty close together." [See Negus, page 69.]

was in the provincial army that formed a part of the British forces in the war against the French and Indians. He was in service from 1759, till the treaty of peace in 1763, and served most of the time in the state of New York. He moved into this town in 1768, and settled on the farm where his grand-son now lives,— the nearest house being at that time, one mile distant. He was obliged to go three miles to get an axe ground; and went to mill in Northfield, Mass. At the time of his death in 1814, he was 93 years old. His son, Jacob Laughton, died in this town, Aug. 29, 1852, aged 91.

MOSES ALVORD,

a French and Indian war soldier, died in 1816, aged 85 years. When he was in service in Franconia, N. H., both his feet were frozen, and amputation near the instep was necessary. Ever afterwards his walk was peculiar; and from the circumstance that his footsteps seemed to imitate the sound of the voice in speaking the words, he received the title of "Four-pound-ten." He was a man of medium size and height, very fond of story-telling, and a great hand to carry the news. A neighbor once told him that the minister, Mr. Beckley, had a negro working for him,— he saw him chopping wood near the house, as he came along that morning. "Has he," inquired the old man, and soon after he started off, and was gone all day, telling the news that some benevolent man in Connecticut had sent Mr. Beckley a negro, that he had arrived, and somebody saw him at work there. When he returned home that night, the folks told him that the story was an imposition, and the next day, he again, went over the route, and corrected it.

REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

JOSEPH HILLIARD,

one of the early settlers in town, was in the army of the Revolution. He died before the government granted pensions to the soldiers, except those who were invalids. He was 82 years old at the time of his death in 1815.

He was a man of eccentric habits, rather witty in his sayings, and a sociable and agreeable citizen. He acquired no property, and depended upon charity and the labor of his hands for support in his declining years.

He was a member of the Congregational church, was very constant in attendance upon the Sabbath, always watched the minister closely, and could make good criticisms of the sermons. Those persons who remember the old man like to tell the story of his writing texts on a post in the meeting-house. He occupied a seat in the gallery at the right of the pulpit and quite near to the minister. At the head of his pew was a column which supported that end of the gallery and extended to the upper part of the building. Whenever the minister read his text, he was always ready with a pin to scratch it down on the "post," and so many times had he done so, that it was all written over with texts as high as he could reach. Often when he was in the act of writing, the young folks would whisper to each other saying, "See there! grandpa Hilliard is treeing the text!"

BENJAMIN GLEASON,

a pensioner, served in the army 7 years. He was born in 1745, lived in this town many years, and died Oct. 23, 1823, aged 78. Nothing can be ascertained about his long experience in war; but we met with one old gentleman, who told us the following story of his killing an Indian:

The Indians had come down the Connecticut valley, from Canada for the purpose of destroying the property of the whites and taking them prisoners. Gleason was an object of their search; but he was vigilant, and managed to escape into the forest, on the approach of the savages. His place of retreat was soon discovered; and with the intention of capturing him alive, an Indian came towards him looking very good natured, and for the purpose of deception, pretended that he was going to shake hands. saying, as he walked along, "Sagah?" "Sagah?" in English, how are you? how are you? "I'll Sagah you," said Ben, and instantly shot him dead. The Indians were greatly enraged, on finding their comrade dead; but Gleason was too cunning for the red men, and was never made their prisoner.

JAMES HANLEY,

an Irishman, and, a long time, resident of this town, was in the American army, during the Revolution. In 1781, the town authorities deemed it necessary to look after his interests and,

"According to an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont made and Provided for Idle and Impotent Persons, appointed Lieut. John Wyman to be his Overseer and take care of him and his Affects."

This provision was essential to prevent his family from coming to want. His army experience made him a brave soldier, but not an industrious and temperate citizen. He died before the government granted pensions, and was at the time of his death 80 years old.

Hanley hated the "Yorkers" and never spoke of them in very respectful terms. Whenever they caused any disturbances in the community, he was always ready with his old musket, to help keep the peace.

In those times, a home guard was appointed to assist the inhabitants, in any emergency, and protect persons and property. Provision was made for the guard, whenever they should be called into the service; and for that purpose, the town owned two or three cows which were kept for a time, on the farm at Hosea Miller, and, for safe keeping, were always put into an inclosure during the night. Hanley got information one evening that some Yorkers had come into the neighborhood to drive off the cows; and to frustrate their plan, he took his gun, hastened to the farm of Mr. Miller, roused him up, said that the Yorkers were coming to steal the cows, and he must help defend them. Miller thought he was more alarmed than need be,—there was no danger of their stealing the cows. Yes, there was, he was sure of it, and he must help, or let his hired man. They both refused to go out and help him; and no choice remained, but to let the cows be stolen or defend them himself. Hanley's courage was up; he shouldered his musket and marched off to the yard to guard them alone. He was not long in waiting, when he heard the Yorkers tearing down the fence on the side opposite to him. Creeping cautiously up the yard, he suddenly, jumped upon the brush and rails, making a tremendous crash, fired his gun, and shouted "Surround them, brave boys! we'll have them! Hurrah, brave boys!" The Yorkers fled instantly,—thinking, no doubt, they were greatly outnumbered. Hanley remained master of the situation and guarded the cows till morning.

a son of William Negus, went into the army at the age of twenty, and served through the war. He died in 1810, aged 60 years. He often related stories of hardship and exposure that were endured by soldiers of the Revolution. Many a time had he lain, in a cold winter night, on fir-boughs, placed on the snow, and slept soundly.

When they were discharged from service, the government paid no money; and not being furnished with transportation free, as the soldiers were in the late war, they were obliged to "foot it" home and beg their living on the way. At one place, where they called for food and lodgings, the man told them he had nothing but bean-porridge for them to eat, if they liked that, he could furnish them a supper. "It is just what we want" said Negus, "we don't ask for anything better." They ate a hearty meal, and, before retiring for the night, informed their host that they wanted to start on their journey before light; "very well," said he, "help yourselves to the porridge again before leaving," which they did, and went on their way, feeling very grateful for their good entertainment.

a Revolutionary pensioner, died April 30, 1838, in the 77th year of his age. The government at first granted pensions only to those who were in poor circumstances; and Mr. Cummings, being in much need of assistance, received aid from the government for a considerable time before the law granting pensions to all the soldiers, that served in the Revolution, was established.

He was a man of medium height, rather slim yet strong and very athletic. At the age of seventy, he was the champion wrestler in this town, or as an old gentleman expressed it, "No one in town could handle him." Of the numerous stories that he told, only one, that of his narrow escape from being taken prisoner, is remembered.

During a skirmish with the British, our forces were overpowered and sought safety in flight. The enemy were anxious to secure all the prisoners they could, and followed our soldiers a long distance. Cummings, having run until he was quite exhausted, supposed that he was clear of the enemy; but on looking back, he saw a British soldier climbing over the wall not far behind him. He quickly raised his gun, fired, and the soldier fell from sight. He never ascertained whether he was killed or only wounded, but was sure that he did not capture him.

BENJAMIN ESTABROOK,

one of the early settlers, in this town and a soldier, during the first year of the Revolution, moved his family here, in the spring of 1778. The summer previous, he had spent in clearing up a piece of land and building a frame house on his new farm, which was situated in the central part of the town, about one-half mile east of Black Mountain. He brought with him, from home, four panes of glass which were put into the new house for windows to furnish what light it was necessary to admit.

On account of bad roads and swollen streams without bridges, it occupied one week to perform the journey in moving his family and goods from Rutland, Mass., to his new home in the forest, distant 60 miles.

In a few years he had cleared up several acres of woodland, and reserved a large lot for wood and timber. During the summer of 1788, his fine wood-lot was destroyed by

THE GREAT HURRICANE.

When the storm arose, dense black clouds rolled up from the north-west; the tempest winds roared with fearful sounds of gathering power; lightnings flashed vividly through the moist atmosphere; the thunder deepening and crashing as if it would rend a world; then came the violent rain and the rushing hurricane with one full blast that swept whole forests to the ground. No swaying of trees, back and forth, but one continued rush of the mighty wind prostrated every tree in its range for miles up the West River valley, and along the west side of the high range of hills in the central part of the town. Black Mountain was left bare of its vast forest of large trees. Many cattle were killed, buildings unroofed, and one little child lost its life. The house in which the parents lived was not considered safe; Mr. Jones, the father, was absent from home; and the mother thought best to take her two children and go to some other place for better protection. She had not gone far from the house, when a tree fell and killed one of the children. After the storm, some one went in search of her husband and informed him that he had bad news to tell. "What is it," said he, "are all my family killed?" "Not so bad as that," replied the man, "but your little child is dead."

People were greatly frightened during the tempest, and many went into the cellars for fear their houses would be blown down. Several men, the next day, took their axes and butcher-knives and went over the fields, and killed what cattle were living that were injured beyond recovery. Mr. Estabrook was much surprised at having his woodland cleared up so suddenly, and was anxious about his future supply of wood and timber. Mr. Negus, a neighbor, offered to exchange lots and let him have an equal number of acres covered with woods, which proposition was gladly accepted. He lived in town many years; reared a family of six children, and all lived to be over fifty years old.

During the year, 1775, he served 8 months in the army, and was on duty near Boston, Mass. He received no pension; for the act, Mar. 18, 1818, excluded persons worth over $700.

In 1781, he was "elected Ensign of the 4th Company in the 7th Regiment of the Militia of this State." The commission is in possession of his son, Benjamin Estabrook, now living in this town, and was signed by Thomas Chittenden, Governor of Vermont.

He died May 24, 1834, aged 86 yrs, Abigail, his wife, died Aug. 26, 1834, aged 82.

COPY OF EBENEZER BROOKS' DISCHARGE. PAPERS — transcribed on the town records in 1791.

"Ticonderoga Oct. 10th. 1776.

These certify that Ebenezer Brooks, soldier in Captain Hind's Company of Col. Reed's Regiment, is rendered unfit for future service this Campaign, by the loss of his right eye, and is hereby recommended for a discharge.

TO LT. COL. GILMAN of 2d Regt.

E. GREEN Su'g'n to 2d Regt."

In consequence of the above certificate and averment that the complaint of Ebenezer Brooks is not fictitious, I do recommend the said Ebenezer Brooks, soldier in Capt. Hind's Company of the Regiment under my command; aged 20 years, five feet three inches high, light hair, blue eyes, light complexion; belonging to the town of Fullam (now Dummerston) as a proper person to be discharged from the army of United States of America.

ISRAEL GILMAN LT. COL.

To the HONORABLE MAJ. GEN. GATES.

Commander at Ticonderoga. Ebenezer Brooks in Capt. Hind's Company Col. Reed's Regt. is for the reason above mentioned, discharged from the service of the United States of America. Given at Head Quarters the — of Oct. 1776, by the General's command.

JOHN TRUMBULL Dy. Adjutant General.

was a private and drummer in the Vermont militia; enlisted at the age of 18, and was in service near Lake Champlain. His name was placed on the pension roll Sept. 21, 1833, under the act of Congress passed June 7, 1832. He died in 1841, aged 79 years.

He enlisted in 1780. The following winter, the cold was more intense than it had ever before been known to be in this climate, within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The winter, to this day, bears the distinctive epithet of the "hard winter." The army in encampment as far south as Morristown, N. J., suffered extremely, and often had Washington the prospect before him of being obliged to disband his soldiers.

In the early part of the winter, Mr. Knight with a company of soldiers marched over the Green Mountains, from Bennington to some town in southeastern Vermont. The snow was "knee-deep" and the weather freezing cold. They made slow progress, had scanty rations, and not finding any habitations where they could stop and warm themselves or obtain food, on the journey through the forests, their provisions, having become exhausted, were soon weary and suffering from hunger and cold. One man finally gave out, refused to go farther, and lay down to rest and sleep on the snow. The men roused him up, animated his flagging spirits, and coaxed him again to march on in the hopes of soon finding relief. With much difficulty he travelled a few miles further through the snow, and then said it was of no use, his strength was gone and he must stop. His comrades were impatient; their urging and importunity did no good, and, at last they left him behind, to slumber in his lonely bed of snow; but a knowledge of his impending fate, that his slumber would end in the sleep of death, and feelings of regard for their lost companion in arms, caused them to return again and make him realize his dangerous situation; and this time they used no flattering words, but cuffed his ears, kicked and rolled him about till his temper was roused and a promise given that he would march on with the company.

They soon afterwards met a farmer, returning from mill with bags of meal. Being in a starving condition, they asked him for food and he told them they might have all the meal they could eat. They built a fire of dried sticks, bent their hats concave, and carried water on them to make dough which they baked on the coals,—some, meanwhile, eating handfuls of dry meal and wet dough so impatient were they to wait till the bread was baked.

Having satisfied their craving hunger with the farmer's generous treat, they marched on with renewed vigor and firmer pace. They had escaped starvation for a time, had saved the life of one comrade in rescuing him from a grave of freezing snow, only to meet with another still more perilous adventure, the crossing of West River. The river was full of floating anchor-ice; the bottom was icy and slippery, and there was no means of crossing, other than to ford the stream. The swift running water made it a difficult task; but the Green Mountain boys, who had braved so many dangers, were not stopped by a stream of water, not waist deep. Reversing their guns and sticking the sharp bayonets into the icy bottom, as they walked cautiously along, they managed to reach the other side without accident; but, "after that," said Knight, "we had plenty of music from our rattling, icy pantaloons, the rest of the way, till we reached a house in Townshend where we found comfortable quarters for the night, and a good fire by which to dry our clothing, and the family prepared us a good supper of boiled meat and vegetables such as we had not enjoyed for many a day."

was a private in the Massachusetts continental line troops. He served in Capt.

James Farnivall's Company, drafted from General Warner's Brigade, as a matross, a sort of soldier in the artillery, in the year 1777. His name was placed on the pension roll, July 16, 1818, under the act of Congress passed Mar. 18, 1818; was dropped from the roll under act passed May 1, 1820, and pensioned again under act passed June 7, 1832. He died Oct. 5, 1846, aged 87 years.

A little story, illustrative of army life, is still remembered. They had been sent out in advance of the army, among the skirmishers, previous to a battle. The British soon began firing briskly; the bullets flew thick and fast; and the soldiers were ordered to shield themselves behind rocks, stumps, or anything that afforded protection. Some of the men who were over anxious to see where the "red coats" were concealed, frequently looked out from their hiding places. Brown thought that was sheer recklessness. He scolded them severely for needlessly exposing their lives, and told them what the result would be. They heeded his warning for a time; but one of the men again looked over a stump, when a bullet quickly pierced his brain, and he rolled back on the ground, dead. "There," said Brown, "I told you, you would get your d—d head shot off."

an Englishman, an inhabitant of the town nearly 25 years, was a soldier in Burgoyne's army, and was taken prisoner in the battle of Bennington in 1777. The prisoners, for a while, were kept in a stockade guarded by soldiers, in a town not far south of the battlefield. Hill with 12 others managed to escape one night, and was not exchanged with the rest who were afterwards sent to Boston for that purpose.

Several years before his death, he was obliged to call on the town for support. Mr. John Miller was selectman at the time, and said to him, when asked for assistance, "Hill, you're a British soldier. You fought against this country and would now take my heart's blood, if you had a chance to do it. I will not give you one cent." "Mr. Miller, you are mistaken," replied Hill, with a look of disappointment. "I never entered the British service willingly. I was pressed into it, and got away the first chance I had. When I was in England, we were at a dance one night and on a sudden, the officers rushed into the room and shouted, 'Soldiers, to your arms!' and hurried us to the vessels. Where we were going, and what for, I never knew until we landed at Quebec. So quickly were we hurried off that I left my girl standing on the floor,—and she may be there now for aught I know." Mr. Miller was satisfied that the man was sincere; and he was supported by the town, during the remaining years of his life.

JACOB LAUGHTON,

born in 1760; enlisted from Concord, N. H., as a private and drummer in the continental line troops, and remained 3 years in service. His name was placed on the pension roll, Nov. 24, 1818. He lived in this town several years, where he has relatives now living. On training days, he was sometimes employed as drummer for the occasion, and being somewhat deaf, it was necessary that the fifer should march quite close to him, so that "deaf Jake," as he was often called, could hear the tune. (see pages 58-59) He removed to Oneida county N. Y., where he died in 1866, aged 100 years.

JOHN MILLER,

son of Isaac Miller, [see page 43] enlisted from Worcester, and was in service in the State of New Jersey. About 1000 Hessians were captured at the battle of Trenton, and he was one of the soldiers that guarded the prisoners, during the winter of 1776 '77. Among the prisoners was a little drummer boy about twelve years of age, whose smiling face, sprightly manner and evident appearance of contentment, attracted the notice of the soldiers. When taken prisoner, all the food he had with him, was a small piece of raw pork in a little bag strapped to his shoulder. All the rest of his companions bore sad countenances, were low spirited and seldom engaged in conversation. The soldiers asked him why he could be so happy when among strangers, and far away from his home. "O," said he, "father and mother are not far behind,"—meaning, probably, that they were already on their way to this country to make it their home.

Mr. Miller married Mary Davenport, dau. of Charles Davenport, one of the first settlers. [see page 35] He died Dec. 19, 1834, aged 78 years.

who died in 1814, aged 63, entered the army at the beginning of the Revolution in 1775, and served till the close of the war in 1782. He assisted his father, Isaac Miller, in the survey of roads in this town. After peace was declared, he returned to Dummerston, where he made it his home whenever he was out of employment. He was never married, and spent a large share of his time in travelling about the country. For a few years, he was out in the Western territory, now Ohio, surveying land. He was in New Orleans, La., in 1792, and received a passport from the Spanish authorities, which is now in possession of a relative, in this town. It is 8x12 inches; dated June 19, 1792; printed, and part written, in the Spanish language, and signed by "The Baron of Carondelet, Defender of the Religion of S. Juan, Colonel of the Real Armies, Governor, "Intendete general," Vice-Patron of the provinces of Louisiana, Florida occidental, and Inspector of their troops.

When he was residing in this town, his brother, Hosea, built a new barn on his farm. At the raising, it was discovered, before the frame was all up, that there would not be rum enough to go round. People drank spirits in those days; even the minister sipped the cup that Bacchus crowned; therefore, it was decided, with no reproachful feeling of conscience, that Joseph Miller should go to Putney a distance of 4 miles, for more rum. He was soon on his way with orders to "whip up the horse and go quick." Having purchased the liquor and tested its quality, he sat down quietly to enjoy its effects and forgot to return home till next day. Of course the raising was over and the men gone. His brother was not pleased with such management, and told him plainly what he thought about his being absent so long. He bore it patiently for a while, but, at length, getting restless under the keen reproofs, he spoke out sharply, "Do you think a man can go to Putney and back in a minute?"

Another story is told about his preventing on one occasion, Rev. Mr. Farrar, the first settled minister, from getting a flogging. Moses Joy an old sea captain, a rough, quick-tempered, savage old fellow, who cursed and swore about everything as sailors are notoriously capable of doing, not a sentence escaping his lips without being tainted with profanity, was not on friendly terms with Mr. Farrar and did not reverence his profession, and, because he was lame, called him the three-legged minister. He was one day going to the Hollow for a load of boards, and when passing Mr. Farrar's house, on his way to the mill, he swore terribly at his team. He cursed the bad roads, and in some way managed to roll out a string of frightful oaths all the time he was within sight of the minister's residence.

Mr. Farrar resented the insult, and to punish his aggressor "felled" a tree across the road while he was absent at the mill. When the captain returned, the passage was effectually blocked up. Not knowing for a certainty who had cut down the tree, he went back to Miller's and made enquiry. He was informed that Mr. Farrar had felled the tree, but not that it was done intentionally.

Joy, full of rage, swore he would make Mr. Farrar cut that tree away from the road or he would thrash him soundly.

Miller knew the old sea-dog's temper and nature too well to allow him the management of the affair alone, and so said he would take an axe and cut the tree away, and that the Captain had better not have any trouble with the minister.

Joy was so greatly enraged, he could not rest easy while Miller was cutting the tree, and went straight into the parsonage, took Mr. Farrar by the collar and led him out to the tree, and, said Joy, "I made that infernal three-legged old cuss jump back and forth over that log till Joe Miller got it cut off."

an Englishman, deserted the British and, under an assumed name, joined the American army. He was in several important battles of the Revolution, and in one engagement was severely wounded and left for dead, on the battle-field.

He revived sufficiently during the following night, to crawl away from the field of carnage and avoid capture by the British and death for desertion. He was a resident of this town many years. When the pension act was passed by Congress, Mar. 18, 1818, he applied for a pension; but the destruction of the papers of the War Office in 1801, and '14, left no record of his service, and he had no friend that could prove his identity and enlistment.

ARAD HOLTON

was a private in the Vermont militia and received a pension for services in the Revolutionary war. His name was inscribed on the pension roll Aug. 15, 1833, under act passed June 7, 1832. He died Oct. 8, 1841, aged 89 years. He was one of the first settlers in town. In person, he was tall and commanding wore a broad-brimmed hat, in summer a white linen frock, running down to his boots and spurs, his hair tied back in a cue wound with eel-skin, and a tin trumpet belted to his side, which he sounded loud and long, when he travelled through villages and towns, as a farrier, in this and neighboring states.

Rev. Hosea Beckley and wife once visited the family by invitation of Mrs. Holton and were treated hospitably. At the supper table, without waiting for the customary blessing to be asked or requesting it done, he took his seat with his head covered and persisted to wear his low crowned rimmer, his mortified wife reminded him of the impropriety, but the only answer or relief obtained by her was, "Madam, my hat is paid for."

son of George Farrar, born in Lincoln, Mass., June 30, 1744; graduated at Harvard University, 1767. After preaching 12 sabbaths in Dublin, N. H., as a candidate for settlement; received a call from Stowe, Oct. 17, 1771; was ordained pastor of the Congregational church June 10, 1775, the same day on which the church was organized. His usefulness became impaired by disease, and still more by morbid fancies in which he indulged, and so much dissatisfaction arose that a council was called to investigate the matter. The council advised that he should be suspended from the ministry for 6 months, and that, if his health was not then restored, he should ask a dismission. He was dismissed June 7, 1776, and became a Chaplain in the Revolutionary army. "(P. H. W. in the Vermont Record.)"

TOWN MEETING ABOUT THE MINISTER.

At a town meeting legally warned and held Dec. 10, 1783, the town took into consideration the request of Mr. Farrar relative to his being dismissed from his pastoral relation to the church and congregation and "voted to dismiss the second article in the notification, which was to see if the town would give the Rev. Mr. Farrar a dismission or give him liberty to be absent two or three months for the recovery of his health."

Voted to choose a committee to hold a conference with Mr. Farrar and make a report at the annual meeting in March next. Accordingly chose Deacon Amos Rice, Deacon Nathaniel Holmes, and Alexander Kathan, Esq. for said committee."

"Mar. 15, 1784. A true copy of the report of the committee chosen in Dec. 1783, to confer with the Rev. Mr. Farrar relative to his uneasiness. We, your committee appointed to hold a conference with the Rev. Mr. Farrar, on his letter dated November 26, 1783, and on his supplement to said letter dated Dec. 9, 1783, beg leave to report that on the 12th of December did begin said conference; and from time to time have discoursed with him, and received the following answers. First with regard to his wood, we find Mr. Farrar to be mistaken, as there is no record to be found setting forth any length of wood whatever. With regard to the second complaint, Mr. Farrar declined calling the names of any persons that asked more for any articles than was agreed for in the settlement. With regard to the complaint of his being distracted, he says he was informed of it by two persons whose names he mentioned, viz., Lieut. Daniel Gates and Mr. Lemuel Davenport. They informed him the people had got such a notion; and with regard to the cruelty or barbarity he is afflicted with, or complains of, he lays to the charge of the female sex, that they gave him Spanish flies and love powder, with other things not by him mentioned, which he says is the main cause of his asking a dismission; and with regard to the scanty measure, he says that he received some grain of one or two persons, that was so damp that when it was dried, it fell short four quarts in one bushel and a half; and further, the Rev. Mr. Farrar still insists on being dismissed."

AMOS RICE FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. Farrar was dismissed May 12, 1784, and for nearly 30 years after leaving this town, nothing is known of him. [see Church History, page 85.] He was a faithful minister, and a man of more than ordinary ability, but eccentric to a degree sometimes bordering upon absolute insanity. He was almost the only minister in the State who was known to be a Democrat of the old school."

LIEUT. JOHN WYMAN.

(See biographical sketch page 54.) In 1772, was a citizen of Boston, when an important measure was adopted by an assembly of its inhabitants to appoint committees of correspondence and inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiments and confidential opinions of prominent persons living in other parts of the country, on all affairs of mutual interest. During these movements, a plan was devised by the British Parliament to introduce tea into the colonies; but the Americans would not pay the small duty upon it, of only three pence.

Several cargoes of tea arrived at Boston. The captain of a vessel was despatched to the Governor to request a passport, but he refused to grant it and a secret plan was formed to destroy the tea. Three different parties, Lieut. John Wyman being one of the men, sallied out, in the costume of Mohawk Indians, precipitately made their way to the wharves, and without noise and without tumult, the tea was taken from the vessels by the conspirators, and speedily emptied into the sea as an offering to the watery god.

He was in the engagement at Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775, where 3000 British under the command of General Howe were twice repulsed by the Americans; till their ammunition failed, and on the third charge of the British, they were obliged to retire. Having served as a private in the early part of the war, he was soon afterwards promoted Lieutenant, for meritorious conduct in several battles, and was in service with the Rhode Island troops, during the last part of the Revolution.

When living in this town, during the troublesome times with the "Yorkers," he was very active in maintaining the rights of inhabitants to claims of land purchased from the Governor of New Hampshire. The government of New York declared the titles of the land-grants good for nothing, and required the occupants to purchase the lands a second time. Many refused to do this; their lands were sold to other persons; and the holders were sued and ordered to leave. They would not do it; and roughly handled the sheriffs and others, who attempted to force them away. The people at length became so enraged that they would not allow any person who sympathized with the Yorkers to remain at liberty, but arrested all such persons and put them in jail at Westminster. Colonel Church, who lived in the edge of Brattleboro on the West river road was a "Yorker" in political sentiment, and to punish him for entertaining such provocative opinions, the "committee of safety" were determined to "jug him." Lieut. Wyman and Charles Davenport were the leaders of the party that proceeded to the house of the Colonel for the purpose of taking him prisoner. On their arrival, Wyman knocked loudly for admittance; but no one answered the call, and the door was found to be securely fastened. He shook, pounded and kicked at the door making a tremendous noise, when it opened suddenly and a dish of hot porridge was thrown into his face. This unexpected calamity did not hinder the proceedings,—the men rushed in and searched the house thoroughly but could find nothing of the Colonel inside the building. Mr. Davenport in the mean time had searched the barn and sheds; but not finding him there; looked around the outside of the house. He soon found a small opening through the underpinning and crawled in to reconnoitre the grounds. It was a difficult passage; but he pushed on through the gloomy labyrinth of cobwebs till at last he spied the Colonel snugly tucked away in the remotest corner. Fearing he might have a gun with him, he ventured no farther, but crawled back, went into the house and, going directly over the place, he jumped violently on the floor, "There!" said he, "the Colonel is right under here." All rushed to the hole, and Davenport again crawled through, and crept cautiously towards him till he was satisfied he had no gun then venturing quite near said, "Come.

Colonel Church, come out, come—come out." He was finally persuaded, and came out. The party immediately started with him towards Westminster. Just as they were going out of sight, the Colonel's boys, who were hid behind the hill, fired a parting shot into the company; but no one was injured, and the Colonel was safely lodged in jail.

was employed by a Commissary in the Revolutionary war, volunteered, with several laborers in the department, to perform guard duty and relieve a company of soldiers, who has been detached for that purpose, but whose service was then much needed in the army. He performed the duty 3 years, and for that service the government granted him a pension in 1833. Mr. Wilder moved into town in 1795, bringing with him a family of 9 children. He occupied a house, or rather a frame with one room loosely boarded up, the cracks left between the boards being "wide enough to stick your fingers through; and the cellar contained millions of fleas." The room was soon made comfortable and in a few days, a new comer increased the family of children one.

In the summer of 1848, Mr. Wilder, being then in his 87th year, concluded to have a family "mowing bee." On the day appointed, all things being in readiness, they commenced mowing in the following order: Father, son, grandson, and great grandson; namely, Joshua Wilder, Dan Wilder, Leroy Wilder, and Wallace Wilder; four generations; and there was a boy for the 5th generation, not present, large enough to spread the swaths. One of the spectators remarked, that the old man stood up the straightest of the lot. Only a fortnight before his death, he was strong enough to spring from the ground into a saddle on the back of a horse, and rode several miles. He died Mar. 4, 1849, aged 89 years 10 months.

JOSIAH DODGE

was a private in the 13th Regiment of infantry, and died in the service Feb. 9, 1815. His heirs obtained a pension under act of Congress, passed April 16, 1816.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS, belonging to this town, on the pension list under act passed Mar. 14, 1818:

Joshua Bemis; John Burnham, died Dec. 25, 1829, aged 81; Elijah Gibbs, died 1838, aged 90; Seth Hudson, died Nov. 28, 1828, aged 76; Josiah Kellogg, Elkanah Prentice.

Isaac Taylor, transferred from Warren Co. N. Y., Mar. 4, 1823; died Feb. 27, 1828, aged 77.

Names inscribed under act, June 7, 1832.

Nathan Adams, died June 5, 1835, Elijah Buck; David Bennett; Joseph Bemis, died August 16, 1837, aged 79; James Chase; John Goold; Asa Dutton, died Feb. 11, 1836, aged 76; Jonathan Huntly; Benjamin Pierce; Calvin Mann, pensioned first under act, March 18, 1817, relinquished for benefit of act June 7, 1832; Joseph Gilbert and Stewart Black were pensioners, but were not paid at the agency in Burlington.

DANIEL KATHAN,

one of the first settlers, was appointed "First Lieutenant of Captain Allen's Company of Militia in the County of Cumberland, in the Regiment whereof Eleazer Patterson Esq., is Colonel." His commission was dated Aug. 18, 1778, and signed by Geo. Clinton, Governor of New York. It is now in possession of Joel Knight of this town. It is valuable as a curious and ancient document.

THE SCARE.

[Another version of the old story, page 115, or another alarm.]

Soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, some men were surveying land near Lient. Spaulding's house, one day, about noon, when they heard the Indian war-whoop on the distant hills in a northwesterly direction and supposed that Indians were approaching. The neighbors of Lt. Spaulding also heard the alarming sound and hastened to his house for consultation in regard to making preparations for defence. As he had served in the French and Indian war, his neighbors thought best to choose him to reconnoiter the situation, and ascertain, if possible, the number and whereabouts of the enemy. He was soon equipped and mounted on the old black horse, which he rode in the Revolution, hastened on his mission.

During his absence, the people were so much alarmed that all the men, women, and children took refuge in a log building, suited in some respects for a place of defence, and located in the valley east of Spaulding's house. Provisions, clothing, household utensils, valuables and keepsakes, which the children could well carry, were removed to the extemporized fort; Pewter plates and basins were brought to be run into bullets. Those persons, who had no guns, were armed with clubs and stones, and all was in readiness for the emergency.

Just at sundown, a gun and two pistol shots were heard at Spaulding's house, a signal of his safe return. No trace of Indians was found. It was ascertained that, probably, some hunters in the vicinity had given the false alarm and sounded the Indian war-whoop contrary to the laws of those times. This news relieved the fears of the inhabitants, and the little warlike company disbanded their forces and returned to the peaceful occupation of farming again.

A REVOLUTIONARY RELIC.

We have seen an old "Gin-Case" that was once the property of an officer who was one of the number on board the vessel from which the tea was thrown into Boston harbor in 1773. It was taken from the vessel by one of the party of Americans who, dressed in the costume of Mohawk Indians, went on board and destroyed the tea. The gin-case and its contents became the heir-loom of a Massachusetts family of wealth, and was handed down from its original possessor to son and grandson who died in Westfield of that state, a few years ago, and at his decease it became the property of a person who now resides in Dummerston. In form and size it is like a small trunk. Only for the name "gin-case," we should call it a trunk. Everything about it indicates the age of a century. The red velvet lining is much faded. The lock is not like any of American manufacture. The inside of the gin-case has several partitions each holding a square cornered bottle striped with gilt. The bottles contain several kinds of liquor affirmed to be the same that was in them when the case was taken from the British vessel in 1773. There were in the case two glass goblets and a little taster-glass that was made in the style of a hundred years ago. One of our friends has a similar glass-goblet that has been in the family service more than a hundred years. We were informed that $500 was once offered for this old gin-case, and refused. The people have not been as careful to preserve old relics as it is now wished.

CAPT. ISAAC MILLER.

(From a pen and ink sketch from life.)

CONTRIBUTED BY

MAJOR CHARLES DANA MILLER

OF NEWARK OHIO,

Capt. Isaac Miller, the fifth son of the Isaac Miller who settled in Dummerston; after he had moved to the West, and about the years, 1811. to 1815, wrote a history of his father's family, giving a detailed account of the lives of each member of the family. The following history of Isaac Miller, who settled in Dummerston, is taken verbatim from the old manuscript, written by Capt. Isaac Miller, Jr.

"A copy of the record of Isaac Miller, who died in Dummerston in Vermont June 18, A. D. 1787, aged 79 years, 5 months and 18 days, and his wife, Sarah, who died Oct. 11, 1797, aged, 97 years, 9 months and 11 days.

Few parents have a greater offspring. They had 12 children; all lived to have families; ten of them not small families.

This by his son, Isaac, now at Wilk, Erie County, New York, August, 18th.—(Another date on the manuscript is May 24, 1814.)

Isaac Miller was born on Saturday, May, 7th, 1708, at Concord in Massachusetts and died in Dummerston in Vermont June, 18th, 1787; where he had moved with his family in 1770, at the time of the massacre in Boston.

No woman can boast of a more living and tender husband than my mother can; and no children of a more affectionate father than can his.

His grandfather came from Scotland and was a baker in Charleston near Boston where he lived and died. My mother was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, was daughter of Joseph Crosby of Worcester. They were married July 12, 1739. She was born May 5th, 1719, [We omit date of Mrs. Miller's death, 2dly, here.—Ed.]

She lived and died a Presbyterian. A better house wife and a more persevering mother, children don't often have to educate them. They had to wade through all troubles that attend giving a good education to so large a family under Kingly Government. Notwithstanding they accomplished it to a considerable degree.

Neither my Father nor my Mother did not give over the care they had so long endured in bringing up the family that was committed to their charge, but extended it to their grandchildren. Indeed, there was nothing that put an end to their usefulness to those that came after them but death; and if they had followed their counsels it would have been much better for them.

For my own part I must say that the greatest part of the evils that ever befell me came from disobedience to them, and leaves the most lasting repentance; but the poignant guilt says they are gone, and it is not in my power now to humble myself before them and as I would give much for an opportunity to do. But I was choleric and addicted to pleasure and disobedience.

It is my opinion had my Father been brought up where there had been Quakers he would have been one of that denomination.

His neighborly conduct among his acquaintance and always enjoining it on his children, always to do as they would be done to. He was always unwilling to acknowledge any as his Superior by any flattery or bows, which always to him appeared unnecessary. He was scrupulous in taking away the life of any creature to support our own life. He was a great friend to Republican government, and in this differed from the Quakers. He was willing his sons should be soldiers and officers in the Revolutionary war that separated America from Great Britain; and ever was as long as he retained his reason a good Republican and friend to his country, and was greatly beloved therefor by his acquaintance, and had the satisfaction to know that all his sons in that particular were obedient to a punctillio. His age lessened his usefulness in that war but we all supposed that our prosperity in that war lengthened his days.

He lost an interest in Worcester by adhering strictly to his political principles, but regained a good one in Dummerston, not only for himself but for all his sons, which he lived to enjoy many years, and many of the inhabitants have to thank him for their interest, as he settled that town by a contract he made with the proprietors thereof, in which it was agreed that he should build a meeting-house, settle a Minister and bring 50 settlers and continue the settlement for 5000 acres, which he performed; but soon after his death the settlers began quarreling which lasts to this day and has been the means of reducing many of them to poverty. And what is stranger than all the rest is that notwithstanding all the care he took not to have any that were friendly to Kingly or British Government as settlers; at this day more than one half of the town are in the interests of Great Britain.

In 1763, when I was 11 years old, Father was ruined by the Tories in Worcester, Mass., and some in New Hampshire in manner following. He and others got a grant of the town of Walpole in New Hampshire for 1440 Dollars. Certain duties were to be performed in three years after the circumstances if the then French war would permit.

The same town was petitioned for by Gen. Bellows's Father who represented it to that General Court that the conditions of the former charter was not complied with according to the tenor thereof, prayed that it might be re-granted to him: and the Gen. court of that then Province being much in favor of Kingly Government and hearing of the political principles of my Father were opposite, and they willing to get another fee of 1440 Dollars, gave it to Bellows; which circumstance of wickedness and fraud with many others, I have to accuse the British government with; and hope that all the prosperity of Father will fight them both by sea and land till they have obtained a compensation for that fine town and all the other property they have robbed the Americans of. His property all to a trifle was sold at vendue; and I with most of the family that were able to earn our living were put to such places where we could be well dealt with and educated."

It will be seen by the above that my authority, for the statement that Isaac Miller owned and lost an interest in the town of Walpole, N. H., in the original manuscript (which I have seen and copied) written by his son Capt. Isaac Miller about the time of the war of 1812. Capt. Isaac Miller would certainly know of the financial misfortunes of his father as he states that he was then 11 years old and he with others of the family had to be put out to service owing to the impoverishment of his Father. It certainly did not refer to the trouble in the title of the Dummerston lands, for that occurred years afterward.

Capt. Isaac Miller does not state that the grant of Walpole was made in 1763, but that was the date the court decided against his Father's claim. It may have been granted as early as 1753, as it was then the French war commenced, and the settlement was contingent upon circumstances connected with said war. The war lasted until about 1763. I do not know the authority, in the history of Walpole, on which is based the statement that John Kilburn purchased the township and was a settler there in 1749, but it seems to conflict with strong evidence from other sources; and yet, he might have been a settler there in 1749, but not a purchaser until later; and he may have been a joint partner with Miller, as Miller says that "he and others were granted, etc." This last suggestion may account for the trouble with Bellows as both sides spoke of a contention with Bellows.

As that part of the history written by Capt. Isaac Miller which part aims to those of the family who resided at Dummerston properly belongs to a history of the town I will give you extracts from the manuscript. He states that the oldest son, went into the French war in 1759, and afterwards became master of a vessel at Boston and followed the sea until 1775, when he came to Dummerston. His Father gave him 100 acres of land and in 1778, he moved his family upon it. He died in Dummerston, July 6, 1812. [See page 50.]

HOSEA, the second son, was given by his Father the best lot in Dummerston, where he lived until he died May 7, 1796. He had collected the most property during his life of any of the settlers.

TILLOTSON, the third son, did not come to Dummerston until about 1779, at which time there was a meeting held by the brothers, at the request of the Father, to nominate one of their number to take care of the old people during their declining days. Tillotson was selected, and Hosea went his security, but he carried out his trust so badly that the brothers deposed him and placed the youngest, William, in charge about the year 1785. He left Dummerston soon after this and never returned to stay. He died in New York State in 1864.

PATIENCE, the third daughter, came to Dummerston with her Father, and soon after married Dr. Thomas Amsden, of Petersham, Mass. by whom she had 13 children. (another record says twelve) She lived out of the town, however, during her husband's life; but about the year 1814, she was living at Dummerston with her daughter, Patty. She died Jan. 22, 1822, at Chesterfield.

JOSEPH, the fourth son, went to sea with his brother Vespasian in 1764, when he was only 13 years old. He went to Dummerston with his Father in 1770. He went to sea again in 1773, for his health, and continued in that life until 1775.

The Revolution at this time was breaking out over the land and Joseph joined the Patriot forces and continued through until the end of the war. He won the confidence of Gen. Washington and with it the rank of Brigade Major. Soon after the close of the war, he went on a whaling voyage to South America. In 1790, he went to Ohio and took land near Marietta, but gave it up and returned to Dummerston in 1794. He went to New York State a few years after where he remained until he died at Genoa, Sept. 26, 1814.

CAPT. ISAAC MILLER,

the fifth son says of himself, among other things :

"In the same year 1767 in Sept. I went to Dummerston, now in Vermont, by Father's order, where I saw and went through several scenes that were of consequence to none but myself."

"Father met with many troubles and disappointments in getting the town of Dummerston settled with such settlers, and on such conditions as were stipulated between him and the proprietors." "In 1769 I continued there nearly eight months and part of the time alone, and suffered much many ways; hard labor, hunger, some sickness, gnats, mosquitoes and fleas in abundance." "I finally left the place in Nov. much against Father's will, but as we had sold all we could, I was so desirous to get to Worcester and eat apples and milk, and drink cider, it was impossible to keep me longer; and in March 1770 at the time of the massacre by the British in Boston we moved to Dummerston." "I underwent much in that journey, and had it been undertaken by persons less persevering than brother Joseph and I were, we should have failed at last; but having the assistance of brothers Negus and Wheeler (after we arrived at Petersham) we got through."

"The summer that followed was a severe one to me as well as the rest of the family." "I had to work for Daniel Kathern where I fared hard and worked hard; but blessed be God! I had my health and in the fall I went to Petersham."

"In 1771, I returned in March to Dummerston where brother Joseph and I made a large quantity of sugar."

"It was this year that the title of our land was like to fall through or become void." "It was firstly purchased of the Indians by Massachusetts; sold by them at vendue to the then proprietor, or their ancestor; granted to them (by their prayer) by New Hampshire; and now was ceded by the King's Proclamation to New York; and they granted it to Willard, Kathern and others, and they unwilling the occupants should have any; as they knew they were unwilling as well as unable to pay the exorbitant price they demanded." "Many persons quit that had done but little labor."

Capt. Isaac Miller left Dummerston in 1772 for Massachusetts. He had considerable military knowledge and kept a military school just before the war. In April 1775, he went into the army at Cambridge. In May, he returned home and married Lucretia Knapp. After settling his property affairs he returned to the army and joined his command the day after Bunker Hill battle.

On the 9th of November, he was in the Leachmore's Point battle where he received a wound which was considered slight at the time, but in after life crippled him very much.

At the end of the campaign of 1775, and in Oct. 1776, he moved his wife to Dummerston, where he had purchased a farm with the proceeds of the sale of one in Massachusetts. At one time he was one of the proprietors and clerk of a grant of the Township of Jamiaca, Vt.

Capt. Isaac Miller left Dummerston for the west in 1795; first going to New York State, then to Ashtabula County Ohio, where he died Feb. 14th, 1826.

MARSHALL, the sixth son, was born in Worcester, Mass., Sept. 20, 1754, (one record says Sept. 4th.) He also came to Dummerston in 1770, with his Father. He was in the war in 1775, and in a few years after married Mrs. Abigail Boyden. They acquired a large property and gave two of their sons a liberal education.

MAJOR WILLIAM MILLER.

Was the youngest of 12 children. His father, Isaac Miller, was one of the first settlers in Dummerston; and from his prudent deportment in life, obtained the confidence of all who knew him. He was a very worthy and respectable citizen; a man of ability, probity and sin cerity, by which he became introduced to public characters, and frequently promoted to places of public trust. He was for a long season an agent for the original proprietors of the town of Dummerston, and as such conducted himself with promptitude and fidelity. After his age had rendered him incapable of performing public services, he retired to more private concerns. At length his bodily infirmity increased to that degree, that he was utterly unable to attend to the ordinary concerns of life, and he finally surrendered them together with a considerable estate, to his son, the Major, with whom he lived, and by whom he was kindly supported through the residue of his days. Early in life, removing into this new country, Major Miller, by the fatigues and hardships incident to new settlers, contracted habits of prudence, frugality, sobriety, and courage; And in the late unhappy contest, for liberty and independence, between the United States and Great Britain, in which the State of Vermont, from its exposed situation, was obliged to take a vigorous and conspicuous part, the Major while very young voluntarily engaged in several expeditions to the northward and westward, always expressing and manifesting the most undaunted courage and unbounded zeal in the service of his country. Being early educated in the art of war, he became prepared to discharge, with accuracy and fidelity, the duties belonging to the several offices to which he has since been promoted and intrusted. At the age of 27, he was chosen and commissioned a subaltern in a company of light infantry, which office he held with distinguished reputation for several years. From his military conduct while a subaltern, he attracted the attention of those who were acquainted with military operations and warlike improvements. He was elected captain of the third company of the regiment to which he belonged; and was afterwards unanimously elected second major in the regiment. In this office, he continued till, by a vacancy, he was elected Lieut. Colonel Commander of said regiment, but saw fit to signify his non-acceptance of the appointment. He was then chosen First Major of said regiment; which office he accepted and held with honor during his life. He died Apr. 16, 1802, in the 41st year of his age.

HIIS FUNERAL.

The Procession formed at the house of Mr. Sylvanus Miller where the honored remains had been previously, carried;—from whence they moved to the meeting-house in the following order:

Colonel Banister on horseback,—
Maj. Jay and Col. Boyden on foot,—
Capt. Leavitt with his troops of horse,
Carriers,—Hearse,—Mourners,
Military Officers of the First Regiment,
Civil Officers, Non-commissioned Officers. Capt. Knight's and Capt. Shaw's companies,—spectators.

When they arrived at the meeting-house, the Colonel, alighting, was received by the Rev. H. Taylor of Newfane, who after the large procession had taken their seats, introduced the funeral worship. The text was Ps. 15, 5.

The services concluded by a funeral anthem, suited to the occasion. The procession then moved in regular order from the meeting-house to the grave, where the Last Remains of the noble Major, so affable and benevolent in life were interred with suitable religious and military ceremonial; when the whole procession retired in beautiful and solemn order. The whole scene was conducted, by every person present, with that degree of order solemnity and propriety as most express an unfeigned respect for the deceased.

Mr. Miller's father was a son of Capt. Isaac Miller from Worcester, Mass., who settled in Dummerston in 1770. He had a family of 12 children, William, the youngest, was born Oct. 2, 1761. He resided on the parental farm which had been well improved when he purchased it of his father, Apr. 29, 1785, for $1700.

The children of William and Hannah Miller were Fauny, Isaac, Charles, Dolly, George Anson, William, Joel, Nathan, Asa, Catharine, and Maria. Fanny married Henry Whitney, Isaac married Polly Adams, Charles, Lucy Bruce, Dolly, Adin Hubbard, George Anson, Louisa Haven, William, Polly Willard, Nathan, Philinda, daughter of Elijah Buck. Asa m., October, 1819; Sally Bemis, dau. of Elias and granddaughter of David and Mary (Dunster) Bemis. Catharine m. John Wheeler, and Maria m. Dea. Abel Haven.

Sally, the wife of Asa, was born Mar. 18, 1796, married Sept. 1820, died Feb. 14, 1870. They had two children:

Catharine, m. 1st Orrin Slate, a merchant, who lost his life by a fall from a window in a public house at Winstead, Ct. Four years after his death, she m. 2d, Rev. Alfred Stevens, D. D., —of Westminster West, a Congregationalist minister in that parish for 40 years.

Sidney A. m. 1st, Emily, dau. of Asahel Dickinson, 2d, a daughter of Rev. W. S. Balch, a Universalist minister.

Early in life, Mr. Miller learned the carriage-maker's trade and was engaged in that business in Dummerston until his removal to Brattleboro in 1834. For several years in that place, his son, Sidney A. Miller, was associated with him in the manufacture of carriages. The last six years of his life were spent in Westminster West, in the family of Dr. Stevens, enjoying the tender care of his only daughter. He died Apr. 9, 1883, aged 85 yrs. 10 mos.

His last visit to Dummerston was about six months before his death. He was greatly pleased to learn that a portrait of his grandfather, Capt. Isaac Miller, would appear in the history of the town. His leisure hours were generally spent in reading the daily news and very largely, for one of his age, the recent publications. He was a member of the Congregational church for more than 40 years. His Christian spirit was manifested by sympathy for and efforts to relieve the poor and suffering.

Mr. Miller expressed great affection for his mother, who was a very excellent woman and always kind to the poor. She was loved and esteemed by all who knew her, and many were her deeds of kindness. She always fed the stranger who called at her door for food, and never refused when asked to keep even the poorest beggar over night. She was told by her friends that by so doing she would doubtless aid many who were not worthy. Her reply was that those whom she thus befriended were unknown to her, and she would rather feed ten unworthy persons than turn one who was worthy away. During the last sickness and shortly before her death, Mrs. Davenport, a near neighbor, called to express gratitude for the many acts of kindness she had received from Mrs. Miller—but in relating the incident, "Uncle Asa" paused in the narration. His voice trembled, his eyes filled with tears, and turning his face away from the listener, he was silent for a moment, and the conversation was changed to some less affecting incident of his recollection. It was his last interview with the writer of this sketch, which is but a simple record of a few events in the long life of a worthy man.

The portrait which accompanies this sketch was contributed by his children.

Wm. O. Miller

JOSEPH MILLER,

son of Joseph, Sen., and grandson of Capt. Vespasian, eldest son of Capt Isaac Miller, married, 1st, Eliza A., dau. of Isaac and Abigail (McWayne) Reed, Mar. 3, 1841. Her parents were married in Dummerston, Sep. 2, 1790. She died Nov. 26, 1843, and he married, Sophia, dau. of William and Polly (Frost) Arms, Dec. 25, 1844. They have three children. J. Arms, the eldest, married Sarah M. Reed of Wardsboro, and lives on a farm near his father's place. Adin F. married Hattie A. Dutton; resides with his parents and helps manage the home farm.

Ansel I., having a scholarly turn of mind, prepared for college at West Brattleboro and graduated from Williams college in the class of 1881. He is at present, (1883,) studying medicine in New York city. Mr. Miller was town representative in 1862 and 63, has been justice of the peace many years and town clerk since 1849. He holds other offices of trust for the town, and his long experience in town business makes him a valuable officer and legal counsellor in matters pertaining to town affairs. His advice and help are often sought by his townsmen in the making of wills and the settlement of estates of deceased persons. With one exception from 1804 to 1807, the town has been very fortunate in the choice of town clerks and has made few changes in the office. Mr. Miller, the present incumbent, is a very efficient clerk, and keeps the records in a neat, legible, handwriting. He was born and has always lived on the farm that he now owns. It has been in the Miller name more than a hundred years, and was the birthplace of his father in 1780. It is pleasantly located in the eastern part of the town, produces excellent crops, and has a large orchard of maple trees from which the owner makes the best quality of sugar. The yearly product averages nearly 2800 lbs. The largest quantity made in any single year, was 3300 lbs. A large share of what he makes is sold yearly to merchants in the Western states. His maple sugar on exhibition at the Centennial in Philadelphia, 1876, was specially noticed by the French Commissioners, who, on their return to France, wrote to Miller for a sample of maple sugar and a package of seed from the trees for planting.

In return he received the Commissioners report containing a very complimentary notice of the sugar.

WILLIAM O. MILLER.

His parents were William and Esther (Knight) Miller, whose children were William O., Dana; Esther, who married Winslow Dutton; Mary, who married Sumner Rust, and Lucretia.

The grand-parents were Marshal and Abigail (Haven) Miller. At the time of their marriage, Nov. 17, 1778, she was the widow of Thomas Boyden.

William O. was born Jan. 31, 1816. His parents then resided in the north part of the town near Putney West hill. In 1835, they removed to the Hosea Miller farm, which his father bought of Marshal Newton, who was owner at that time. It was previously owned by Dr. Abel Duncan, who died in 1813, and his widow, a daughter of Hosea Miller, held a claim on the estate during her life time. The farm has been kept in the Miller name or some relative of the family, since it was purchased of the original proprietors in 1770. The present dwelling-house on the place was once used for a tavern. Refugees from Shay's Rebellion in 1787 boarded there for a time, and some of the apple trees now standing in the old orchard were set out by them to pay their expenses for board.

William O., when not otherwise employed, worked on the farm with his father, who deeded the place to him several years before his death. Mr. Miller's school days began in the old brick school-house near the Simeon Reed place on Putney West hill, and were concluded at West Brattleboro in the academy under the instruction of Roswell Harris. He taught school several winters in Dummerston and surrounding towns. A few years were spent in trade at the store of his uncle, Asa Knight.

In 1846, and '47, he was representative of the town at the state capital. He was chosen constable and collector in 1844, and with only two exceptions, has been annually chosen to that office for 48 years. He has been high bailiff of Windham county two years; was appointed postmaster in 1862, and still holds that office. He is a Congregationalist, and has been clerk of the religious society 43 years—being chosen first in 1840. He has been clerk of school district No. 1. east, since 1842. In all the offices which he has held and still holds, he has discharged his duties with fidelity and thoroughness. He is a prosperous farmer, and very helpful member of society, and a valuable citizen of the town.

Nov. 26, 1856, he married Julia, dau. of Ira and Jemima (Ward) Haven, and their children are William D., a graduate from Williams College in the class of '82; Mary L. and Freddie O., died in childhood; and Edwin H. brother of Wm. O., graduated from Dartmouth college in the class of '43. His ante-collegiate was in Townshend, in West Brattleboro and Dummerston. As a scholar, he stood in the front rank of his class. After receiving his degree, he remained at home until the following December, when he went to Washington, D. C., and was soon invited by Rev. Mr. Bulfinch to take charge of the classical department of his school, which he did for two years. From the summer of 1846, to 1850, he traveled for increase of knowledge in the West and South West taking agencies to pay expenses. In the spring of 1850, he returned to Washington and was employed as a clerk in the Land Office. He soon received an appointment in the Census Bureau, and at the time of his death held an appointment in the Treasury Department. He died Nov. 23, 1851. He was much respected by all who knew him, for his manly bearing, self-discipline, frank and candid friendship, and unsullied life.

JOSIAH DODGE.

was a soldier in the war of 1812, in the 13th regiment of infantry. He died Feb. 9, 1815, on board of a vessel at sea from the effects of a gun-shot wound in his hand which produced lock-jaw. He was born in Westmoreland, N. H., Mar. 19, 1778, married. 1st. Ruth Plummer, had one child, Jared, married. 2d, Phebe, dan. of Lt. Daniel Kathan and formerly the wife of William Wilder.

SAMUEL KNIGHT, ESQ.

From an obituary in the Brattleboro paper.

The death of Samuel Knight, at the venerable age of 84 years; born in Dummerston, August, 21, 1793.

He was the son of Samuel and Susanna Knight, of whose family he was the last surviving member. In early life, he served for a considerable period as clerk and book-keeper in a Putney store, and for a time was a resident of Newfane, where, in 1842, he married Eliza Merrifield, by whom he had one son, Henry Samuel, who died in 1871. His first wife having died, he married, in 1844, the widow of John Robinson, a well known hotel proprietor of Bellows Falls, who survived him at the age of 88.

In 1833, he was a contributor to the columns of the "Independent Inquirer," a short-lived, semi-religious newspaper, published in Brattleboro under the management of the now venerable Wm. E. Ryther, of Bernardston, Mass. While in Newfane, he furnished articles for the Green Mountain Democrat, published in that town, and when the Vermont

Phoenix was started in 1834, he became a contributor to that paper and served more or less, as editorial assistant. He removed to Brattleboro in the spring of 1845.

He was a member of the old board of road commissioners for Windham county, which were appointed by the Legislature under the law passed in 1827, and was a clerk of the board until the repeal of the law in 1831, having for his associates such men as Hon. Phineas White of Putney and Gen. Barney of Guilford. He was a delegate of the State Constitutional Convention in 1843; and during his residence in Brattleboro was entrusted very extensively with the town affairs, in which his skill as a practical surveyor added greatly to his usefulness.

He joined "The Blazing Star Lodge" of Masons at Townshend, at an early period, and was one of the charter members of Columbian Lodge in Brattleboro.

As a writer, he was noted for his wit and sarcasm. He was a great lover of fun, whether in the shape of a witty anecdote or a practical joke; but his wit was never tinged with malice. He was always tender-hearted, good natured, kind and obliging; and however situated, was the same quiet, unassuming man, of kindly face and genial presence, such was "Uncle Sam Knight."

To the foregoing, condensed from the "Vermont Phoenix," 1877, the writer of Dummerston history makes additional particulars: The widow of Mr. Knight is now living, (1882) at the age of 92. Her maiden name was Mary Clark, a daughter of Thomas Clark, one of the early settlers in Dummerston. She was born in this town in 1789. Her father died at the age of 91, her mother at 84, her brother Thomas at 88, and others in the family lived past 80.

Esther (Farr) Knight.

Mr. Knight resided in this town till nearly or quite 50 years old. It is true that he was a "great lover of fun" and witty; but some of his very intimate friends often overreached him in the playing of practical jokes. Many stories are told illustrating his eccentric habits. One such was in public print many years ago, and was written for a Boston newspaper by Rollin Keyes, a resident of Putney and well known throughout the county as a man of fine ability and very scholarly attainments. The printed story is not at hand, and the facts are given in the writer's own language.

Mr. Knight, it appears, was at Putney, one day, in a store, when several persons were present with whom he was well acquainted. The conversation turned upon cleaning stove-pipes, how troublesome it was to do and how everybody disliked to do it. He remarked that he wished there was some better way of cleaning stove-pipes than the common method.

One of the men said he knew a plan that was very effectual and required little time. It was simply to put a quantity of powder on some paper, place it inside the stove just under the pipe: then light the paper with a match when the powder would soon flush all the soot and ashes out of the pipe into the chimney.

No one present cast any doubts on the feasibility of the new method, and Mr. Knight, accordingly, purchased some powder with which to clear some pipe after he returned home. When he had made ready for the trial, he followed the directions of the Putney man implicitly, and awaited the result. Instead of a "flush" and exit of soot and ashes as he expected, there was an explosion. The top of the stove was blown off. Stove-lids, soot and ashes, and other things were scattered promiscuously about. A section of pipe smashed through the window, and through the opening, leaped the terrified dog and cat, and disappeared for several days. Mr. Knight, himself, was perfectly astounded. After recovering somewhat from his astonishment, he was heard to say, "Any d—d fool might have known better than that."

By request of his most intimate friends two papers, "Obituary Extraordinary" and "Thanksgiving disappointments" have been selected to illustrate Samuel Knight's sharp style of writing for the public prints. In the use of language he was as keen, witty and sarcastic as any man in the State. His genius for condensing was also, very remarkable.

The editor of the Free Press, noticed in the obituary, was Zebina Eastman. He died at Chicago in June 1883. He was one of the foremost abolitionists, and an associate of Benjamin Lundy in publishing "The Genius of Universal Emancipation." He was preparing a History of "The Black Code of Illinois when he died."

OBITUARY EXTRAORDINARY.

"Time cuts down all Both great and small."

Died of starvation at Fayetville, Vt. Feb. 14, 1835, "The Vermont Free Press" aged 37 weeks.

Its death was occasioned by the neglect of its guardians to supply it with proper nourishment. Its exit from this mundane sphere was probably hastened by an unlucky leap, Sam Patch like, made, some weeks ago, plump into the bowels of Anti-masonry, from which, like its living prototype, it never recovered. In the death of the Free Press, the craft has lost a staunch champion for the "supremacy of the laws, a patriotic dabbler in other people's affairs, and a noble stickler for the truth. It was never known to utter an untruth but that it stuck to it with the greatest pertinacity even to its dying hour, literally fulfilling the maxim "that a lie well stuck to is as good as the truth." It is said that its paternal guardian shed "hogs-heads of tears" on the solemn occasion, and that the mourners, as is customary when great characters become defunct, will wear crape for the space of thirty days. The loss of the Free Press will be sensibly felt throughout the state. We join in the lamentations and erect this tablet to its memory ;

From nothing sprung,
To nothing rose ;
On nothing hung,
To nothing goes ;

And nothing all its life it sought,
And nothing now returns to naught.

THANKSGIVING DISAPPOINTMENTS.

Disappointments are said to be the lot of all men and women kind. The old saying was verified in small degree on the morning of Thanksgiving day by sundry persons on looking for their slaughtered gobblers and roosters, which they had hung up in a cool place preparatory for a good Thanksgiving dinner. But lo ! the fowls were minus—gone clean, smack, smooth ! By whose hands they had been spirited away was not quite so certain ; but, although a mystery, suspicions were rife as to the whereabouts some of them had skedad-dled. One man having his "eye peeled," found by "prospecting" where one of his gobblers rested. He took a "bee line" to one of his neighbors—rang the bell—very politely met by the man of the house, and ushered into his domocil. The loser of the turkey walked straight into the kitchen, and lo ! there it lay on the table, gutted, gizzardard and stuffed ready for the spit. "You have a very fine turkey here," said the gentleman. "It will make a capital roast for dinner;" and turning it over, he stepped back and viewing it through his half shut hand, exclaimed—"Ho ! ho ! that is an old acquaintance of mine—where did you get it? The man of the house was dumbfounded. He stammered and tried hard to say something ; but it was no go—he couldn't get it out.

Shame gave his face a kind of thievish hue, His cheeks turned pale his nose turned blue.

"Now neighbor," said the loser, "this is my turkey, and you, or some of your trade hooked it;" and deliberately putting the dead fowl under his arm, walked to the door, and turning around, said very blandly—"Now Mr. —, we wont have any hard feelings about this business—please call at the dinner hour and dine with me ; be punctual. Good day, sir." But he didn't go. It is said the "man of the house" on the morning of Thanksgiving day, feeling very thankful for the blessings received and to be received, and a little pious withal, scratched his head and scratched out the following, to be by him delivered after eating, with other fixings, the stolen turkey, and here it is :—

For turkeys young and turkeys old,
For turkeys hot and turkeys cold,
For turkeys tender, turkeys tough,
We thank the Lord, we've had enough !

Alas ! for his disappointments. He, however, can keep the thanks, the next time he is more fortunate, when he obtains a turkey under similar circumstances.

whose portrait has been contributed to this history, died Sept. 15, 1874. He spent his three score years and more on the old homestead, a slice from the paternal acres. He was an industrious farmer, an upright man, a worthy citizen. In early manhood, he spent his winters in teaching school. Six of his eight children were teachers.

Sophia, the eldest, married Rev. S. H. McColester, D. D., at one time president of a college in Akron, Ohio. Charles M. Knight, the youngest son, now [1882] is a professor in the same College.

In 1829, Mr. Knight married Fanny daughter of Dr. Abel Duncan who died of spotted fever in 1813. Rev. Hosea Beckley, the resident minister of this town at that time, wrote the epitaph on his grave-stone :

*He was sound in knowledge and in judgment, clear,
With conduct open, and with heart sincere,
Of purpose firm ; but mild to reason's sway,
In public good was prompt to lead the way ;
Pure in friendship, and faithful to her laws,
He died in humanity's sacred cause.*

HON. ASA KNIGHT,

son of Joel and Esther and ,grand-son of Jonathan, Sen., was born in Dummerston, Feb. 28, 1793, and died July 20, 1851. Mr. Knight was a prominent and leading citizen of this town. He acquired an extensive knowledge of the laws both of the state and nation ; and, as a counsellor, though not a lawyer by profession, his judgement was excellent in all business of a legal character.

In 1821, he was appointed deputy sheriff and retained the office 7 years. He removed to Newfane in 1824, and was keeper of the county jail 2 years ; and then returned to Dummerston, in 1828, and began business as a merchant.

In 1830, he was chosen representative to the legislature of Vermont, and was re-elected the following year ; also, chosen again in 1834 and 1835. He was elected Judge of Probate for the District of Marlboro' in 1834, '35 and 1836, and performed the duties of the various offices, which he held at different times, with marked ability and promptness.

When living in Newfane, he received a large sum of money, late one afternoon, with the express command that it must be deposited in the bank at Brattleboro, that night without failure. To perform a journey of 12 miles down the West River valley, through thickly wooded forests and narrow defiles where robbers would have excellent chances to waylay the unsuspecting traveller in the hours of darkness, did not appear a pleasant undertaking. Thinking it would be prudent, therefore, to prepare for this emergency, he obtained the necessary means for self-defence ; and with a swift horse and light sulky, started on his journey, trusting that in case his weapons should fail of doing execution, his swift steed would bear him out of danger. The road in many places was narrow and dangerous, and the night dark as Erebus.

He rode cautiously along, thinking that perhaps the darkness only, had excited his fear, till at length he came to a narrow defile, made by the river on the north. and an almost inaccessible hill on the south, leaving only a narrow passway which, by one of the leaders in the early difficulties of this state, was called, "the valley of the shadow of death ;" when, suddenly, a man sprung from a dense thicket and grabbed at the bridle of the horse. Luckily, the horse threw up his head, and the robber missed his object ; at the same time, being propelled across the road by the force gained in springing down the steep bank, he did not recover himself in season to try the experiment again, before Mr. Knight had whipped up the horse and was out of his reach. The spirited horse took his master swiftly over the remaining route, and rescued him from the robber and, perhaps a violent death.

THE CAPTURE OF PARKS.

Gen. Martin Field a lawyer in New-fane came to Mr. Knight when he was sheriff, and requested him to take a writ and serve it upon Thomas Parks of West Brattleboro, for the purpose of collecting a debt of about $500.

"It will be of no use," said Knight, "for me to take that execution, as you well know that Parks is a slippery fellow and has evaded the officers for the past year; even Chase, the high sheriff, has failed to arrest him."

"I know that," replied Field, "but I want that you should make a trial. Parks has caused trouble enough, and you are the man to settle with him. I will give you $50, if you will collect the debt."

"I cannot do it, General. If I take that execution, you will oblige me either to collect the debt, or pay it myself; therefore, I'll have nothing to do about it."

"Well, now," said Field, "I will make you this promise. You may take the writ, and if you cannot serve it upon Parks, I will take it back again, and cause you no further trouble."

Knight accepted the proposal, took the writ, and at the earliest opportunity called one afternoon to see Parks. He knocked for admission, but no one answered the call; and, on his trying to open the door, he found it securely fastened. Parks was soon discovered standing near the window, and laughing at Knight's inability to gain admittance.

"Let me in," said Knight, "I want to see you on business."

"No I won't," replied Parks, "you shall not come into my house."

"You had better," said Knight. "If you do not let me in now, I shall get in to the house somehow, before morning."

"You can't do it," replied Parks. "Smarter men than you have tried that before and failed."

"We will see what can be done," responded Knight, as he got into his wagon and drove off a few miles to the residence of Paul Chase, the high sheriff. He told him his business and requested his aid in the work.

"You can't do anything with the fellow, Knight," said Chase, "for I have tried times enough to satisfy anybody. Parks has been secluded for months, and will let no one into his house."

"I do not dispute it, Chase, but you must go with me, this time, and help arrest him."

"Well," replied Chase, "I will not refuse to go where any of my deputies are willing; but, if you will arrest Parks, I will give you $25 and the half of my fees, for I have several writs that I would like to serve upon him."

Knight informed Chase of his plan which was to reach the house just before the time it would begin to grow light. Parks, by that time, would be tired of watching and conclude that he had given up the attempt to arrest him.

At the appointed hour, they arrived on the premises and found everything quiet. Knight had, at his first visit, got sight of a ladder under the shed, which he now took and set up near a back window in the second story of the building, and having ascertained the sash could be raised, "now," said he to Chase, "when there is light enough so that I can find my way out of the chamber, do you go round to the front door and make all the noise you can. Parks will soon be there; and don't you stop rattling the door till you hear from me."

When the first streak of dawn appeared, Knight pulled off his shoes, ascended the ladder, and at the same time, Chase hastened to the door and began a tremendous racket by pounding and shaking and calling for admittance. Knight, in the meanwhile, had got access to the chamber, and found a stairway which, he concluded, led in the right direction; he descended, and, as luck would have it, entered the room right behind where Parks was standing and swearing at Chase for pounding the door. Knight tip-toed softly across the room and instantly grabbed him on both shoulders. Parks jumped as though he had been shot."

"How came you here," he exclaimed.

"None of your business," replied Knight, "I told you I should get in; you are my prisoner." The door was quickly unfastened; Chase stepped in, and Parks surrendered without a fight. He settled the accounts before they left the house. For a long time after that, whenever he saw Knight, he would say "Ah, had it not been for you, I might have been out West now, and owning a good farm, but you got all my money and I had to go to work again."

[We hold to read, a letter we will print, as it gives, beside, some additional information, a pleasant retrospective glance at a very honorable and well-known group of Mr. Knight's intimate friends — Ed.]

MR. TYLER TO MR. KNIGHT.

Brattleboro, May 13, 1882.

Dr. Sir:

The Records show Hon. Asa Knight, Judge of this Probate District for 3 years successively, 1835-6 and 7. Asa Keyes was his Register.

It is a pity you had not begun seeking information sooner. Within a few years have died Wm. C. Bradley, J. Dorr Bradley, Judge Kellogg, Judge Keyes, Chas. K. Field, Joe Steen, any one of whom was full of information about Judge Knight.

You might get on the track of something in Putney—in old times, Dummerston, for this, had more to do with Putney than with Brattleboro—perhaps they do still—I don't know. The Millers, Joe and W. O. ought to put you on the track of something, perhaps also Sam P. of Newfane, his father and yours were intimate. Austin Birchard, too, has lately died, he would have known all about him. I can think of nobody, now living. Should any one occur to me, I will write again.

Truly yours,

R. TYLER.

[We shall next introduce two ladies of the Knight Family whose portraits have been contributed to the history of this town, and a sister to one. We give Mrs. Esther Knight as the senior Mrs. Knight, first, and also, that the two sisters be side by side; these portraits, being the first of sisters in the history of any town thus far in the work. — Ed.]

MRS. ESTHER (FARR) KNIGHT.

From information obtained in the History of Chesterfield, N. H., published in 1882 by O. E. Randall, we learn that the ancestors of Mrs. Knight came from Stowe, Mass. Samuel and Hannah Farr of that town had, at least three children: Lydia, b. Mar. 29, 1714, Elizabeth, b. Nov. 25, 1725, Abraham, b. Oct. 1, 1730. Samuel, the father, d. June 7, 1754, Abraham Farr m. Rachel Foskett and settled in Chesterfield, N. H., between 1770 and '75. He d. MRS. SUSAN (MILLER) KNIGHT, wife of Hon. Asa Knight, whose maiden name was Susan Miller, daughter of John and Polly Davenport Miller, and grand-daughter of Capt. Isaac Miller, that sturdy pioneer, and settler of the town of Dammerston, was born in this town, October 22, 1796, and married Asa Knight, May 1, 1822. Their children were:

(CONTRIBUTED BY RANDOLPH A. KNIGHT.)

Susan H. b. May 19, 1823, married Lyman G. Bliss of Brattleboro.

Mary Esther, born, July 26, 1826.

Rose W. b. Oct. 31, 1828, married Lambert M. Maynard of Boston, Feb. 17, 1852, lives in Somerville, Mass.

Randolph A. b. Apr. 19, 1831, merchant, m. Ursula Longfellow a distant relative of the poet, H. W. Longfellow.

Lovina L. b. Oct. 15, 1833, married Oliver Sprowl; and is now a widow and a teacher in the graded schools of Chico, Cal.

John M., b. Aug. 28, 1836, merchant in Des Moines, Iowa, m. Frances, dau. of Dr. W. B. Rice, Niagara Falls.

Fanny D., b. June 13, 1840, m. Richard L. Ogle of Callington, Co. of Prince George, Md., Sept. 10, 1863.

Her portrait was copied from an oil painting by Belknap and represents her as the age of thirty-six. In her youth, she was noted for her fair Saxon type of beauty, blue eyes, fair complexion, light golden hair and fine-cut features. Bright and cheerful in conversation, her peculiarly pleasant voice and Scotch wit impressed one as a lady of refinement and culture.

In childhood, she was trained in the strict discipline of her Puritan farthers and practised economy and industry; had a sacred regard for truth, which became ever after prominent in her character; and she was distinguished for her excellent judgment, good sense and her regard for the rights of others. Patient and positive in her opinion, she has been known as a true friend to the poor and friendless.

She has been a great reader and long took a lively interest in all the events concerning the welfare of our country, the proceedings of Congress and news from abroad.

The extensive acquaintance of her husband, brought within her doors a large number of prominent people in the county and state who remember, agreeably, her sweet face, pleasant ways and generous hospitality.

The death of her husband in 1851, left her alone with a large family and a large estate to settle.

SUSAN MILLER KNIGHT,
Grand-daughter of Capt. Isaac Miller, and wife of Hon. Asa Knight.

Three old-time friends, Judge Newton, the Hon. C. K. Field and Wm. L. Williams, Esq., came to her assistance in settling the estate, and took from her much of the care and trouble.

Her husband was for many years, prior to his death, a merchant, and lived where she now lives on the hill—her home for upward of fifty years. The grand old house and the store have many interesting associations with prominent families and times long since passed away.

My mother was generous and noble hearted. She has passed through life with that degree of fortitude seldom equalled. For nearly three years past, she has been a great sufferer, occasioned by an accident that has rendered her almost helpless and speechless. But possessing a vigorous constitution and from a long lived race, she still lives and greets her friends and children with the same cordiality and smile of recognition, and to wish them blessings and prosperity.

MRS. ROSANNA (MILLER) WILLIAMS is a sister of Mrs. Asa Knight; was born in Dummerston, May 19, 1794; married Feb. 22, 1826, William H. Williams, of Newfane, a wealthy and prominent citizen of that town. Her portrait represents her at the age of 65. She wrote the signature when 88 years old, and is now living in Williamsville in her 90th year. She is a grand-daughter of Capt. Isaac Miller.

STICKNEY FAMILY.

PETER STICKNEY, ancestor of the family in Dummerston, was a descendant of William Stickney, the first settler in this country, and the ancestor of nearly all who have since borne that name in America. It is inferred from records procured in England, that he was the William who is mentioned as baptised in St. Mary's Church, Frampton Lincolnshire, England, Sept. 6, 1592, and the son of William Stickney of Frampton, who was baptised Dec. 30, 1558, and married June 16, 1585, Margaret Pierson, and the grandson of Robert Stickney of Frampton, who made his will Oct. 3, and was buried Oct. 18, 1582.

His only child was born Apr. 7, 1761; m. in 1782, widow Eunice (Willard) Carlton, who was sister of Henry Willard of Dummerston. He enlisted, Apr. 1, 1778, in Col. Jonathan Reed's Reg., Capt. Isaac Wood's Company; and afterwards in David Moore's Co., Aug. 3, 1780, to re-inforce the Continental army in Rhode Island. [Mass. Archives.]

Two of his four children were probably born in Harvard. He removed afterwards to Dummerston, where he died in March, 1815, aged 52. His widow died in 1832.

We give the family record beginning with his great-grand-father, Captain Daniel Estabrook of Sudbury, Mass., who was born Feb. 10, 1676, and married to Abigail Flint, Nov. 21, 1701.

She was born Jan. 11, 1675, dau. of John and Mary (Oakes) Flint.

The Flints came over from England in 1635. His father Thomas Flint came that year from Mattock in Derbyshire by the river Darran, where he lived and his predecessors had dwelt for 800 years without any entailment. The children of Capt. Daniel Estabrook and his wife Abigail were:

BENJAMIN ESTABROOK, blacksmith, was born and always lived in Dummerston. He learned his trade of Ebenezer Miller, who married Ama Farr, sister of Mrs. Estabrook. After serving a few years as an apprentice, he engaged in business for himself on the parental farm and took care of his parents through life. In 1835, he purchased the blacksmith-shop and dwelling-house of Royal Miller, where he lived at the time of his death. He worked at the blacksmith business 63 years; was a man universally respected for his upright Christian character; was always active in every good work, a kind-hearted and obliging neighbor, and one of the oldest members of the Congregational church at the time of his death. The writer is much indebted to him for many interesting incidents connected with the early history of the town.

WILDER FAMILY.

removed from Gerry (now Phillipston) Mass., in 1795, and settled on a farm in this town, now owned by Leroy Wilder, his grandson. On account of ill health, his son Frank has the management, making four generations, of the family that have lived on the place and cultivated the farm, which is one of the largest in town. The grave-yard adjoins the farm and in it are buried in one lot five generations of the Wilder family. We have not ascertained who the ancestors of Joshua Wilder were, but the family name is found among the inhabitants of Lancaster, a town in the same county as Gerry, and settled more than a century before the latter town, which was incorporated in 1786. Lieut. Nathaniel Wilder was killed by the Indians in Lancaster, July 31, 1704. Joshua was a Revolutionary soldier, and his service is reported elsewhere. He related an exploit of his grandfather which has been handed down to the present time.

It appears that his grandfather was fond of a good horse and rode much on horseback. One time he called at an inn to stay over night and requested that his horse might be turned out to pasture instead of being fed in the barn. When morning came and he was ready to start on his journey, he informed the landlord that he would go and catch his horse himself, as it was a young and spirited animal, and it was very difficult for a stranger to catch him. The landlord objected, because he had a cross bull in the pasture and he was afraid he would endanger the life of Mr. Wilder. Nothing, however, would deter him from catching his own horse. Before venturing into the pasture, he used the precaution, however, to fasten on his feet a pair of large, heavy spurs which he was accustomed to wear sometimes, when riding horseback. The landlord watched his proceedings with considerable anxiety. The horse and the bull were feeding near together, and Mr. Wilder could not catch his horse without attracting the attention of the bull. He fed quietly till he noticed a stranger approaching, when he suddenly turned and made a furious attack. Mr. Wilder equal to the emergency, dodging his enemy, caught him in such a manner as to land astride his back. He now had the advantage, and plunging the spurs deep into the sides of the bull, compelled him to run the course like a racehorse. The bull was conquered, and stopping shortly, bellowed for mercy. Mr. Wilder dismounted, patted him gently and said, "you are a good fellow, I have had a nice ride." The landlord was so much pleased with the brave exploit of Mr. Wilder that he would accept no pay for his night's lodging, nor would he take any pay thereafter for his staying over night, though he stopped on several occasions.

Joshua Wilder married Lois Hawes. Their children were :

Anna, b. 1782, m. Luke Kendal ; Betsey, b. 1783, m. Samuel Hadley ; Natt, b. 1784, m. Polly Warner ; Dan, b. 1786, m. Joanna Bemis ; Nabby, b. 1788, m. Simon Hadley of Williams-town, N. Y. Clarissa, born, 1789, m.

Stephen Hadley ; Nixon, b. 1791, m. — ; Lindal, b. 1792, m. Betsey Hadley ; Ruth, b. 1795, m. Ransom Covey ; Samuel, b. 1796, m. Olive Bemis ; Daniel, b. 1798, unmarried ; Columbia, b. 1800 ; Jefferson, b. 1802. All lived to be adult persons, and none died younger than 25 years.

Dan Wilder married, May 3, 1803, Joanna, dau of Joshua Bemis. Their children were : Alfred, Leroy, Eliza, William, Lindall, Edmond, Betsey, Elvira, Horace, Jason H.

Dan was a deacon of the Congregational church, many years. His father, Joshua, united with the church in 1842, when he was 84 years old.

Leroy Wilder is deacon of the church at the present time.

Dea. Dan Wilder now living in his 84th year, (1869) on one occasion, when a young man, cut from a Lombardy poplar, a small sprout to use as a riding-whip, and on returning from his ride, stuck it into the ground. The soil being moist, that sprout grew to be a tall tree. It was cut down a few years since, and measured across the stump, nearly 4 feet.

DR. ISAAC KNAPP

died May 9, 1883, in Fort Wayne, Ind. His parents were Dr. Isaac N. and Philinda (Dutton) Knapp. His early education was obtained in the common schools of this town and at the academy in Brattleboro. At about 20, he went West, and supporting himself by teaching at intervals, completed a full course at Marietta college, O., graduating in 1839. After teaching a year or two in the South and West, he returned to Vermont. He studied for the ministry, but gave it up on account of a throat disease, which prevented his speaking in public, and studied medicine with his father, Dr. Isaac N. Knapp, a successful physician in Dummerston, and afterwards attended and graduated at the medical department of the University of Vermont. He again went West, and practiced medicine several years, but his health proving inadequate, he turned his attention to dentistry, and took high rank in that profession, was thrice chosen president of the Indiana State Dental Association and a prominent officer in other dental societies, in the West. He contributed much to dental literature, corresponded with eminent men in the profession and delivered public addresses, one series of which was before the Fort Wayne Medical College. His views were pronounced and his influence positive, also, on all political, religious and social questions. He took an active part in the church and Sunday school work. He leaves a wife, Mrs. Rowena L. Knapp, one son, Wm. B., and a sister, Mrs. Lucy Safford, of Windsor, Conn. (The writer is indebted to the Fort Wayne Gazette for many of the facts pertaining to the life of Dr. Knapp in the West.

THE HOLTON FAMILY.

William Holton, Houlton, was born in England, 1611; came from Ipswich to America in ship "Francis," 1634; original proprietor of Hartford, Ct.;

removed thence to Northampton, Mass. where he was ordained deacon, 1663; representative to the general court 5 years from Northampton and 1 year from Hadley; on committee for Northfield at the second settlement, 1672; died Aug. 12, 1691. His wife, Mary ———, died Nov. 16, 1691.

Their children were John, Samuel, William, Mary, Sarah, Ruth, Rachel and Thomas. killed in the attack on Northampton, Mar. 14, 1676. Mary married David Burt, Nov. 18, 1656; Sarah married John King, Nov. 18, 1656,—the first two marriages in Northampton. Ruth married Joseph Baker, who was killed by the Indians, Oct. 29, 1675. Rachel married Thomas Strong.

John, son of William, died April 16, 1712. Abigail———, his wife, was living in 1718. Their children were Mary, Eleazer, Sarah, Abigail, Joshua, William and Thomas.

Thomas, son of John, was born Oct. 23, 1681; was in Northfield, 1718; killed by the Indians Aug. 23, 1723. He married Mindwell, daughter of Samuel Allen of Northampton. After her husband was killed she married Daniel Chapin. She died Oct. 21, 1758. Children: Joshua, born 1703; Thomas, 1705; Hannah, 1707; Mindwell, about 1712; Ithamer, who died Dec. 4, 1713.

THOMAS HOLTON,

son of Thomas (1681) was born about 1705; carpenter by trade; "dismissed from church in Northfield 1799, with wife and daughter Sarah, to be joined with others in a church in Fulham," now Dummerston, where he settled after 1771. He married Sarah ———; died in this town Dec. 22, 1800, aged about 95 years.

Their children were Thomas Allen, born in Northfield, 1744; Sarah, Arad, Nov. 1752; Mindwell, Hannah, Olive and Obedience, who were baptized Apr. 29, 1764; Sarah married Elijah Town, jr., about 1776. Arad married Anna Haven, (1); Rebecca Houghton, (2); Mrs. Eunice Spanlding, (3). Mindwell married William Orvis, who died Jan. 11, 1801, aged 41 years. A slate stone marks his resting-place in the cemetery, near the meeting-house.

Hannah married Joseph Nurse; Olive married Henry Cressy; Obedience married Calvin Butler. Five of these families resided in school district No. 5 in 1793. Calvin Butler lived on the farm now owned by I. M. Knapp. Wm. Orvis lived in a house that stood in the northwest corner of the "Orvis lot," near the place where some twenty old apple trees are now standing, west of the school-house. Elijah Town, jr., built the house and lived on the farm now owned by Howard Jones.

Wranslow Holton remembers well, a little incident that occurred at his Uncle Elijah's when he was a small boy. He went there one day to visit his cousins. Young Elijah, his cousin, who was older than he, showed him the bees that were working busily about the hives. Mr. Holton says that the "little devil" gave him a piece of board and told him to go and scrape off the bees from the hive. Instead of scraping off the bees he got himself into a scrape that he has never forgotten.

Arad Holton was a farrier and somewhat peculiar in his manner. When he was a young man he broke his leg below the knee, and wishing to have it set by a surgeon in Northfield, rode on horseback to that town, had the bone set, and returned on horseback next day. He always rode on horseback when traveling about the country. On one occasion he told some men that $300 had been offered him for the horse which he was riding. They looked much surprised. After a pause he added that it was the amount of four or five offers.

His Northfield friends told him, one time, that he was unwise to live up in Vermont on land not so productive as they had in Northfield. His reply was, "You boast of your productive lands, but I raised a pumpkin on my farm that you could not turn over with a hand-spike. They did not believe it till he added that it grew under a large root.

He claimed that he once hauled the heaviest load with a single horse of any man in Vermont. He explained that it was himself and five children, which made six whole tons, (Hol-tons) the large load of which he boasted.

THE CRESSEY JUMP.

Henry Cressey lived on a farm east of the "Lyman Knight place," since divided up and sold in separate lots. He is known as the man who made the "Cressey jump." The story goes that he was walking alone across a field and coming to a brook that was wide and deep, he said to himself: "Cressy, I will bet you a dollar that you can't jump across the brook. "Done," said he, and back he went a few paces to get a good start. When at full speed he bounded like a deer across the brook. Elated by his success, he said, "Now, Cressey, I will bet you another dollar that you can't jump back again.— "Agreed," said he, and, starting as before, he bounded, and missing a firm foothold, fell backwards, splash into the brook. Scrambling out of the water, he said: "It is a Cressey jump; nothing gained, nothing lost," and went on his way a wetter if not a wiser man.

THE OLDEST PERSON

that is now living in Dummerston, — in 1882 — is Mr. Wranslow Holton, aged 94 years. He was born in this town, Jun. 11th, 1788. At that time there were only thirteen states in the Union, and not as many people as now live in the state of New York. George Washington had not then been chosen President of the United States, and did not begin his first term of office as President till April 30, 1789, when Mr. Holton was more than a year old.

Thomas Holton, his grandfather, came from Northfield, Mass., with his family, and settled in this town previous to the beginning of the Revolutionary war.

His journey in quest of a new home was made by following up the Connecticut river till he reached "Canoe brook," now called "Murder Hollow brook;" and thence westerly about 2 miles from the river, where he selected 100 acres of good land for a farm which he purchased of the original proprietors. The site of the first house built on the farm is N. E. of the present buildings, east of the brook at the foot of the hill. The land is now owned by Willard Dodge.

Arad, married about 1777, and settled west of the brook, taking one-half the farm and his father keeping the other half of 50 acres, now called the "Orvis lot," owned by Mr. Dodge. Arad Holton lived on the farm from the time of settlement till his death in the 89th year of his age.

Wranslow, his son, was born in the old house that stood a short distance north of the dwelling in which he now lives, and which was built since his remembrance. Four generations of the Holton family now live in the same house, father, son, grand-daughter, and five great grand-children. There was 13 children in his father's family. Two of his half-brothers, Reuben and Arial, lived to be about 94 years of age. Others in the family died much younger.

SIMEON REED AND WIFE.

Simeon Reed was the son of Mr. John Reed one of the first settlers in Putney. He removed to that town from Dighton, Mass., settled on "West Hill," where there was good rocky soil, lived there many years, and died, 1840, aged 83. Simeon Reed bought the Reuben Smead place in this town in 1852, where he lived when he died. Mrs. Reed, his wife, was the daughter of Capt. Amos Joy, of Putney. She was born in that town in 1795, and belonged to a large family of children, only two of whom are now living---Rev. Amariah Joy of Joyfield, Mich. and Thomas Joy of Woodstock, Vt. Before her marriage, Mrs. Reed was a school teacher. She taught the school in Dis. No. 1, Dummerston Centre, in the cold summer of 1816, and has often said in reference to the coldness of that season, that at times she was obliged to wear a shawl in the school-room and get into the sunshine to make herself comfortable.

CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER II.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

After the dismissal of Mr. Beckley, Rev. Eber Child supplied the pulpit most of the time until May 19, 1840, when was installed. The council for Mr. Barbour's installation consisted of Rev. Mr. Walker, pastor of the church in East Brattleboro, Rev. C. Kidder in West Brattleboro, Rev. Calvin R. Bachelder in Westminster East, Rev. Jubilee Wellman in Westminster West, Rev. Horatio N. Graves in Townshend, Rev. L. S. Colburn in Fayetteville, and Rev. Amos Foster in Putney; Rev. Seth S. Arnold moderator; Rev. C. Kidder, scribe; invocation and reading the Scriptures, by Rev. C. R. Bachelder; introductory prayer, Rev. H. N. Graves; sermon, Rev. Charles Walker; installing prayer, Rev. C. Kidder; charge to the pastor, Rev. S. S. Arnold; right hand of fellowship, Rev. Amos Foster; address to the people, Rev. J. Wellman; concluding prayer, Rev. L. S. Colburn.

Mr. Barbour's salary was $450, paid semi-annually. The amount was raised by a tax made on the grand list of each member of the church, excepting what was obtained from others connected with the society. In 1842, a new meeting-house was built and the old church was taken down. The first church was built about the year 1777. At the raising, the frame was so heavy that the carpenters were obliged to suspend operations a few hours until more men could be obtained from Putney to assist in raising the building. The church was not finished for several years. At first, it was shingled and the frame covered with rough boards; planks were used for seats. Meetings were held about 2 years before the church was organized. Mr. Farrar may have preached that length of time previous to his installation in 1779.

During Mr. Barbour's ministry, 22 persons joined the church by profession and 15 by letter. He was dismissed Apr. 6, 1846. The council for that purpose consisted of Rev. H. N. Graves of Townshend, Rev. Alfred Stevens of Westminster West, Rev. Darwin Adam of Fayetteville, and Rev. Amos Foster of Putney. He died in Georgia, Vt. July 31, 1867, aged 60 years, 9 months, 23 days. He was born in Bridport, Vt., Oct. 8, 1805, son of James and Dorcas D. Barbour; graduated at Middlebury, 1831, at Andover 1834; for a year, he was agent of the American Sunday School Union; but near the close of 1835, commenced preaching in Saxton's River village, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in that place Dec. 15, 1836. Rev. Henry B. Homer of Springfield preached the sermon. His pastorate at Saxton's River was quite successful. A house of worship was built, a great revival took place, and the membership of the church was nearly doubled. He was dismissed Sept. 26, 1839.

He was installed pastor of the church in Dummerston, May 10, 1840. Rev. Charles Walker of Brattleboro preached the sermon. A house of worship was built during his pastorate and fifteen or more conversions took place.

He was dismissed Apr. 6, 1846.

After leaving Dummerston in 1846, he became agent of the Protestant Society, in which service he continued 3 years. From March 1849 to March 1852, he was acting pastor in Langdon, N. H.; installed in Wolfboro, June 16, '52, Rev. B. P. Stone, D. D., preaching the sermon; dismissed Nov. 27, '54; from Mar. 1856 to Dec. 1858, acting pastor in Cummington, Mass.; for a year or more, preached in Jamaica, Vt.; early in 1861, became acting pastor in Sullivan, N. H., for nearly 3 years; 1st, Sabbath Oct. 1866, preached at West Fairlee, Vt.; Nov. 1866, began preaching in Georgia, and there continued till his death, preceded by a sickness of only a few days, after 33 years of ministerial service. He was a sound, earnest, self-denying home missionary, sometimes blunt, yet gentle to all. He loved music, loved Christ, and all good men. He married, 1st, Aug. 24, 1835, Laura Ripley of Middlebury, who died May 8, 1846, aged 41 years; 2d, Apr. 25, 1849, Ruth Dunklee of Brattleboro, who died Oct. 29, 1854, aged 38 years; 3d, Oct. 15, 1855, Mary Willard of Rockingham.

REV. BENJAMIN F. FOSTER

was the fifth settled minister of this church; was born in Hanover, N. H., June 16, 1803, and was the son of Richard and Esther (Jewell) Foster. He was early consecrated to God by his pious parents, and his youth was marked by a conscientious regard for everything of good report. One who knew him from childhood, says: "He was an honest child, and an honest youth." Those who knew him in manhood can say he was an honest man. He learned the trade of a tanner which occupation he felt it his duty to leave after his conversion, at the age of seventeen and entered upon a course of study with the ministry in view.

He united the same year with the Congregational church in Hanover, N. H., under the pastorate of Rev. Josiah Towne.

He fitted for college at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., and was graduated at Amherst in the class of 1829; after which he studied theology with the Rev. Silas McKeen, D. D., of Bradford, and was licensed at Post Mills, Vt., Aug. 2, 1831, by the Orange Association.

For a few months, he preached in Waterford afterwards in Amoskeag, (now Manchester) N. H., and was ordained there as an evangelist in Mar. 1832. The Rev. Edward L. Parker of Londonderry preached the sermon.

He was installed Nov. 13, 1833, pastor of the Congregational church in Salisbury. The Rev. N. Bouton, D. D., of Concord preached the sermon. During his ministry at Salisbury there occurred several seasons of special religious interest, the most marked in the winter of 1842-43, when he admitted to the church forty by profession and forty by letter. He was dismissed July 23, 1846, on account of ill health, and installed at Dummerston Sept. 30, 1846. The Rev. Amos Foster, his brother, preached the sermon.

After a pastorate of more than 21 years, he was dismissed Dec. 18, 1867, by the same council that installed his successor, he having been unable to preach only occasionally for more than a year, previous. During his ministry fifty four joined the church by profession and twenty-three by letter.

Mr. Foster was a hard-working, earnest, faithful preacher and pastor. His sermons were plain, direct and instructive; and it was evident to his hearers that he sought only to do them good by his preaching.

He was interested in all movements for the good of the community, and especially in schools. He was for many years superintendent of schools in Dummerston, and when suffering much was faithful to that trust. His health was always poor; rarely was he free from pain. Hence he was often greatly depressed under the cares of the ministry. Yet there was a vein of cheerfulness in his constitution that made him always companionable, his presence desirable, and his home a welcome place to friends. He was, however, constitutionally desponding, and always thought little of himself and his attainments, while esteemed by his brethren in the ministry as an able divine and good critic.

He loved revivals, and labored earnestly to promote them, and mourned that he had not been able to win more souls to Christ. He died Nov. 2, 1868, aged 65 years, trusting in the Saviour he had preached, as he had preached him for 37 years. Rev. A. Stevens of Westminster West, preached the funeral sermon, taking for his text Eph. 2: 8.

Mr. Foster married Apr. 19, 1832, Ruth Hovey Kimball, of Hopkinton, N. H., who died June 3, 1845, aged 38 years; by whom he had 5 children.

Edward Cornelius, b. Jan. 17, 1834, d. Mar. 31, 1876.

Benjamin, b. Sept. 11, 1836, d. Sept. 28, 1836.

Frederick Webster, b. Sept. 10, 1837, d. July 16, 1838.

William Henry, b. July 15, 1839;

Ellen, b. Apr. 6, 1841, d. Oct. 9, 1841. In Aug. 1846, he married Mrs. Mary Perry of Manchester, N. H., now living, (1879) by whom he had Nellie F. born in May 1847. His oldest and youngest sons were soldiers in the army of the Union; the former, being connected at different times with three Wisconsin regiments, and the latter, William H. being for three years a member of Co. C. 3d Vt. Regiment.

EDWARD C. FOSTER,

REV. AUGUSTUS CHANDLER

was installed pastor, Dec. 18, 1867; sermon by the Rev. Nathaniel Mighill of Brattleboro, Vt. He was the sixth pastor of this church and was installed the same day that his predecessor, Rev. Mr. Foster, was dismissed, Aug. 24, 1870. He was born in Woodstock, Ct., Dec. 1, 1830, and was the youngest of nine brothers, all of whom grew to manhood and assumed prominent places in life. Two others are clergymen. He took his collegiate course at Williams college and was graduated at Andover Theo. Sem., 1859; ordained and pastor at Saxton's River 1 year; m. Lucy I. Lord, 1860; from 1860, about three years preached in Lempster, N. H.; often at Strafford, Vt., about 3 years, and was settled over the church in Dummerston in 1867, but after a year and a half was obliged by failing health to discontinue the ministry but followed the occupation of book-agent until, in the spring of 1875, when he became proprietor of the Record and Farmer, where his rare working powers, and ability as a writer, gave his journal a reputation not often achieved by country journals. Mr. Chandler was an energetic promoter of temperance principles, and gave many of his best efforts in favor of stringent liquor laws and their enforcement, even to the sacrifice of that business gain which all men seek.* In private life, he was a good citizen, a kind husband and indulgent father; a wife and three children survive him."

We are indebted to "The Vermont Record" for this account of the Rev. Mr. Chandler, condensed, mostly, from an obituary in that paper soon after his death.

He resigned his charge in this town July 10, 1869, and preached during the remainder of the year. He completed his studies at Andover during the winter and spring and received a call to become the pastor of this church June 24, 1870; was ordained Aug. 24, same year. He was a faithful minister, a good preacher, and labored zealously for the welfare of the church during the 7 years, till failing health compelled him to resign the pastorate, Sept. 10, 1877; much to the regret of his people. The acceptance of his resignation was delayed more than a year, his congregation hoping by rest he might regain his health, but their expectation failing, he was dismissed Mar. 5, 1879.

REV. HENRY MARDEN

of New Boston, N. H., became acting pastor during the winter of 1877 '78. He had been a missionaray at Aintab, Turkey about 6 years, for the Missions, till the death of his wife in Aaintab, when he returned to New Boston with his two small children. While preaching in Dummerston, he was again requested by the Board to resume his work in Turkey, and with his family, sailed from New York, Oct. 19, 1878, arrived at Marden, Turkey, Dec. 7th. His present field of labor is in Turkey.

REV. JOSIAH MERRILL.

succeeded Rev. Mr. Marden as acting pastor, Jan. 24, 1880. He was born in Otisfield, Me., Jan. 13, 1819, son of Rev. Josiah G. Merrill, then pastor of the Congregational church in that place. He united with the church at Cape Elizabeth, Me.; fitted for college partly at the academy at North Bridgton, partly at Gorham academy, Me.; graduated at Dartmouth in 1841; studied theology at Andover and Bangor; graduated in 1844; preached about 8 mos. at Rockville, Ct., abt. 18 mos. at Eastport, Me., ordained over White River church, Vt., Mar. 1 1848, Rev. Dr. Haddock, Dartmouth college, preaching the sermon. He was settled over the church at Wasscasset, Me., in July 1857; sermon by Rev. Henry D. Moore of Portland. From the autumn of 1867 to the spring of 1877, he resided at Cambridge, Mass. and supplied during all that time a church at South Franklin, Mass. He was pastor of the church in Dummerston nearly 4 years and became pastor of the church in Troy, N. H., Nov. 1, 1883. He was a very acceptable pastor during his stay in Dummerston, and the people regretted very much that he should deem it necessary to resign and accept a new field of labor. Mr. Merrill had no family while here, his wife having died some years ago. He married Miss Philomedia Henrietta Converse, of Portland, Me., Aug. 23, 1848; children: Henrietta A., b. July 2, 1849, d. aged 6 years; Caroline Adelaide, b. Mar. 9, 1851, m. Rev. Fred Lyman Allen, of Walpole, N. H.; Henry F., b. June 15, 1853, now in the revenue service at Shanghai, China; James C., b. Jan. 15, 1856, now in business at Chicago; Frederick J., b. Feb. 22, 1859, now in Kansas; Helen Isadore, b. Apr. 5, 1860, m. Lawrence Mayo, of Boston; Ida A.

b. Jan. 5, 1865, a graduate in 1883 from the Framingham State Normal school.

THE PARSONAGE.

Rev. Joseph Farrar occupied the house, during his residence in town, where the Rev. Aaron Crosby lived on the Dr. Walker place. The house belonging or standing on the minister's lot. In 1789, the town voted to have a well dug on the town lot within 3 rods of the house in the most convenient place, and Abel Butler dug the well for $50 hard money. Rev. Mr. Crosby built in 1796, a well-curb, or more properly, a well-house with windows in it, for which he asked the town to pay; but the town refused to pay for it. This well is on the place now owned by Dea. R. P. Pratt. Rev. Hosea Beckley had for a residence the house now called the "Randall place," which then stood a few rods north of its present site. It was moved to its present location by Asa Dutton and used for a time as a store. Its former site was used for a situation on which to build a new house for Rev. Nelson Barbour, and which Rev. B. F. Foster afterwards purchased for a homestead. The Randall house first stood on the hill near Clark Bacon's, and a blacksmith, Ebenezer Wait, lived there.

The buildings are on the south side of the common. In 1793, Enoch Cook was hired by the town to remove the fence on the old burying-ground south side of the common, and lay out the land into house lots and sell the same at „Public Vendue.” Probably the buildings thereon were built not long after they were sold at auction.

POT-HOUSE AND PEARL-ASH.

In 1796, David Leavitt got a vote of the town to let him "set up his pot-house on the east side of the common on the same conditions that Simeon Colby built his pearl ash and shed works in 1791.

REV. ALVIN D. FRENCH.

"Rev. Alvin Duncan French died in Denmark, Iowa, Oct. 25, 1866, aged 52. He was born in Dummerston, a son of Ephraim and Priscilla (Duncan) French, and was nearly self-educated though he spent several terms at Brattleboro Academy, and during a part of the year 1836, was a student in the Teachers Seminary at Andover, Mass. in the fall of 1837, he went to Borden-town, N. J., opened a select school and conducted it very successfully nearly 4 years; then a similar school in Jackson, Miss., for 18 months. While a teacher he pursued classical and theological studies, and in June 1842, was licensed to preach by the Susquehanna River, (Pa.) Association, thence to August 1843, was acting pastor of the Congregational churches in Jackson and New Milford, Pa. and in connection with his labors, an interesting revival occurred in Milford: Receiving a call to Centre Lisle, N. Y., he commenced preaching there Apr. 1, 1843; was ordained pastor, June 4, 1844, and during his ministry there, a church was built and several revivals took place; at his own request he was dismissed Dec. 1, 1855, to go West in the service of the American Home Missionary society; he went to Eddyville, Iowa, early in January, 1856; was installed pastor, Oct. 8, 1858; two powerful revivals occurred during his ministry. He remained till failing health compelled him to discontinue preaching. He married Sept. 25, 1837, Caroline A. Clark, a native of Dummerston," daughter of Amasa Clark.

"P. H. W." in "The Vermont Record," Dec. 19, 1866.

THE OLD WELL ON THE COMMON

The old well in the north-east corner of the common that supplies four families with water constantly, also, the church-going people once a week with clear, cold, sparkling water fresh from "the moss-covered, iron-bound bucket that rose from the well," is the one dug by Eben Ash in 1801.

THE OLD POUND.

The old pound wall near the ledges, west of the common, a part of which is now standing, was built for the town by Benjamin Alvord in the fall of 1796, for $36. The size of the wall was 4 feet at the base, 2 feet at the top, 6 ft. high, perpendicular inside, and 2 rods clear inside. Mr. Alvord was "not to go, for the stones, over 4 rods west from the top of the ledge, west of the pound spot, and as far north as the old pound." The old pound built of round poles was located at the foot of the ledge west of the meeting-house.

THE OLD NOYES & HAYES STORE

occupied by the firm of Noyes & Hayes, afterwards by Noyes & Birchard, and now used for a dwelling-house and shoemaker's shop, was built by Simeon Colby for a store, and stood on the north side of the old meeting-house, west of the road. The town gave him permission to build the store and where to locate it, Sept. 6, 1791. Mar. 16, 1795, the town voted to have Jason Duncan move the store to its present site, and the town was to receive $5 a year, rent for the ground on which it stands so long as the building was used for a store.

We have seen a few notes and receipts that were connected with the business here between the years 1812 and 1817. A promissory note given to the firm of Noyes & Mann, dated "Brattleborough July 23, 1813." Two other notes, each given to the firm of Noyes & Hayes, dated in Dummerston, one June 26, 1816, the other March 6, 1817. A receipt for goods purchased at the store of "Noyes & Birchard" in Dummerston, dated April 29, 1818. These papers help confirm the statement, about the time when these parties were in trade here in Dummerston, and that John Noyes remained in town for a while after the dissolution of the firm, Noyes & Hayes, in 1817. The receipt given by Noyes & Birchard reads as follows:

2 qts St. Rum (Saint Croix,)	- .75
1-4 lb. Tobacco, - - -	.19
1-4 lb. H. T. [Hyson Skin] Tea,	.23
	$1.17

NOYES & BIRCHARD.

By R. Birchard.

"Sir: we shall have Bohea Tea, N. E. Rum and fish in a week."

The statement has been made that Noyes, Mann & Hayes were in trade in this town in 1812. To confirm the statement, we copy a note.

"Dummerston, Mar. 9, 1812.

For value Rec'd. of Noyes, Mann & Hayes We jointly and severally promise to pay them or their order fifty-six Dollars upon demand with interest.

RUTHERFORD HAYES.

[Written during the presidential campaign 1876, by the Dummerston correspondent of the "Vermont Phoenix."]

William Miller, a life long resident of Dummerston, now living (1876) at the age of 87 years, was well acquainted with Rutherford Hayes, father of Governor Hayes, who became and now is (1879) president of the United States. Mr. Hayes was a member of the firm, Noyes & Hayes, and Mr. Miller often traded at their store in this town. He now uses a very good razor which he bought of Mr. Hayes in 1814.

During the autumn of 1812, or about a year before the marriage of Mr. Hayes to Miss Birchard of Wilmington, a pleasing incident happened to him, it may not be amiss here to relate. Jacob Laughton, grandfather of Austin Laughton who now lives on the same farm owned by his grandfather, then lived in the old house which was burned to the ground some twenty years ago, near the site of the new house. His family had a quilting party at which the ladies were invited to be present in the afternoon and the gentlemen in the evening. Among the latter was Rutherford Hayes.

When the evening's amusement had ended, the gentlemen were expected to escort the ladies home. Mr. Hayes being a young man of good character and position, was a very desirable escort for the ladies. But the most expectant ones for his company home, were doomed to be disappointed; for he made no choice among the anxious ones, but selected a very respectable, quiet appearing young lady, who had not the least thought of receiving an invitation from him. The night was very dark. It was about one mile to the lady's home.

When Mr. Hayes and his lady left the company amidst the frowning of the disappointed, they passed through the east door, supposing they could walk directly to the road. Much to their surprise, after walking a few feet, they stepped directly off a wharfing, three or four feet high, and fell plump into a mud-hole where the family were accustomed to throw waste-water. Neither of them were much hurt, but the lady's white dress was very much soiled. Mr. Hayes was exceedingly embarrassed for fear that Miss Farr, [for that was the young lady's name] would think he had blundered on purpose; but he apologized for their mishap and assured Miss Farr that he was entirely ignorant of the situation and supposed the path led directly to the road. Fortunately no one observed them and they reached home without further misfortune."

When Mr. Hayes was married to Miss Birchard, he first lived for a short time in the red house, afterwards owned and occupied many years by Benjamin Estabrook, whose first wife was the Miss Farr mentioned. From that house he moved into the large two-story residence now occupied by Mrs. Asa Knight, south of the common and very near to the store where the firm, Noyes, Mann & Hayes were doing business. When the firm dissolved partnership, the profits of the last year in trade were $3000, which was shared equally among the partners.

John Noyes, a member of the firm, m. Polly Hayes, a sister of Rutherford Hayes. Names of children recorded:

Harriet Hayes, born July 5, 1817;

Charlotte Augusta, born March 2, 1819.

Mr. Noyes was called at that time one of the richest men in Windham county. He moved to Putney from this town, about 1819, where he died in 1841, October 26, aged 78 years. A daughter of his was married to Larken G. Mead, Esq., of Brattleboro, and thus his son, Larkin G. Mead, the sculptor, is a distant relative of President Hayes.

When the father of President Hayes left Dummerston in 1817, and went to Ohio to seek a home there for himself and family, he left his wife and children with the family of Mr. Noyes in whose residence Mr. Hayes and family lived.

Mrs. Hayes was very much opposed to her husband's going West and could not be persuaded to remain long in the family of Mr. Noyes, but moved into a small building which then stood just east of the store where she and her children remained till her husband returned and took them to their Western home in Delaware, Ohio. The building which she occupied for a time, was afterwards removed to a site opposite William Miller's, and used for many years as a work-shop by J. E. Worden.

Sardis Birchard, the wealthy uncle of President Hayes, was once a clerk in the store for Noyes & Hayes; and while visiting his relations in Fayetteville in 1871, he called with his brother, Hon. Austin Birchard, and examined the long two-story red building where he began his career as a clerk. The other brother, Roger Birchard, was also, at one time a clerk for the same firm.

When President Hayes and his family came to Vermont and visited his uncle at Fayetteville, Aug. 17, 1877, the following interesting reminiscences were printed in the Boston Journal of Aug. 18, 1877:

"In the town of Dummerston upon a plateau which commands a charming view of the fertile valley, are several interesting mementoes of the Birchard and Hayes families.

On the south side of the common, connected with a large, modern wooden structure, stands the little store in which Rutherford Hayes, father of the President, first embarked in business as a member of the firm of Noyes, Mann and Hayes. The partners came from West Brattleboro and set up a country store, where they continued to do business for several years. The firm dissolved, and John Noyes and Rutherford Hayes united their fortunes and opened a store in a large two-story building, painted red, which still stands on the east side of the green, and is now occupied by a venerable cordwainer. A portion of the second story was fitted up as a ball-room, and here in ye olden time the rustic belles and beaus were wont to tip a light fantastic toe to the music of the violin. The ceiling, from which great patches of plaster have fallen, is arched, and along the sides of the hall are permanent seats, innocent of paint, which have grown brown with age. The place is destitute of ornament or furniture, contains a spinning-wheel and several old chests and trunks. In this building Mr. Hayes carried on business between the years 1812 and 1817. The kitchen and porch of the house, now owned and occupied by Mrs. Asa Knight, were built by Mr. Hayes and are still in a good degree of preservation. One of his children, a son, born in this house, was drowned while skating on the Ohio river a few years after the family emigrated to Ohio."

It was a little singular that while these facts were being obtained at the house of Mrs. Knight, the photograph of Miss Mary Birchard, the cousin of President Hayes, who fell a victim to the Ashtabula disaster, should be presented. Traditions illustrative of the character of the father of the President who is pronounced a very "set" man, who had to be convinced that a thing was right before he would do it, are rife among the older residents, and to these the visit of the son, with honor crowned, has an added interest.

JONAS MANN

who was in town with Noyes and Hayes, married Mary Negus, daughter of Joseph Negus, who married Rosanna Miller, sister of John B. Miller's father. A daughter of Gen. Mann's married Col. Wm. L. Marcy of New York, secretary of war under Polk's administration. Secretary Marcy's daughter was married to Gen. George B. McClellan, making him a distant connection of the Miller family in this town.

[A more complete history of Hon. Samuel W. Porter may be expected to appear with the history of Springfield when published.]

POST-OFFICE BUSINESS.

In looking up the post-office history for this town, we supposed that a post-office record was kept by each postmaster and handed down from one to another who succeeded to that office; but upon inquiry we found no such continuous record was kept. Previous to 1811 or '12, the people of Dummerston and many other towns surrounding Brattleboro, got their mail at that post-office. Charles Miller was the first postmaster here and held the office at the time of his death, Apr. 2, 1820. Edwin Sargeant next held the office for a short time and was succeeded by Lewis Henry who held the place till 1832, when Luther Allyn was appointed who held the office 21 years. In 1853, the post-office was removed from the tavern kept by Mr. Allyn near the Birchard place on the road from Brattleboro to Putney, to Slab Hollow, and was kept by Willard C. Wilkins two or three years until Randolph A. Knight was appointed. He remained in the office till Sept. 1st, 1861, at which time Wm. O. Miller received the place and is the present postmaster in 1879. At the time, Mr. Knight was appointed, the post-office was removed to Dummerston Centre.

WEST DUMMERSTON POST-OFFICE.

was first kept by Elder Ziba Howard, and he had the following successors to that office: Dea. John Greenwood, Nelson W. Willard, David Aiken, Charles Taft, Elihu M. Wilson, John K. Leonard, and Noah B. Samson, who is the present postmaster.

A record of the post-office business has to be kept and sent to Washington every month, or, quarter, and a copy ought, in every town, to be filed with the Town Clerk.

BIOGRAPHY CONCLUDED,

so far as the writer has been able to obtain it from their descendants, of the families in Dummerston, except, those in West Dummerston, that will be given together in another chapter.

WORDEN FAMILY.

PETER WORDEN was the emigrant ancestor of the Wordens in this country and from him have descended at the present time 11 generations in America. He came, probably, from Clayton, Lancashire, in England, and after a short residence in Lynn, was among the early, if not the first settlers in Yarmouth, Mass. His will dated Feb. 9, 1638, is on record at Plymouth, Mass. It was proved, Mar. 5, 1638. He is called "Peter ye elder" in the record. It is supposed he was born about 1568 and died at the age of 75.

Peter Worden, 2d, was his only son and was made executor of the will. He inherited all his father's estate in America. In 1676, he was one of the largest tax-payers in Yarmouth. His will is dated Jan. 9, 1680 and was proved Mar. 3, 1681. He was born probably in England in 1609 and died at the age of 72 years. His wife, Mary Sears? or Winslow? died, 1687.

Samuel, a son of Peter, 2d, was a physician; was born 1646; m. Hopestill Holley, 1665; removed to Stonington, Ct., before 1715 and died 1716, aged 71. Peter, 3d, son of Samuel, was born in Yarmouth 1668, m. Mary Holley 1693; d. Nov. 18, 1732, aged 64. One of his two sons named in his will was Peter Worden, Jr., 4th, a blacksmith. He married Rebecca Richmond, lived in Westerly, R. I., and had 10 children. His son, John, born 1724? m. Dorothy Satterly, and they were the parents of John, 2d, Nathan, Joseph, and Hannah, born 1761, who married Maj. William Miller, of Dummerston, the father of "Uncle Asa."

NATHEN WORDEN

was a Baptist preacher and moved to Westmoreland, N. H., 1778, thence to Chesterfield, 1786, where he preached several years, extending his labors to Keene, Dummerston and adjoining towns. Sylvester, another son of Peter, 4th, b. 1735? m. Rebecca, daughter of Ichabod Eccleston. In May 1780. he came with his family to Halifax, where he died before 1818.

Peter, son of Sylvester, born Feb. 20, 1766, m. Sep. 17, 1788, Rachel Hale who lived to be 100 years old. He died in Halifax, aged 48; J. Edson, his son. b. 1808, attended the common and high schools of that town, and, for a time, the academy in West Brattleboro; taught school, successfully, for 13 winters, in Halifax, Leydon, Mass., Guilford, Putney, and Dummerston.

He became a resident of this town in 1830, and married, May 27, 1834, Eliza B., dau. of Ira and Jemima (Ward) Haven. They had three children of whom Gertrude E. and Gertrude L. E. died in childhood, and Eddie R. d. Aug. 14, 1864, aged, 13 years. Mrs. Worden died Feb. 21, 1882, aged 67, and Mr. Worden is the only one left of a family of 12 children most of whom lived to be quite aged.

His occupation has been farming, and the place which he now owns and cultivates was settled by Thomas Clark in 1770. He has been prominent in town business many years; was selectman in 1860 and '61, has served as deputy sheriff, constable and collector, and has been chosen many times moderator of the annual town meetings; and has been many years, and still is, a justice of the peace.

WILDER FAMILY,

Additional information in regard to Joshua Wilder is that probably an ancestor of his lived in Shrewsbury in 1732. Ward in his history of Shrewsbury, Mass., says Joshua Wilder (probably from Lancaster), m. Sarah, dau. of Maj. John Keyes, Dec. 21, 1731, and was then called of Shrewsbury. She was added to the church in 1728. The children were Rosinah, b. July 1, 1732, the only one whose birth is on record here; John, baptized Dec. 4, 1748. As there is no other record of John than that he was baptized here, it is not probable that he was born in town. Joshua Wilder was one of the first settlers in Princeton, Mass. This town joins Rutland from which several families removed to Dummerston.

Some writer in a Brattleboro paper in 1848, reports having seen "four generations in the field;" and writes of the mowing-bee, briefly mentioned in the notice of Mr. Wilder in the chapter of the old military men of Dummerston.

Says the writer in the paper named, we witnessed a scene a few days since on the farm of Messrs. Wilder in Dummerston, which illustrates in a marked degree, the health-giving, and life prolonging tendency of the farming occupation in New England when pursued with industry, frugality, and temperate habits. It was a mowing match participated in by four distinct generations. The mowers took their places in the field, and Joshua Wilder, a patriarch of ninety summers, after examining with a practiced eye the hanging and the edge of his scythe, led off with his usual quick and easy stroke, followed in succession by his son, Dea. Dan Wilder, his grandson, Leroy Wilder, Esq., and his great-grandson, Wallace Wilder. If his great-great-grandson, living in another part of the country had been on the ground to spread the swathes, as he could have done, it would have added to the novelty and interest of the scene. A distance of twenty-five rods and back was mowed, the venerable leader keeping his place in front with little or no apparent fatigue. All reside on the same farm and cultivate it in common. They carry on the tanning business and perform other mechanical labor, also produce all the necessities of life. At 88 years of age, Joshua Wilder built a covered wagon in which representatives of the four generations on pleasant Sabbath mornings, may be seen wending their way to church."

ELIAS WILDER

lived on the Stephen Dutton place not far from Joshua Wilder's, but was not related to him as far as we are informed. His eldest daughter, Dolly, b. 1773, m. George Miller. The youngest of his ten children, Abigail, b. 1796, married Solomon Lawton, brother of Asa Lawton, now 87 years old and the only person living in town who remembered Elias Wilder, who died Jan. 14, 1808, aged 56.

SAMUEL WILDER

and Huldah his wife were the parents of Joel, b. 1779, Ephraim, Calvin. Joel, m. Roxany Prior, Feb. 19, 1801.

Aaron Wilder, m. widow Joanna Crawford, Dec. 26, 1784.

Charles Wilder, m. Sarah Spaulding, Oct. 27, 1782.

lived sixty years ago near the old bridge place just east of the school house now standing in Dis. No. 6. He married, probably, Mary Livermore, who died Apr. 15, 1832, aged 80. They had three daughters: Mary, m. an Allen and had three children, Ebenezer, Amos and Fanny; Lucinda, unmarried; Rebecca, m. Ebenezer Sparks, whose first wife was a Hodgkins. Tilly Wilder died Nov. 3, 1824, aged 74.

His name does not appear in the tax list of 1810, but Lucinda is taxed that year, probably for the house in which they lived. She and Rebecca were tailoresses, and are remembered by aged persons as occupying a room in which the windows were oiled paper instead of glass and required to be changed or renewed several times a year.

ZENAS WILLIS.

Mr. Willis was a clothier and lived in the house which stood near the bridge that crosses Salmon brook east of the house now owned by William Wheeler. His wife was Dorcas Peterson? and they had two children, Samuel P., b. 1810. and Dorcas S., 1818, both of whom died young.

Chinery Puffer boarded with Mr. Willis and studied medicine with Dr. Isaac Knapp, Joseph Duncan, Jr. m. Mariah Blake, an adopted daughter of Mr. Willis.

WINSLOW DUTTON.

Mr. Dutton was born Sept 12, 1805, in Newfane, to which place his parents, Samuel and Abigail (Hodgkins) Dutton removed from Dummerston in 1804 and returned in 1820. He worked on a farm until he was of age, and spent the following winter lumbering in the forests of Hinsdale, N. H. Failing health required a change of employment. He returned to Dummerston and decided to be a wheelwright, and became an apprentice to Asa Miller, Dec. 19 1827, whose shop and dwelling-house were located at Slab Hollow, a small village on Salmon brook.

In 1829, he bought the carding-machine and carded wool in connection with other work for 9 years. He began business for himself at carriage-making Jan. 1, 1830, and during the following summer, built the carriage-shop in which he has worked at his trade 52 years. The old sign on the shop was painted by John Woodbury, and exhibits in addition to Mr. Dutton's name, an antique, high-back sleigh, an old-fashioned wagon in use before the thorough-brace, and a wheel that reminds the observer of a velocipede without a rider.

In 1835, he bought Asa Miller's carriage-shop which was pulled down and on the site built the dwelling-house in which he now resides. In 1841, he built the house now owned and occupied by Manor Smith, who married Mr. Dutton's sister, Linda. The house now occupied by Charles Dutton, his son, was built by Mr. Dutton in 1842, and is within a few rods of the parental homestead.

Mr. Dutton was representative for the town at the State capital in 1848 and in 1849: he was a good citizen, and a good mechanic and an industrious man. When customers called at his shop, they always found him busy at the work-bench, and ever ready to welcome his many friends.

He was twice married, 1st to Lavilla Holton, Jan. 27, 1830, 2d to Esther Miller, dau. of Wm. and Esther Knight Miller, with whom he is now living. He had 7 children, all by the first marriage—Amandarin, Barney, Charles, Daniel K., Eunice L., Helen Maria, Henry Marshall. The mother of these children died Jan. 22, 1854. Only two of them are now living. Charles, who married Sophia Sargeant, Oct. 3, 1860, and Helen M., who married Henry H. Miller, June 5, 1861.

MILLER FAMILY.

son of Marshal and Abigail (Haven) Miller, was born Apr. 12, 1783. All his life, except the last few years, was spent in Dummerston. He was a laborious and successful citizen, a prominent actor in matters pertaining to the welfare of his native town, as lister, selectman and town agent. He was chosen associate judge of the Windham County Court in 1847 and 1848.

He was among the first of his townsmen to advocate temperance and was a firm friend of the temperance cause as long as he lived,—his oft repeated counsel to his boys, being, "Touch not, taste not, handle not." He died in Brattleboro, Mar. 25, 1865, aged nearly 82. His widow is still living (1884) in the 94th year of her age. She was Harriet Moore and married Mr. Miller in the spring of 1810.

Their children were Chester, a teacher, m. 1st, Caroline Eaton, 2d, Mary Cune; Lydia L., died young; Harriet Marcia, m. Chamberlin Wilder; Lucy L., m. Horace Cate; James Monroe, a teacher, went south and married a lady in Tennessee; Lovinia, a teacher, married John Dwinell; Lestina, a teacher, m. James Reed of Brattleboro; Robert Dexter; Ozro, a soldier, m. Ellen, dau. of Jacob Laughton; Walter

m. 1st, a lady in California, 2d, a widow in Halifax, Vt.; Julia, m. Newell Walker; Electa, a teacher, m. 1st, Rev. C. D. Jefferds, 2d, a Mr. Woodburn; Celia died about the age of 14 years.

REV. ROBERT DEXTER MILLER, son of Hon. Thomas Miller was born in Dummerston, September 23, 1824; prepared for college at the Ellington High School, Ct., and Brattleboro Academy; graduated from Amherst College in 1848, and from the Theological Institute of Connecticut in 1852. He was principal of Purdy Academy in Tennessee, in 1849 and 1850; was ordained to the ministry at North Wardsboro in 1856. His work in the ministry has been chiefly in Vermont, one year in New Hampshire, and a few years in Massachusetts. He is now, 1884, preaching in West Hartford, Vt. The writer heard Mr. Miller preach in Dummerston when visiting his relatives and the old homestead, and can say that his sermons were ably written, well delivered, sound in doctrine, instructive and interesting to his hearers. Mr. Miller published a book several years ago, containing a life sketch of his brother-in-law, Rev. C. D. Jefferds with many selections from his sermons, and essays written while in college. He also published a sermon, written by himself, on The Great Rebellion.

Mr. Miller has been twice married. His 1st wife was Sarah Lucretia Dutton of Brattleboro, the 2d, Eliza Chamberlain Cook of Gill, Mass. He has had six children, only two living.

A son of his prepared for college at Kimball Union Academy, N. H., and was graduated from Middlebury College in 1882.

MAJOR OZRO MILLER,

a brother of Rev. R. D. Miller, was born Dec. 7, 1826; enlisted in the army against the Great Rebellion and was chosen captain of the Shelburne Falls, Mass. Co. He was a resident of Shelburne Falls at that time, and had a wife and three small children. His partners in business presented him a rifle which he used with good effect while commanding his men in the battle of Fair Oaks before Richmond. For gallantry in that battle, he received a major's commission. While in command of his regiment, the Mass. 10th, soon afterward, he received a mortal wound through the lungs, was left on the field, taken prisoner and carried to Libby Prison in Richmond. He was wounded, July 2, 1862, and died in the prison, July 15, 1862. One of the men in his company, imprisoned with him, ministered to his relief, and aware that his life would soon close, inquired whether he had any word to leave for his friends. He replied:

"Tell them I died like a true soldier, for my country."

He once wrote to his brother, while in camp:

"My country called for able-bodied men of whom I was one. It was doubtless my duty to enlist, and if I may but be assured of leaving my children as good an inheritance as I have received, I shall be satisfied whatever my lot may be."

DANA MILLER,

a son of Wm. and (Esther) Knight Miller, was a college graduate. His name should appear on page 135 immediately after the name of Edwin H., son of Wm. O. Miller, not brother as there printed. Dana Miller graduated from Dartmouth college in 1843. His ante-collegiate studies were in Townshend and what follows this statement in that sketch is descriptive of him. Wm. O. was constable and collector 40 not 48 years. His parents were married Sept. 11, 1814.

WILLIAM DANA MILLER,

a son of Wm. O., graduated from Williams college in 1882, and is now, 1884, principal of the graded school in West Stockbridge, Mass.

ANSEL IRWIN MILLER, son of Joseph and Sophia (Arms) Miller, graduated from Williams college in the class of 1881 and chose medicine as his profession. He entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City, from which he graduated, May 1, 1884.

Following the advice of his instructors, he sought and obtained a situation in a large hospital on Blackwell's Island near the city. Among the 19 applicants for the eight vacancies at the time, he ranked No. 2 in the competitive examination.

He became a minister and was the author of several volumes. He was born in Gardiner, Mass., Apr. 7, 1774, and died in Farmington, Van Buren Co. Iowa, Aug. 27, 1844.

He began his ministerial career, as a Baptist in 1801, after his removing from this town.

married Mary Kathan and their children were Elihu, b. Nov. 13, 1780; Molly; Clarissa; Thomas; Alexander; Chester; George. The father died Dec. 1, 1833.

Charles C. Frost, the owner of the old Bible, printed in 1731, containing the Kathan and Sargeant family record, mentioned on page 13, died Mar. 16, 1880. Since his death, no trace of the old Bible can be found.

THE WESTERN BOUNDARY LINE OF DUMMERSTON.

In the plan of survey made in 1767, page 4, the western boundary line, as then surveyed, was a straight line running north by east 26 degrees. At the present day the line runs northerly about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, easterly $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles, then northeasterly to Putney line. When was the change of western boundary made? The town records are silent on this point. May 25, 1885, Judge H. H. Wheeler of Brattleboro, sent the writer the following information on the subject: A certain witness testified in Windham County Court about 1860, that he was born in "No town." He explained that the place was not in any town, but was a gore next to Newfane and Marlboro. Judging from his age then, he was born about 1790. I understood from others at the time that there was a gore there not in any town for a while. The original west line of Dummerston was in the west line of the "Equivalent lands," which would leave a gore next to Marlboro. The equivalent lands were laid out Nov. 10, 1715, long before there were any other grants in the neighborhood on the west or north. The south line of Brattleboro and the north line of Putney are now almost, if not exactly identical with the north and south lines of the equivalent lands. The west line of the equivalent lands joined the western extremities of those lines. It was called 12 miles long, but overran, as most all old lines did. The equivalent lands were laid out for Connecticut under the authority of Massachusetts, which granted Westminster on the north, and whose grants were respected by New Hampshire when the lands were found to lie within that Province. I have no doubt that it was intended to have Newfane and Townshend join the equivalent lands on the west, but the north and south lines of those lands were $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, extending W. N. W. from the river, and the west line would be parallel to the direction of the river between the lines. They were probably deceived by that direction and made the east and west lines of those towns too nearly north and south, which left a gore at the north end which became Brookline. The direction of the east line of Marlboro left a gore there which was put on to Brattleboro and Dummerston.

The equivalent lands here were laid out by Matthew Allyn, Ebenezer Pumry, and Roger Walcott, commissioners appointed for that purpose. Judge Wheeler further states that he has seen the original document signed by them, laying out the land, at the office of the Secretary of State at Hartford.

CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER III.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

CONGREGATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL.

The earliest history of the Sunday school in this town dates back to about 1820. Soon after that date Miss Hannah Wells of Brattleboro held meetings in several of the school-houses in the east part of the town, changing about in the different districts as required for the accommodation of the pupils, who were formed into classes to study the catechism, recite verses from the Bible, memorize hymns, and learn the morning and evening prayer.

These meetings, or schools, led to the organization of a Sunday school at the church during the ministry of Rev. Hosea Beckley. Dea. Abel Haven was probably the first Sunday school superintendent. Dea. Asa Burnap, Rev. Nelson Barbour, Asa Lawton, Rev. Augustus Chandler and Leavitt E. Bond have held the same position in the order named. Mr. Bond is the superintendent for 1884 and has served since May 1872. The number of teachers and officers, June 1, 1884, was 13; scholars over 20 years of age, 33; under 20 years, 28; total 61; total membership 74; average attendance about 50.

THE LIBRARY

contains about 400 volumes. Jonathan French was the first librarian and had charge of a small collection of books kept in a trunk and located in the deacon's seat. J. Edson Worden succeeded Mr. French and served forty years.—Myron F. Dutton is the present librarian and was chosen in 1883.

CHURCH STATISTICS.

The average attendance on public worship is about 80,—the maximum, 130. The number of male members in the church is 23, female 66, total 89. The deacons at the present time are Leroy Wilder, Adin A. Dutton and Richard P. Pratt.

THE CHURCH CHOIR.

It is said that Judge Jason Duncan was the first leader of the choir. He was succeeded by his son, Joseph Duncan, Esq. The principal leaders since his time are William Knapp, Chinery Puffer, Jonas Bennett, and Joseph Miller, Esq., who is the present leader and has served many years. During the leadership of Joseph Duncan, the key was sounded with a wooden pitch-pipe. The first instrumental music was furnished by four musicians, Asa and Sylvester Dutton, violinists, Franklin Dix, cornet or post-horn, and Joseph Miller, bass-viol. The seraphine was first used in the choir about 1850. An Estey organ was bought a few years ago, and in the spring of 1884, a new Estey organ of superior tone and quality took its place. Mrs. William O. Miller is the organist for the present year, 1884, and has served very acceptably as organist for 28 years. Others have rendered good service at times when she could not be present. All the members of the choir, whether of long or short service, are entitled to much credit for the important part they perform in public worship.

Previous to the use of the violin and cornet in the choir, the following persons at different times played the bass viol, Oscar Cooledge, who was a merchant in Slab Hollow about 55 years ago, Joel Knight, jr. Samuel G. Duncan, and Nelson French.

THE OLD MEETING-HOUSE.—PAGE 83.

Put a period in place of the comma after in, 6th line, 2d column, and let July, 1783, be the date for finishing the porch.

Omit 60x60, as no size is stated except for the second porch. The house was plastered in 1794 at an expense of $100. Apr. 25, 1676, should read 1776. When the pews were built, the board-seats were hung on hinges so as to turn up against the side of the pew for convenience in standing during prayer-time; and as the congregation resumed their seats, these were let down with a zeal that betokened some interest in this part of the ceremony.

The following stanza from a poem read by Samuel Burnham at the centennial celebration of the town of Rindge, N. H., will describe the scene:

"And when at last the loud Amen
Fell from aloft, how quickly then
The seats came down with heavy rattle,
Like musketry in fiercest battle."

REV. MOSES H. WELLS

came from Claremont, N. H. to Dummerston and began to supply the church, April 1, 1884 and is the active pastor. He was born in Deerfield, N. H., Aug. 27, 1814; fitted for college at Pembroke, N. H., and graduated at Dartmouth college in 1839. He graduated at the Theological seminary at Andover, Mass., in 1845; was ordained at Pittsfield, N. H., Nov. 19, 1845 and dismissed Dec. 1853. He taught in the academy at South Berwick, Me., 2 years; became pastor of the church in Hinsdale, N. H. in Oct. 1855 where he was a successful pastor for 10 years. He supplied the church at Lyndon, Vt. for 5 years from Apr. 1, 1866; began his pastoral care of the church at Waterford, Vt., July 1, 1871, and remained 7 years. Beginning Mar. 1, 1880, he preached three years at Ascutneyville, Vt.

Rev. Alfred Stevens, D. D., a classmate of Mr. Wells, recommended him to the church in Dummerston, that had been without a pastor from the time

Rev. Mr. Merrill left till the time when Mr. Wells came and preached a few Sabbaths before accepting a call to become the resident pastor of the church.

The people were very fortunate in securing the services of so able and excellent a minister as Mr. Wells. He and his family will add much to all the influences that work for good in every community.

Mr. Wells married 1st, Miss Ann R. Votée, of New York City; 2d, Miss Emily M. Taylor, of Hinsdale, N. H., His children are Annie M., Charles V., and Julia Ellen.

Annie graduated from Mt. Holyoke Seminary; taught in the Seminary 4 years, and is now a teacher in the Huguenot Female Seminary at Wellington, South Africa, where she has taught 9 years.

Charles is a farmer and manages the farm which his father purchased in Dummerston for himself and family.

Julia Ellen, graduated from the Stevens High School at Claremont, N. H., and is now a pupil in Mt. Holyoke Seminary for 1883 and 84.

OUR PHYSICIANS.

DR. — DEAN

who came here about 1809, had an extensive practice for some years, but broke down at length and left for his native place in Massachusetts.

DR. — DAVIDSON

who was here in 1817 and remained one or two years.

DR. JOHN WILSON

believed by many to be Captain Thunderbolt, who died in Brattleboro, 1847. He came to Dummerston in 1819, and lived in what is now called the Samuel Wheeler district. He was a teacher in the school there for one or two terms, and also taught one term in district No.

1. He was a peculiar school-master and used the "rod of correction" rather than the ferule. It was not a short stick, as many teachers used in those days rather than let school children be spoiled, but a long sweeping rod with which he could reach from his desk and switch the unruly urchins into obedience without leaving his seat.

DR. JONATHAN MOORE

will be remembered for a time, at least, on account of his "Essence of Life" which he made by the barrel. Ebenezer Miller who, oftentimes, had serious attacks of asthma, sent for medicine, on one occasion, to Dr. Moore, who sent to him a bottle full of the Essence of Life, which, on being handed to him, he drank the contents off at one dose and felt no bad effects afterwards.

DR. ISAAC BOYDEN,

also, should be remembered here, who died Nov. 25, 1837, aged 52 years. — See Boyden family papers, pp. 37-40.

DR. CHINERY PUFFER.

also who died at Shelburne Falls, Massachusetts, Mar. 6, 1877, aged 73.

Dr. Cyrus Butterfield and Dr. W. R. Woodard were resident physicians here for a time.

Dr. S. N. Bemis was the only resident physician in 1879.

SCHOOL SUPERVISION.

The practice of choosing a committee of several persons to visit the schools, began here in 1828, and the first chosen were Rev. Hosea Beckley, Marshall Miller, Asa Boyden, Josiah Taft, and Jotham Burnett. It continued 6 years, when it came into disrepute, because the towns were not always careful to choose suitable persons. In most towns in the state it was easier to find one competent person for school supervision than to find so many as the law in force required.

The law was changed and in 1846, Rev. William N. Barber was chosen town superintendent; also in 1848.

Rev. B. F. Foster was chosen in 1849 and served 16 years and a few months in 1868, when he resigned on account of ill health and Rev. Augustus Chandler was appointed by the selectmen to fill the vacancy that year.

No superintendent was chosen in 1852 '53, '54.

Joseph Miller, Esq., served one year, being chosen in 1857.

David L. Mansfield was chosen in 1869; continued in service 15 years, and still (1884) holds the office of town superintendent.

THE HAGUE SCHOOL-HOUSE

now stands near the old bridge-place across West river, Districts No. 2 West and No. 7 East, united with No. 6 and a new school-house was built about 1850. The school-house for No. 6 formerly stood near the Reuben Walker place at the foot of the hill near where the roads unite. The first school-house built in the district stood on the rocks in the southeast corner of a pasture near Jonas Walker's farm. north of the road leading to West Dummerston.

FATAL ACCIDENTS.

Henry Stevens, son of Henry and Relief, aged 5 years, was killed by the fall of a fence, July 20, 1796.

Denison, son of Richard and Beda Kilbury, about two years old, drowned June 24, 1810.

W. H. Pierce, age 33 years, was drowned in West river April 11, 1825.

Nathaniel French, born 1789, was killed by the fall of a tree, aged about 60 years.

Ebenezer Randall was so injured, while at work with a team, as to cause his death.

Dorcas Bemis, 7 years old, dau. of Alanson Bemis, was burned to death by her clothes taking fire while standing near a stove one morning in the school-house in Dis. No. 1 East, about 1842.

Mrs. Lydia Walker, wife of Reuben Walker, was killed in 1860. She was riding in a wagon, and by the breaking of the king-bolt, was thrown out, causing instant death; aged 66 years.

Daniel Bemis was instantly killed by the fall of a tree, Jan. 18, 1864, aged 44 years.

Alfred Roel, 14 years old, son of Charles G. Roel, was killed Mar. 20, 1866, by the fall of a tree. He was not hit by the tree, but it fell so near to him, while he was lying on the ground, as to cause his death.

Oscar J. Herrick, aged about 2 years, son of J. T. Herrick, was drowned May 3, 1868. This child was one of a family of ten children, all boys. Nine are now living. They have been the main stay in school Dis. No. 3 west, for several years. Such a family of children reminds us of the good old days of the forefathers when a few families furnished many children for the schools, instead of many families furnishing only a few children, as at the present day.

Mrs. Mary M. Leonard, widow of the late John K. Leonard, Esq., was instantly killed Aug. 19, 1881, by being thrown from a wagon; age 47 years.

James McMullen died Mar. 28, 1861, from his neck being broken by the falling limb of a tree, while chopping in the woods.

BURNING OF ROGER BIRCHARD AND HIS HOUSE.

For many years, Mr. Birchard owned and occupied a store situated about 6 miles north of Brattleboro on the road leading from that place up the Connecticut valley to Dummerston. It was on the main line of travel to Bellows Falls. His store was a large two-story building, painted white, nearly square, with a roof of fore sides, meeting at the ridge. There were several rooms in the store; and the whole building was filled from cellar to garret with all kinds of goods, ancient and modern, old style and new style, that any merchant could conceive of making not only a place for business with but what may be called a curiosity store. In fact many persons called there more to see what Mr. Birchard had in his store more than for purposes of trade.

Here was Mr. Birchard's home. He lived a frugal life. Sometimes he got his meals for a season away from his store; but for many years he boarded himself. He lived a single life, and seldom did more business than what he could manage himself. At times, he may have had some help in his store. When he became old and somewhat infirm, his niece, Miss Mary Birchard, of Fayetteville, would sometimes come over to Dummerston and help her uncle a few days about making out his accounts with customers. She was there only a short time before his death. He was unwilling that she should remain long; but she had so much anxiety about him on account of the dangers to which he was exposed, that she remained in town visiting with friends nearly two weeks.

All were afraid that he would be burned in his store, as all the rooms were much crowded with boxes, barrels and goods, so much so that it was very difficult to get about, even, to get around the little stove which the customers tried to approach that they might warm themselves when the weather was cold. Wood and kindlings were piled high under and around the stove. Customers had called his attention to smoking wood under the stove, but he was not pleased with their meddling with his affairs. A lady customer only a day or two before the store was burned, snatched some wood from under the stove that was all a-blaze. Others had done the same thing.

On Sunday, Feb. 13, 1870, about 2 o'clock in the night, his store was discovered on fire, and the fire had made such progress all efforts to save even Mr. Birchard were unavailing.

A large number of persons soon gathered to fight the flames. Their objective point was the room where he slept, which was just over the one in which the little stove stood surrounded by its inflammable material. Their utmost endeavor was made to secure even his body from the devouring element. Not until the morning dawned, did they succeed in raking the charred remains from the deep bed of burning embers and red hot coals. It was carried into a little shop near by where we saw it that morning. Nothing but a blackened, charred trunk and bare skull remained of the unfortunate man. All his limbs were burned off close to the body.

He was born at Wilmington, Aug. 2, 1797, and at the time of his death was in his 73d year.

He had many peculiarities, but was honest in all his dealings. We have heard him say that he would give a poor man a debt rather than make him pay it when it would oppress him or his family.

The funeral services of Mr. Birchard were held in the Congregational church the following Sunday afternoon. A large number of persons, including many from Putney, Newfane and Brattleboro were in attendance. Rev. J. C. Houghton of Burlington, who was supplying the pulpit a few Sabbaths in this place, preached the funeral sermon. He mentioned the circumstance of his calling to see Mr. Birchard for the first time a few days before his death; that Mr. Birchard received him kindly, opened the way for him to speak of religious matters, and informed him that he read the Bible and worshipped God daily in his chamber. He thanked the minister for his visit, and invited him to call again; "and I should have done so," he remarked, "had I known that his spirit would have been called home in a chariot of fire within six days from that time."

During Mr. Birchard's career as a merchant, his store and goods were burned three times, once at Westminster West, and twice in Dummerston. On each occasion the fire was discovered on Sunday morning. The first store that was burned stood just south of the buildings which he last occupied. Very little property was saved. A large quantity of cheese was destroyed and men now living, who were boys then, and present at the conflagration, remember of getting a good square meal of toasted cheese.

The third store was once a large dwelling-house. After Mr. Birchard bought it, he purchased the old store that stood, up in town, on the old Dr. Moore place, and had it moved down and set up as an ell part on the south side of the main building. Both buildings were filled to their utmost capacity at the time of their destruction.

Of the few goods saved from the fire were 36 1-2 barrels of flour. In United States bonds, $7,000, with some railroad bonds, passed through the flames, but not unharmed. It was a mere accident that they were saved for redemption. A short time before the fire, Mr. Birchard had some railroad bonds which he kept in an old earthen jar covered with tea-lead and secreted in an old brick oven, destroyed by mice. The railroad company promised to give him new bonds in place of the ones destroyed, provided he would get some person to sign a paper with him to the effect that said bonds should never be paid for but once. He asked a near neighbor, Alonzo Dutton, to sign the paper. He refused to do so, knowing that Mr. Birchard was oftentimes quite careless about his affairs and that goods were frequently stolen from his store. At the time of the fire, as soon as Mr. Birchard's body was secured from the flames, Mr. Dutton, remembering about the bonds which the mice destroyed and where they were kept, planned a means of getting to the old brick oven across a bed of burning coals and flaming brands. A quantity of snow was thrown upon the coals, a ladder quickly put across to the oven, some planks laid on for greater safety, and a resolute man walked the burning track, wrenched off the iron-door, shoveled out the old treasure-vault-jar and returned without injury. The large jar had inside two flower-pots, one turned over on to the other, forming a place, within which was a glass candy-jar, wrapped about with matting. Inside the glass jar were the bonds which the fire had burned so that they began to fall in pieces on being exposed to the air. Discovering this, Mr. Dutton quickly wrapped them in cloth. Next day, Austin Birchard requested them to be left at Waite's bank in Brattleboro, and in a few months they were redeemed in Washington.

LIEUT. LEONARD SPAULDING

whose record begins on page 24 was commissioned captain during the Revolutionary war, as we have learned since the printing of his record, and he was not a citizen of the town as stated on p. 26, when it was organized. His old account book dates back to 1766 not 1779.

A HAPPY FACE.—AN EXTRACT.

"A happy face with cheerful look,
An influence round it throws,
That acts upon us as the sun
Does on the blooming rose.

It wakes to life those happy smiles
That coldness ne'er can bring.
And casts a hallowed beauty on
The plainest, simplest thing.

Be prudent in affairs of life,
Be kind to every friend;
So live that you will never fear
The trial of life's end.

Then wear the happy, cheerful face
The influence round it throws,
That acts upon us as the sun
Does on the blooming rose.

THE WILLARD FAMILY.

The earliest settler in Dummerston by the name of Willard, was

from Ashburnham, Massachusetts. In 1785, he lived where Lewis Hadley now lives in the south part of the town, and remained on that farm till he sold it to Benjamin Hadley, father of Lewis. He married about 1785. Sarah Wilder, sister of Solomon Wilder of Brattleboro, father of Marshall, Anson, and Joseph

Marshall now lives on the old homestead where Henry Willard courted Miss Wilder. People in those days often went barefoot as long as the ground was not covered with snow, and Mr. Willard was not an exception to the custom. He used to go courting barefoot, and late in the fall of the year, the neighbors often tracked him home, when he returned late in the night, from such visits, by his foot-prints left on the frosty ground.
When he sold his farm, he bought again in West Dummerston where four generations of the family have lived, the place being now in the possession of Nelson W. Willard.

He was a man of property and bought and sold other farms in town. He kept a large stock of cattle, raised considerable grain, but was careful to keep his granaries locked. A friend once inquired of him why he kept his grain under lock and key. "Your neighbors," said he, "are all honest." "I know it, replied Mr. Willard, "but I want to keep them so."

In our study of New England history, we often find the name Willard associated with the early settlers, especially, that of Col. Josiah Willard as an original proprietor of several townships.
For instance, the names of the proprietors of Westminster, Vt., on the 11th of June 1760, when the time for fulfilling the charter was extended, included twelve Willards, viz: Josiah, William,
Nathan, Oliver, Wilder, William, Jr.,
Prentice, Nathan, Jr., Solomon, Billey, Josiah, Jr., and Jonathan. Eight of these names appear on the charter of July 26, 1753. Nearly all the families of New England by this name, are descended from Major Simon Willard, who emigrated to this country from the county of Kent in England. He is first mentioned as residing at Newton (now Cambridge, Mass.) in 1634, where he became acquainted with the situation of Concord, Mass., by trading with the Indians. He was one of the original purchasers of Concord and removed to that place as early as 1635, and became by his influence and the offices to which he was elected, the chief citizen of the town. In 1654, he received the commission of Major and was commander-in-chief of the forces of Massachusetts in Nimigret and Philip's wars. In 1660, he removed to Lancaster and was at Groton in 1672. He died in Charlestown, Mass., April 24, 1676. He was a brave commander, a wise statesman, and a trustworthy man, retaining the confidence of his fellow citizens undiminished till the close of life.

Major Willard had three wives, 1st,
Mary Sharp, 2d, Elizabeth, sister of President Dunster, of Harvard college, 3d, Mary Dunster, a relative of the second wife. By the first and third marriages, he had 17 children, 9 sons and 8 daughters, most of whom lived to marry and have families.

Henry, the 4th son, born at Concord,
Mass., June 4, 1655; married Mary
Laken of Groton, Mass., July 18, 1674; settled in Lancaster; after the death of his wife in 1688, married, about 1689, Dorcas Cutler, who survived her husband and afterwards became the wife of Benjamin Bellows, of Lancaster, and ancestor of the Bellows family in Walpole, N. H.—by these two wives had children: Henry, Simon, born Oct. 8, 1678, Mary, John, Hezekiah, Joseph,
Samuel, James, Josiah, Jonathan, Sarah, Abigail, Susanna, and Tabitha.

Josiah son of Henry, born about 1693, is known as Col. Josiah Willard, commander of Fort Dummer from 1740 to 1750. He married Hannah Wilder, of Lancaster, where he was born, and was among the first settlers of Lunenburg, founded in 1719. His uncle, the Rev. Samuel Willard, was for a time Vice President of Harvard College. Col. Josiah died Dec. 8, 1750. He bore the character of a faithful and intelligent public officer, and was without reproach in the relations of private and domestic life.

JOSIAH, JR., his son, was born in January 1716, and married Hannah Hubbard of Groton. For several years he was intrusted with the charge of a garrison at Ashuelot (now Keene,) N. H., and in 1749 removed to Winchester in that Province. On the death of his father he was promoted to the station he had held. Notice of this appointment was conveyed by another Josiah Willard, a cousin, who for 39 years was secretary of the Province of Massachusetts by a royal commission. "I heartily join with you and your family," wrote the secretary in his letter, dated Dec. 18, 1750, in your mourning for the death of your father, esteeming it a great public loss." Josiah, Jr., died in Winchester, Nov. 19, 1786, in the 72d year of his age.

Henry Willard of Dummerston was a descendant of the Willards about whom we have written. He had two sons and six daughters, Benjamin, b. 1787, m. Lydia Bennett; Sally, b. 1789, m. Wm. Barnes; Mary, b. 1792, married Isaac Cutler; Margaret, b. 1794, m. John Whipple; Eunice, b. 1794, m. Josiah Goddard; Olive, m. Nathaniel Taft; Nancy, married Davis Rand; Lewis, unmarried.

Mr. Willard was heard to say that most parents married off their daughters, but he married them on, as he furnished a home for some of them much of the time after marriage. His sons-in-law did not particularly please him, and in remarking about it, sometimes he would say that he believed the devil owed him a spite and paid him off in son-in-laws."

The children of Benjamin and Lydia Willard were: Louisa, b. 1807, Emily, Lydia, George, Nelson W., Benjamin F., Henry, Mary A., Harriet V., and Marshall, ten in number.

Peter Willard of this town was a cousin to Benjamin, born 1787. He m. Olive Frost, of Brattleboro, Jan. 11, 1802. Their children were: Jesse, Marinda, Ephraim, Nelson.

JAMES CHASE

was father of Capt. James A. Chase. They removed from Dis. No. 1 to No. 3 on West Hill, and the farm they owned many years is still called the "Jim Chase place." James Chase died May 28, 1844, aged 93. Capt. James died Jan 30, 1871, aged 83. Samuel Chase m. Cloe Dunklee, Apr. 3, 1808. Polly Chase died Sept. 4, 1860, aged 83.

DR. ISAAC BURNETT

was the father of Wilkins and Jotham, and by a 2d wife, Lydia ——— who died Jan. 2, 1847, aged 88, had Mary, b. May 1, 1801, now living; married 1st. Caleb Taft, son of Josiah; 2d, Asa Dutton.

Rodney Miller; Ferris b. 1819, a photographer, in New York, died unmarried, aged about 30 years.

JOSEPH GLEASON

married Sarah Ball: children Deborah, b. Aug. 15, 1786; Patty, 1789; Jacob, 1791, died young; Susanna, 1793; Jacob, 2d, 1796; Mary, Feb. 8, 1799.

One Joseph Gleason, Jr., married Sibyl Stickney, Jan. 12, 1802; Children: Sally, b. 1802; Louis, 1803; Lydia, 1805; Deborah, 1807; Jacob, 1809.

THE MILLER FAMILY OF WEST DUMMERSTON.

This is a distinct family from Isaac Miller, resident in the east part of the town. The progenitor of this family was Samuel, son of Robert Miller one of the first settlers of Londonderry, N. H. His name appears on a tax-list of that town of Nov. 9, 1750. He probably continued his residence in Londonderry and died there. His wife died in New Boston, N. H., with her daughter Mrs. Patterson. Their children were:

Matthew, b. June 15, 1730; m. Mary Morrison, and died in Pomfret, Vt., May 30, 1824, aged 94 years.

James and William, twins, b. 1738; has a distinguished record. He became a lawyer; was Major, of the 4th. United States Infantry, 1808; Lt. Colonel, 5th Infantry, 1810; Brevet Col. 1812; Col., 21st Infantry 1814; Brevet Brigadier-General, 1814. when Congress presented him a gold medal for gallantry on the Canadian frontier; was governor of Arkansas Territory 1819--25; Collector of Salem, Mass., 1825--49; died at Temple, N. H., July 7, 1851. He was father of Commodore James F. Miller, U. S. N. 1803--68.

GENERAL JAMES MILLER

It is stated in the history of Peterborough N. H., that Gen. James Miller was of Scotch-Irish descent. This would make the connection that Robert Miller, born about 1664, was brother to Isaac Miller, b. about 1670, and father of Isaac Miller, Jr., b. 1708, a first settler in Dummerston. Therefore the children of John Miller, b. 1756 were third cousins to Samuel Miller, b. 1772.

GEN. JAMES MILLER immortalized his name, however, in the Battle of Niagara, or Lundy's Lane, in 1814. When, in the course of the battle, it was necessary that a certain British battery should be carried, Gen. Brown, addressing Colonel Miller said, "Colonel, take your regiment, storm that work and take it." "I'll try sir," responded the brave Miller promptly and immediately moved forward to the perilous task. A letter of his written to his wife gives a graphic description of this adventure. It was dated Fort Erie, July 28, 1814, the battle having been fought on the 25th, inst. The letter is published in full in the history of Peterborough. When the order was given him to take the battery, he says :

" I had short of three hundred men with me, I, however, immediately obeyed the order. The enemy had got their artillery posted on a height in a very commanding position, where they could rake our columns in every part of the field, and prevented their advancing. We could see their slow matches and port-fires burning and ready. I did not know what side of the work was most favorable to approach, but happened to hit upon a very favorable place, notwithstanding we advanced upon the mouths of their cannon. It appeared that there was an old rail-fence on the side where we approached, with a small growth of shrubbery by the fence and within less than two rods of the cannon's mouth, undiscovered by the enemy. I then very cautiously ordered my men to rest across the fence, take good aim, fire, and rush, which was done in style. Not one man at the cannon was left to put fire to them. We got into the centre of their park before they had time to oppose us. A British line was formed, and lying in a strong position to protect their artillery. The moment we got to the centre, they opened a most destructive flank fire on us, killed a great many, and attempted to charge with the bayonets. We returned the fire so warmly they were compelled to stand ; we fought hand to hand for some time, so close that the blaze of our guns crossed each other ; but we compelled them to abandon their whole artillery, ammunition-wagons and all, amounting to seven pieces of elegant brass cannon, one of which was a 24 pounder, with eight horses and harness, though some of them were killed. The British made two more attempts to charge us at close quarters, both of which I repulsed before I was reinforced, after which the 1st and 23d Regs. came to my relief. And even after that, the British charged with their whole line there several times, and after getting within half pistol-shot of us were compelled to give way. I took, with my regiment, between thirty and forty prisoners, while taking and defending the artillery. * * *

After Generals Brown, Scott, and others were wounded, we were ordered to return back to our camp, about three miles, and preparations had not been made for taking off the cannon, as it was impossible for me to defend them and make preparations for that too, and they were all left on the ground except one beautiful six-pounder, which was presented to my regiment in testimony of their distinguished gallantry. The officers of this army all say, who saw it, that it was one of the most desperate things they ever saw or heard of. Gen. Brown told me, the moment he saw me, that I had immortalized myself. ' But,' said he, ' my dear fellow, my heart ached for you when I gave you the order, but I knew it was the only thing that would save us.

SAMUEL MILLER

came from Dover in this County, to Dummerston in 1813, and bought the farm owned by James Munn for $2600. He resided there till the time of his death in 1855. The buildings on the farm were all burned by an incendiary Feb. 14, 1877. It is an excellent hill farm, but is located so far back, on West hill that no one has cared to purchase and rebuild.

Mr. Miller had two sons and five daughters. James m. Elvira Whipple, and was the father of Mary Miller, wife of John K. Leonard, Esq., killed instantly Aug. 19, 1881.

DAVID DARLING

one of the first settlers in this section of the town, cleared up the land, which Asa Whitney now owns, and on the place, built and lived in a small house long since gone. He lived to be quite aged, and died suddenly of heart disease about 1820, while out in the forest gathering the honey of wild bees. Old lady Darling, his wife, was known as an excellent cook in those days, and a favorite dish, which she prepared, so as to make it very palatable, was fish and potatoe. "Fish," she said to her guests, "had to swim three times—once in water, once in butter and once in cider. "This was quite evident, as she poured in a large quantity of melted butter while cooking and furnished plenty of cider for the table.

Abigail Darling, m. Jonathan Bump, April 7, 1805.

SKELTON FOSTER

was, probably, a brother of John Foster who lived across the river in Dis. No. 6. John, m. Abigail Sanderson, Jan. 25, 1804, and their children were Joel S., b. Oct. 31, 1805; Samuel W., Maria, and Spencer.

married Hannah Dunklee, Sept. 20, 1801. Their children were Humphrey, born in Brattleboro, married Arozina, dau. of Joseph Hildreth; Linda, born in Dummerston, 1803, Lysia, Pardon, Michajah.

Sidney H. Barrett, son of Humphrey lives on the parental farm.

John, Joseph, Levi, Darling, Jerusha and Lydia were born in Brattleboro. Esther, m. 1801, and David 1805, were born in this town. Mr. Guernsey lived near neighbor to Humphrey Barrett, across the brook south from his residence, in buildings long since gone to decay.

was born in Oxford, Mass. His parents died when he was quite young. Soon after their death, he went to live with Dr. Baker of Guilford, who was an uncle of his. His sister, Zurviah, also went there to live. When he was about 8 years of age, he came to Dummerston and lived during his minority with Samuel Gowen, who owned what is now called the Huntley place. He had no brother, and his only sister, Zurviah, was a resident of this town at the time she married Nahum Norcross, Jan. 17, 1796. Moses married Olly, dau. of Nathaniel French, Nov. 22, 1807. He bought a farm of Nathaniel Mann, formerly owned by Daniel Belknap, and occupied it the same year he was married. They had a family of 10 children: Almira m. COL. A. B. FOSTER.

[BURLINGTON FREE PRESS.]

whose sudden death, at Montreal, has so shocked his numerous friends, was born in Dummerston, in 1817, but removed with his father, the late Dr. Stephen Sewall Foster, to Frostville, 2 miles from Waterloo, P. Q., when he was 4 years old. He was educated in Canada, until twenty, when he joined his uncle, S. F. Belknap, the celebrated railroad contractor, with whom he was extensively engaged in constructing railroads in Massachusetts, Maine, and Vermont. After fifteen successful years he returned from the United States to Canada, and launched into railway enterprises of magnitude. His first contract was on the Grand Trunk from Richmond to Quebec. This was followed by the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly, connecting St. Johns with Waterloo. He next built the South-eastern, from West Farnham to Newport, and made the extension of the Canada Central from Sand Point to Pembroke. He also received the contract from the Canada Central from Nipissing. He was elected in 1858 member for Shefford in the Canada Assembly. After 2 years, he resigned and was returned by acclamation to the Legislative Council for the district of Bedford. On the accomplishment of confederation he was appointed to the Senate of the Dominion, from which he retired 2 years since on receiving a contract for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway. He has lately been actively engaged in making arrangements to complete his contract. Financial troubles overtook him sometime ago, but he was hoping and laboring with energy to relieve himself. He had long been afflicted with heart disease, which is hereditary in his family. Last June, in Saratoga, he suffered severely, and after his incarceration, two weeks ago, in Inasburgh jail, he had another attack. His physicians prescribed rest for him, and counselled him to beware of excitement. The recent trouble which he has had, no doubt, hastened his death. Mr.

Foster had a mania for building roads, and he not only invested all his own money in them, but induced his friends likewise to embark in such speculations. The result of his almost herculean labors has been to serve the Dominion rather than to bring any substantial reward to his own family. His remains were removed to Waterloo for interment.

CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER IV.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH OF WEST DUMMERSTON

According to the minutes of the general convention of Baptist churches in Vermont, this church was organized in 1783. The earliest record of the church, recently found, begins Apr. 12, 1789. On that day the church voted to adopt the new articles of faith and covenant. They had no place for public worship other than to meet at private dwellings. The locality where the meetings were then held, is now school district No. 6, instead of No. 1 West, where the meeting-house now stands. At that time meetings were held mostly at the houses of Samuel Wakefield and Jesse Manley. Elder Joel Butler was invited to assist in one of those meetings, but it is not certain that he had previously been their pastor. John Manly, Jr., and Jesse Manley had been serving the church as deacons, but were released Aug. 9, 1789. At that time the church assessed and collected "sums to support the gospel."

ELDER STONE

had the pastoral care of the church for a short time, but asked a dismission that year. No record for 1790. The church in Jamaica sent a letter Mar. 13, 1791, asking that Isaiah Stone be dismissed to their church. May be this is Elder Stone who resigned in 1789, because his mind was much troubled about the "perplexing necessities" of life. When the record closes for that year, the church was unwilling to accept Elder Stone's resignation.

Jesse Manley was church clerk in 1791 and held the position, Sept. 17, 1794, when the old record closes, which is a book of 75 pages.

Feb. 18, 1792. The church voted that it was the deacons' work to take care of the poor of the church and provide for the communion.

June 4, 1792. Eleven persons were admitted to the church. On the same day it was voted that "our brethren in the south part of Marlboro should be a branch of our church with full power to receive members." John Manley, Jr., was chosen clerk of that branch.

Nine persons were admitted to the church, July 22, 1792, and the same number, Aug. 26, 1792.

It was voted that Brother Wakefield should improve his gift steady for further satisfaction; and it was the opinion of the church that Br. Beriah Willis "has a gift that may be profitable in Zion."

Sept. 13, 1792, the church met at the house of Abel Bugbee in Putney and admitted to the church 13 persons, who were residents of that locality. Jesse Manly was chosen deacon that year. Elder Isaac Kenney, of Richmond, N. H., preached several times during the year, for which he received $10 from individuals.

Dec. 8, 1792. The church voted to act on a request from a society on the west side of West river, which is the first evidence on record that a society existed in that locality. The request was that Br. Samuel Wakefield should be permitted to preach to them. He had recently been urged to improve his gift with a view to preaching: also the church had asked him to serve them as deacon. Br. Wakefield received "liberty to improve his gift where he should judge duty." Micah French, Jr., was chosen deacon.

Aug. 20, 1792. The church voted that Bro. Micah French, Jr., Samuel Manley, James Mann, Enos Phillips, and Luke Taylor should take the lead of singing in public meeting.

BR. RUFUS FREEMAN

was requested to come and see the church. May 3, 1793, he received "a call to take the pastoral care of this church."

Jan. 26, 1793. The church met at Putney West Hill and admitted to the church nine persons. Bro. Stebbens was chosen to take the lead on the Sabbath of the brethren in Putney.

Rufus Freeman and Phebe, his wife were admitted by letter from the church in Fitzwilliam, N. H. He was ordained over the church in West Dummerston, Sept. 4, 1793. The ordination took place at the house of James Manley. The churches invited were Richmond, N. H., Marlboro, Royalston, Mass., Guilford [west part under Elder Jacobs], Fitzwilliam, and Putney.

The place where Jesse Manley lived in 1793, was bought by the church for £58 [$193 1 3] as a home for Elder Freeman. For a time he preached every third Sabbath at Grassy Brook in Putney.

Oct. 20, 1793. The church voted to assist the brethren in Putney to ordain them an elder. Elder Freeman, Jesse Manley, Micah French, Jr., Ezekiel Wilson, Seth Hudson and Samuel Wakefield were sent for that purpose.

Apr. 24, 1794. The brethren at Marlboro sent a letter requesting to be set off, and Elder Freeman, Samuel Wakefield, Micah French, Seth Hudson were sent by the church to aid in the exercises.

Aug. 2, 1794. Dea. Jesse Manley, who was in trouble with the church about a trade with a brother member, was called on and requested "to take his place and travel with the church."

No other record of the early church has been found at the time of this writing.

In 1811, Seth Hudson and Jotham Burnett were a committee to revise the names on the church record. They reported 103 resident members. The whole number recorded at that time was 215. It is not certain when the first meeting-house was built in West Dummerston. The first building occupied by the church was purchased in Guilford, taken down and erected on the site of the church now occupied by the society. When it became unserviceable, it was removed a few rods south from its old foundation and converted into a store and dwelling-house. The post-office is now kept in this store which is owned and occupied by John E. Townsend as merchant and post-master.

THE LATE RECORDS

of the church begin Nov. 29, 1827, when the First and Second Baptist Church were united. A division in the church had existed for a long time; but it does not appear expedient to write up the causes of separation. At the time of the union, Elder Jonathan Huntley was pastor, and Jesse Manley, Luke Taylor, and Oliver Carpenter, Jr., were deacons.

Elder Jerome Packer was pastor, and Oliver Carpenter and Daniel Jones were deacons in 1840. Joel Chandler was church clerk many years. S. W. Wilson held the place a long time, and for the last few years George Everleth has been clerk of the church.

A FAMILY OF SOLDIERS.

Three sons of Jesse J. Mansfield, of Dummerston, were in the army during the late war for the Union. All enlisted for three years. Charles W. Mansfield enlisted in May 1862, and was at that time not quite 16 years of age. He was a member of Company K, 9th Vt. Vols. About the middle of July the regiment was sent to Washington. From that place they marched to Winchester, Va., where they remained till a few days before the battle of Antietam, where they were ordered to march in quick time to Harper's Ferry. Sept. 15th they were made prisoners of war by the enemy immediately paroled, and soon after, marched to Baltimore. From that place they were sent to Camp Douglas, Chicago, where they remained several months. Charles was sick at this place for the first time after leaving Vermont. While on duty with the regiment at Suffolk, Va., in the Fall of 1863, he was again sick. He was considered able to go with his regiment when it left this place for Newbern N. C.; but it proved otherwise, and he was sent to the hospital in Morehead City. Having regained sufficient strength, he received a furlough, came home Dec. 5th, and was in the hospital at Brattleboro, when, with a few other soldiers, he was sent back to his regiment, Apr. 12, 1864. He arrived at Newbern on the 22d, and died Apr. 29, in the 18th year of his age.

Joseph C. and William H. Mansfield joined the army in August, 1862, and both were members of Battery E, 1st Artillery, 11th Vt. Regt. This battery was stationed at Fort Slocum, near Washington, during the memorable battle at Gettysburg. While in this fort, Joseph was sick with typhoid fever, which terminated fatally Oct. 11, 1863. He was in his 25th year and left a wife and one child, who survived her father's death only one year, dying Oct. 30, 1863, age, 3 years.

William was in the army about one year. On account of ill health, he received a discharge from service, and returned to Vermont. When he was again able to labor, he went to Boston, Mass., where he worked as a mechanic nearly two years. During that time he had much sickness, finally gave up business, and came back to Dummerston, where he died of consumption, March 11, 1867, aged 26 years.

Mrs. Hannah Mansfield, the mother of these soldiers, died Feb. 14, 1875, aged 65 years. She was the youngest of a family of 11 children, eight sons and three daughters. Her father, Benjamin Lufkin, was one of the first settlers in the town of Rumford, Me., where she was born in 1809. Her brother Joseph, the eldest of the family, was a minister for nearly 60 years and preached his last sermon only a few Sabbaths before his death, which occurred in 1872 in the 86 year of his age. Two other brothers were also ministers.

W. H. Greenwood

COL. WILLIAM HENRY GREENWOOD.

During the last years of his life, the home of Col. Greenwood was in Dummerston. Here also was the birth-place of his wife, Eva Duncan Knight, dau. of Joel and Fannie (Duncan) Knight. Mrs. Knight was the dau. of Dr. Abel Duncan, second cousin of Judge Jason Duncan. Col. Greenwood purchased in 1873, the farm, which has been the homestead of the Joel Knight family for three generations, but his profession as a civil and mining engineer, called him from home nearly the whole time after the purchase was made. Nevertheless, he counted that it would afford him a place of rest from the hardships of his professional life whenever opportunity should favor; but rest came not as anticipated. The man who seemed to have a charmed life, escaping the bullets of the enemy on many hard-fought battle-fields of the late war for the Union, passing unharmed numerous attacks of Indians which he encountered during his surveys on the plains of the West in 1867-68 and 69, enduring hardships from cold and hunger which few men have ever experienced, was killed by a fatal shot from a gang of robbers and murderers in ambush, and the career of a busy life instantly terminated.

The sad event occurred in Aug. 1880, and in the spring of 1882, his remains were brought from Mexico to their final resting place in the cemetery at Dummerston.

William Greenwood, his great-grandfather, came from Sherborn, Mass., and settled in Dublin, N. H., in 1765. He was a carpenter by trade and was killed at the raising of a barn, June 28, 1782, aged 61. He married Abigail Death of Sherborn, who d. Oct. 1, 1814 aged 91.

Joshua Greenwood, grandfather of the Colonel, married Hannah Twitchell of Dublin, Aug. 22, 1779.

Asa, his father, was born in Dublin, July 1, 1797, married Dec. 31, 1821, Mrs. Lucy Evens, who died in Marlboro, N. H., Feb. 20, 1852. He married 2d, Mary Minot, and removed to Illinois in 1853; returning East in the summer of 1877, to visit friends, he died at the house of his son in Dummerston, July 16, 1877.

Col. Greenwood was born in Dublin, N. H. March, 27, 1832, and married Miss Knight, May 19, 1857. He was the youngest son of the family and spent his early years, for the most part in the public schools of Marlboro, N. H., where his parents removed in 1834. Mathematics were his favorite studies and came easily to him. It was his ambition in youth to become a thorough and accomplished engineer, and that object was fulfilled. He remained in Marlboro until 1850, when he entered Norwich University, (Vt.,) graduating in 1852. From a report of the Twelfth Reunion of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland," we subjoin:

FROM THE VERMONT PHOENIX.

"In 1852, he went to Illinois and engaged in the survey of railroads till the war of the rebellion broke out. He enlisted in the 51st Reg. Ill. Vols., Jan. 17, 1862, and was commissioned afterwards 1st Lieut. Co. H, of that regiment. His commission as captain of the same company is dated May 9, 1863. Soon after the battle of Stone River, Gen. Rosecrans selected Greenwood for a competent engineer to organize a topographical service, and he was directed to report to Gen. Stanley, at that time chief of cavalry for the Army of the Cumberland with whom he remained till the fall of 1865, when the 4th Corps of that division was mustered out in Texas. No officer served in the Army of the Cumberland who was present at and participated in more battles, actions, affairs, skirmishes, than Col. Greenwood. Always strong and well, though slender of form, he was always ready for duty, day and night. The great battles in which he was a most active participant embrace such names as Perryville, Stone River, Hoover's Gap, Chickamunga, Missionary Ridge, three months of Atlanta campaign, an almost continuous fight, including Peach Tree Creek, the assault on Kenesaw; finally, in the last great service of the 4th Corps, the action at Spring Hill, next day the battle of Franklin, and very soon the battle of Nashville, which ended the mission of the Army of the Cumberland, in the destruction of Hood's army. In only, 1864, when Gen. Stanley was appointed to the command of the 4th Corps, Greenwood was commissioned by the President, Lt. Col. and Inspector, to date July 28, 1864. In July, 1865, the 4th Corps landed in Texas, and was posted at Victoria, Lavacca, and San Antonio. Col. Greenwood was put in charge of the Gulf and San Antonio Railroad which had been completely destroyed, by the rebel general, John

Magruder. With the burned and bended railroad iron, and such timber as could be gathered out of the Guadalupe lowlands, he soon had the cars running to Victoria. Having finished his work in Texas, he returned to Vermont and soon afterwards went West, where he was employed upon the Kansas Pacific Railroad. He was appointed chief engineer of this road, and whilst holding this position, he made surveys on the 32d. and 35th parallels, through to San Francisco. During his service for the company, he constructed 150 miles of railroad in 100 working days and the last day laid ten and one-quarter miles in ten hours, a feat, perhaps, never equalled in railroad construction. In 1870, he made the first general report in favor of three feet narrow gauge rail roads, and was appointed general manager of construction of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad. Upon completion of the first division of this road, he was appointed General Superintendent, and remained till the road was finished to Canon City. He next went to Mexico in company with Gen. W. S. Rosecrans and Gen. W. J. Palmer with a view to constructing a national railroad in that country. Whilst engaged in this service, he visited England and the continent, in the interest of his road, but failing to get the concessions asked for from the Mexican government, he returned to New York and established himself as a civil engineer. In May, 1878, he took charge of the construction of the Pueblo and Arkansas Valley Railroad for the Atchison, Topeka and Santo Fe Company; and March, 1879, took charge of the Marion and McPerson Railroad. This is the last public work with which he was connected until he went to Mexico upon his last and fatal engagement. As an engineer, he had few peers in the profession. No obstacle that nature had interposed, as it were, in frolicsome mood, in the canyons and mountains of the West, deterred this engineer of science, of skill, and daring, and railroad trains now run securely, where before the wild mountain sheep feared to climb. The skillful capitalists who built these wonderful railroads of Colorado, well appreciated the worth of Col. Greenwood, and when the Sullivan and Palmer Companies undertook the International and Inter-oceanic railroads from the city of Mexico to the Pacific coast, Greenwood was called, as he had been before, as the most reliable man to locate the work. Whilst so employed, he was murdered near Rio Hondo 18 miles from the city of Mexico, Aug. 29, 1880. He was on his way from Hondo to the city of Mexico, accompanied by Mr. Miller, an assistant engineer, and a servant, where, as was his custom, he expected to spend the Sabbath with his family. When within some 9 miles of the city, he stopped at a wayside inn for the purpose of taking refreshments. Here there were a number of men, who, seeing his horse, laid a plot by which they were to obtain possession of it. They accordingly rode ahead some distance, where they remained ambushed. Col. Greenwood upon arriving at a barranca, or ravine, separated from his companions and proceeded ahead of them at an increased pace, with the object of examining the locality. His companions saw him as he came from the barranca and descended upon the opposite side of the hill. They hastened in a gallop to join him, when, in a short time, they came upon his dead body lying in the road, perforated by two bullets, one through the breast and left hand, another through the right hand. A letter from P. H.

Morgan dated United States Legation, Mexico, Nov. 23, 1880, to Gen. D. S. Stanley, states that when Col. Greenwood approached where the robbers were in ambush, they rushed out upon him, hoping that the frightened horse would throw his rider, and in that way they might obtain possession of him, and, as in this, they failed, they to make sure of the horse murdered Col. Greenwood. His horse, carbine, and revolver were taken, but his watch, papers, and money were untouched. It is believed that the assassins were disturbed and only had time to make off with the articles mentioned. His body was brought to the capital and buried in the American Cemetery Sept. 1, 1880. The unfortunate occurrence created a sensation in the capital and the loss of Col. Greenwood was deeply felt. The funeral procession was attended by the whole of the Americans and Englishmen, Germans and Frenchmen and many of the representative Mexicans. Over 60 coaches formed the funeral cortege, and 150 persons followed in the sad procession. Before Mrs. Greenwood left on her return to this country she was presented with a memorial signed by forty leading Mexicans, residents of the City of Mexico. The memorial closes as follows: 'When you return to your lonely home, tell those who will come to mourn with you that if Mexico, as all the other nations of the earth, unfortunately has her criminals, she has also, honest hearts that repel them, and authorities to prosecute them; tell your friends that if there are vile men in our society, as there are in all human societies, there are also thousands of souls that worship the good and see a brother in every worthy man. And tell them, too, that amongst us not a single tear of the widow or the orphan fails to find a friendly hand extended to wipe it away.'"

DECORATION DAY.

During the years that have passed since the close of the war in 1865, the graves of soldiers in this town have not been visited by any considerable number of persons at one time, except on one occasion, May 30, 1879; yet, we do not feel that the graves of the honored dead are neglected in our cemeteries. Marble tablets have been erected to their memory and flowers are yearly scattered upon the green hillocks raised over their remains by kindred friends and others who cherish their memory. Perhaps some grave, or graves may not receive the floral tribute yearly, but in the absence of cut flowers, the coldness and silence of the graves are relieved by the shades and blooming plants that adorn them. Nineteen soldiers of the late war, who were citizens of Dummerston lie buried in the cemeteries of this town. How long the memory of their names and deeds will last we cannot tell, but the Grand Army of the Republic of which they were a constituent part, made an honorable record which the world cannot forget. These are their names: Fred H. Rice, Daniel G. Ormsbee, Lieut. Paschal S. Laughton, Lieut. Harrison K. Bacon, Loyal Smith, Asahel E. Ellis, Charles L. Dodge, Frank L. Gibbs, William Bemis, Henry D. Everleth, Zenas Butterfield, Waitstill Pettee, Wm. L. G. Whitney, George S. Whitney, Marshal B. Holton, Edward C. Foster, Joseph C. Mansfield, William H. Mansfield and Charles W. Mansfield who died and was buried in Newbern, N. C., but a record of his death is on the gravestone of his brother Wm. H. Mansfield.

CHURCH HISTORY

CHAPTER V.

THE METHODIST CHURCH.

The only church of this denomination was located on West Dummerston hill, about three miles from the valley of West River and one-fourth-mile from Marlboro boundary line. According to the best information obtained, the meeting-house was built about 1812. Mrs. Orrin L. Bennett, a resident in that part of the town, now living, came there in 1820 and the meeting-house was built some years before that time.

The society was small but the attendance at church was very good for many years.

The society near the closing years of its existence found it quite difficult to sustain public worship and keep the house in repair, and therefore it was left a few years unoccupied, and was pulled down in 1866. The timber was sold to Edwin and Fayette Miller.

ELDER WILLIAM HENRY HODGES of Dover, appears to have been the first pastor of the society. He was their minister so early as 1823 and 24. Other ministers, remembered at the present day, are Elders Harris, House, John Prouty, Spencer, and Houghton.

THE UNIVERSALIST CHURCH.

This society had stated preaching as early as 1833, and possibly before that date. A library of moral and religious books had been organized by this society sometime previous, but the time of organization is not stated, though books were drawn in 1833. Preaching for the society was supplied occasionally by different ministers.

The first resident minister was Rev. Freeman Loring. After him came Rev. J. Britton. The non-resident ministers, who preached at stated times, were Rev. Charles Woodhouse, Rev. Aurin Bugbee and Rev. Otis Warren.

After the Union Church was built in 1842, this society settled Rev. Wm. N. Barber, that year, and his pastorate over them continued 5 years. The church was organized with about 25 members, Dec. 25, 1842, and Joel Knight was chosen deacon. That Christmas day was a notable time, it being not only the date of organizing the Universalist church, but the first time that Christmas was publicly observed in this town. After Mr. Barber's removal in 1847, the society languished, and no society of that denomination now exists in town.

THE UNION CHURCH.

The earliest record of this society reads as follows:

"We the subscribers hereby associate ourselves together for the purpose of building a Union Meeting house for religious worship, to be erected on the common near the east Meeting house in Dummerston for all religious denominations, to be used for religious purposes as long as a majority of said association shall direct, and each religious denomination shall have the use of said house in proportion to what interest they may own in said house."

The first meeting of said association shall be holden on the 16th day of March, 1842, and said Association to be known and called the Union Meeting house association."

At the first meeting, Mar. 16, 1842, Amasa Clark was chosen moderator, and Asa Knight, clerk. Roswell Sargeant, Stephen Dutton, Joel Knight and Wm. Bemis were chosen a committee to superintend the building of a meeting house and locate the same. Epa Cone, Stephen Dutton and Roswell Sargeant were chosen to draft a plan of the building. The committee recommended a plan presented by Lewis Holton and Winslow Dutton, who made with the committee a contract to build the meeting-house for $20 for each pew, or slip. Number of pews 38; cost $760. The piazza in front cost $81, additional.

The meeting house was finished according to contract in June and accepted by the committee, July 2, 1842, and the society voted to dedicate the house, July 1st, the same year. No record was made of the dedication on the record book. Samuel Knight made a present of a Bible to the society.

It does not appear on the record at what time Rev. William N. Barber, a Universalist minister from Alstead, N. H., became pastor of the society, but it was probably soon after the house was dedicated. He was pastor as late as 1846, at which time he was superintendent of schools. The annual meeting of the association was Aug. 28, 1846, as shown by the record. Mr. Barber probably removed from town the following year. Since that time the society has had no regular preacher and meetings were not long continued after that date.

In 1858 a meeting was called to see if the society would sell their meeting-house; but no sale of the building was made till 1872, when it was sold and removed to its present site. It was converted into a dwelling-house which is now, 1884, owned and occupied by Thomas N. Reed.

Jesse Hildreth lived near the ferry in 1783, then known as Hildreth's ferry. His parents were Joseph and Lydia Hildreth, page 51, who lived on what is called the Morris Lawton place, half a mile west from the ferry. They were residents of the town before 1772, when Mr. Hildreth was one of the committee to locate the first burial ground and forward the building of the first meeting house. He settled near Putney West Hill, on land since owned by Wm. Wheeler and once the home of Lient. Spaulding. He was born in 1724 and was son of Joseph Hildreth, from Petersham, Mass. He died July 4, 1796, aged 72. Lydia, his wife, died May 26, 1799, aged 68. Their children were Joseph, Anna, D. Stephens, Sally, Ezekiel, Jesse, Wilson, Lucy, Polly. Joseph m. Submit ——— about 1775. BEGINNING OF THE REVOLUTION.

The first meeting to organize resistance to the King's authority, took place on the 29th of October, 1774, when a majority of the inhabitants of Dummerston met near the house of Charles Davenport on the "green." The first shot of the Revolution, "heard around the world," was fired April 19, 1775, at Lexington. The blood of William French and Daniel Houghton was shed at Westminster, Mar. 13, 1775; but organized and effective defiance was not anywhere used previous to the release of Lient. Spaulding who was committed to the common goal Oct. 28, 1774.

BRIEF.

Miranda, dau. of Joseph Duncan, esq., page 93, m. about 1816 Benjamin Hadley.

Simeon, the father of Judge Jason, died Jan. 19, 1781. Bridget, his wife, died Oct. 4, 1807. Samuel, (b. 1747) died in Townshend, Vt.; Patience, his wife, d. Nov. 9, 1825, in Dummerston.

Jason Duncan came to this town soon after his marriage in the fall of 1775. His father was a farmer and he followed the same occupation, learning in addition the cooper's trade. He taught school in Dummerston and was known as a strict disciplinarian. Whether he or Chas. Davenport was the first school teacher in town, page 92, must be decided in favor of Davenport, for the reason that Mr. Davenport was an inhabitant of the town ten years before Mr. Duncan.

He was a Revolutionary soldier and enlisted in 1777 in the war against Great Britain; was with a detachment of the American army at Manchester, Vt.; became lieutenant; was in the campaign against General Burgoyne; was with the army at Bennington till within a few days of the battle when he was sent home on account of sickness.

DELEGATES

TO THE COUNTY CONGRESS,

AND

COMMITTEE OF INSPECTION.

From a paper read before the Vermont Historical Society at Montpelier, Oct. 15, 1878, we obtain the information that Lieut. Leonard Spaulding was representative from this town to the first General Assembly which met at Windsor, Mar. 19, 1778.

The first legislature resulted from the constitution of July, 1777; and the constitution was the result of the general conventions, to which, from 1771 until 1777, the care of the most important interests of the people had been committed.

The first record of delegates from this town was in 1774, Nov. 28, when Solomon Harvey, Ebenezer Haven and Hosea Miller were chosen "to set as delegates in the County Congress at Westminster on the 30th inst." Jan. 3, 1775, Solomon Harvey, Jonathan Knight, William Boyden, Enoch Cook, Leonard Spaulding, Josiah Boyden and Ebenezer Haven were chosen as a committee of inspection or safety to inspect the conduct of the inhabitants agreeable to an order of the Rt. Hon. Continental Congress. Feb. 3, and May 22, 1776, Enoch Cook, Richard Kelly at the former date, Enoch Cook and Thomas Clark at the latter date, were chosen delegates to "set" at Westminster.

John Hooker was chosen delegate, Nov. 28, 1775, also again chosen with Josiah Boyden, Dec. 21, 1775. Dea. Jonathan Cole of Westmoreland, N. H., was chosen Feb. 26, 1776, to meet with the county committee to meet at John Sargent's in Brattleboro, to draw up a remonstrance to send to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, concerning the bloody massacre on the 13th of March last. June 8, 1776, Joseph Hildreth and Leonard Spaulding were chosen delegates to "set" at Westminster, and on Aug. 15, 1776, the same persons were chosen to "set" at Dorset. They were instructed by a committee chosen for that purpose to appear at Dorset, Sept. 25th, 1776, and what course to follow in the convention.

Hon. E. P. Walton says in an address given before the Vt. His. Soc., that on "Mar. 26, 1778, Doct. Thomas Amsden was appointed on a committee with two known members, to copy acts of the legislature for the information of the people. Thomas Amsden rendered an account for that service, dated at Dummerston, which was allowed by the governor to 'Doct. Amsden.' Dummerston was probably entitled to two members in March, 1778, and had but one in Deming's list."

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

TOWN CLERKS.

The settlers' first meeting was March 4, 1771, at which time Enoch Cook was chosen "settlers' clerk." The town was organized May 19, 1772, and he was chosen at that time, "Town clerk" and remained in office till May 18, 1773, when Solomon Harvey was chosen as his successor. He resigned in April 1775, and on May 16th, the same year, Jonathan Knight was chosen in his place, and was clerk till 1780. Jason Duncan, from 1780 to 1804, and from 1807 to 1812, in all 29 years. Samuel Porter, from 1804 to 1807; Joseph Duncan, son of the former town clerk, "Judge Duncan," served from 1812 to 1849, 37 years; Joseph Miller, from 1849, and is still in office, 1879.

POPULATION.

There were 19 heads of families in 1761, and a population of about 75. The number of white males under 16, in 1771, was 54; above 16 and under 60 years, 54; 60 and upwards 3; Females under 16 years, 37; above 16 years, 40; black males, 1; total population in 1771 was 189; heads of families, 44. The population in 1791, was 1501; in 1800, 1692; in 1810, 1704; in 1820, 1658; in 1830, 1592; in 1840, 1263; in 1850, 1645; in 1860, 1022; 1870, 916. The rank in population of the towns in Windham County in 1791, makes this town fifth in number. In 1850, the rank was three. The value of ratable property in 1781 was $2970; in 1791, $4978.

OUR CEMETERIES.

These little landscapes of the dead in Dummerston are six in number, three in the west part and three in the east part of the town. All of them are simply old-fashioned grave-yards.—There is very little about them like what we see in the village cemeteries of large places. They are not so neat and beautiful as many would like to have them, and yet when the visitor calls there, it will be seen that evergreen trees and shrubbery shade the graves of departed generations, that the grass is left to grow green, then to wither and die on these hillocks, that the leaves fall just as autumn scatters them and lie close-folded over the uplifted turf; and he will not fail to notice that a sacredness is present in the still air—present in the sod as his foot gently touches it, that is in holy unison with death and the grave. The whispers of watching angels are these for the seal of God's Acre is not overlaid by the devices of man's hand.

The settlers at their first meeting in 1771, not only chose a committee to select a spot for the meeting-house, but chose "Daniel Kathan, Charles Davenport and Joseph Hildreth to look out a burying place." A spot on the common south of the meeting-house was selected for that purpose.

In 1792, the town voted to "remove the burying-ground, and a new lot was selected on the land of Hosea Miller. Daniel Gates, Seth Hudson and Col. Wm. Boyden were chosen a committee to receive subscriptions for fencing the new lot, superintending the building of the fence and to contract with Hosea Miller for the land. They were not successful in obtaining subscriptions; and the town voted Dec. 10, 1793, to raise the money, $105, "for fencing the new burying ground. The remains of the dead in the old lot were probably moved to the new ground that year.

We are not certain when the other burial-lots were located. The first person, buried in the grave-yard east of the Hollow, was a negro, and said to be buried on the brow of the hill on the east side. At the time the yard was fenced, the wall was laid over the foot of the grave.

The oldest gravestone in that yard is one erected:

"In memory of Sally daughter of Tilotson Miller and Mrs. Hannah his wife, died Sept. 25, 1785, aged 3 years."

In the graveyard near the Centre, the oldest gravestone has the following inscription:

Mary daughter of David and Mary Laughton, died Oct. 10, 1782, aged 8 mos. 6 days. These at the cost of Mrs. Margaret Spaulding.

Mrs. Spaulding was the mother of Mrs. Mary Laughton and grandmother of the child.

The first white marble grave-stone erected in this yard, is that of Mrs. Hannah Knowles who died Mar. 9, 1805, aged 59, "Erected by John Knowles as a tribute of respect to a kind mother. This memorial was erected by her son."

CAPT. EZEKIEL WILSON

Was the ancestor of the Wilson families that settled in Dummerston. He was one of the first settlers on Putney West Hill, but living very near to Dummerston line, was much associated with the affairs in the west part of this town in early times. When the Baptist church was organized in West Dummerston, 1783, he was one of the original members. He was born in Rehoboth, Mass., and settled on Putney West Hill probably about 1780. In early life, he was a sailor on board of whaling vessels, mostly in northern seas. During the Revolutionary war, he enlisted in the expedition to Montreal and Quebec under General Montgomery in December 1775, and suffered extreme hardship from cold and hunger, being at one time without food for three days. He was a volunteer soldier in the battle of Bennington and fought with distinction. He joined in the raid under Eathan Allen against the "Yorkers" in Guilford. His title of captain came from the circumstance of his being chosen commander of a militia company in Putney. Captain Wilson was a man of strong mind and had a good faculty for settling neighborhood troubles without recourse to law. He died in 1830, and must have been 85 or more years of age. His wife was Sarah Turner, of Rehoboth, Mass. They were married

MANSFIELD FAMILY.

Andrew Mansfield, with his wife Elizabeth, dau. of Rev. Wm. Walton, came to America from Exeter, in Devonshire, England, and was in Boston in 1636 and Lynn in 1639. John, probably a brother of Andrew, came in the ship Susan and Ellen from London in 1635, aged 34, and was freeman in 1643. Robert Mansfield, who died in Lynn, Dec. 16, 1666, was, doubtless, the father of Andrew and John. He came to Lynn about a year after his sons settled in that town. Andrew's children, order uncertain, were John, Joseph, Elizabeth, Andrew, Robert, who died young, and Samuel, all born in England. Andrew, son of Andrew, was born in 1630, was town clerk in Lynn several years and a prominent man in town affairs. He married, 1st, Bethiah —; 2d Mrs. Mary Neale, widow of John Neale and daughter of Francis Lawes; 3d, Mrs. Elizabeth Conant. Samuel, son of Andrew, married Mar. 3, 1674, Sarah Barsbaw, and had Andrew, Sarah and Bethiah. Andrew, born in 1630, had by the first marriage, Andrew, Samuel, Hannah, Bethiah, Mary, Lydia, Deborah, Daniel and Rebecca. Daniel was born June 9, 1669; married, 1st, Hannah —; 2d, Mrs. Margaret Burrill; had children Samuel, Dan-

He was killed, Aug. 28, 1730, by a stone falling on him in a well. He had children, Andrew and Daniel. Daniel was born Nov. 24, 1717, married, 1st, Lydia Newhall, who died May 18, 1776; 2d, Ruth ——. He was a farmer and a deacon of Lynnfield church, and died in Lynnfield, Apr. 2, 1797. He had children, Lydia, b. Sept. 16, 1739, m. Allen Breed and resided in New Ipswich, N. H.; Daniel, b. THE HISTORIAN'S BIOGRAPHY.

For which ourselves and others asked.
—Ed.

D. L. Mansfield, was born in Salisbury, N. H., Sept. 17, 1837, and is the eldest and only one living of six children, sons of Jesse J. and Hannah (Lufkin) Mansfield, viz: David L., Joseph C., William H., Charles W. 2d, and Hollis C. Three were soldiers in the late war for the Union. The youngest died of fever at the age of 20. His mother died Feb. 14, 1875, aged 65. His father is still living and receives a pension from the U. S. government.

His grand-parents were Aaron and Betsey (Jaquith) Mansfield, married, in Alstead, N. H., in 1805, and whose children were: Aaron, Jesse J., Hollis, Emery, Keziah B., and Lewis H.

The great-grand-parents were: Deacon Ezra and Rebecca (Kenney) Mansfield, married in New Ipswich, N. H., Feb. 21, 1769, whose children were: Ezra, jr., Rebecca, Azuba, Aaron, Elijah, Barach and Asa.

Deacon Ezra Mansfield was a resident of Lynn, Mass., in 1766, where two of his brothers, Daniel and William, and a sister Lydia, were married. He died in Alstead, N. H., Feb. 5, 1838, aged 92 years.

The subject of this sketch had few advantages for schooling until after fourteen years of age. Beginning in 1852, he worked on a farm during the greater portion of each year and attended school for three winters in the village of Walpole, N. H., where he had the advantages of a high school. Six terms of school under the instruction of Prof. L. F. Ward at Westminster, two at Papermill Village, N. H., and one at Power's Institute, Bernardston, Mass., concluded his academical course of study. Money enough was saved from his wages to meet all the expenses of his education and also pay a considerable sum to his parents for time purchased before he was of age. The misfortune of ill health, caused by rheumatism, changed his course of life at the age of 22 years. Instead of being a farmer, as anticipated, he engaged in school teaching, which, thus far in life, has been his principal occupation.

In 1861 he became a resident of Dummerston. March 11, 1873, he married Clarissa Amy, dau. of Benjamin and Clarissa (Farr) Estabrook. Beginning in 1857, he taught district schools four successive winters in Walpole, N. H., where he was a resident from 1852 till he removed to Dummerston. Since that time he has been connected with the schools of this town, 21 years as teacher, and 15 years as town superintendent.

DUTTON.

John¹ Dutton came to this country from England, probably, with Governor Winthrop, in 1630. Thomas² son of John¹ was born in England, in 1621; came to America with his father. Thomas³, son of Thomas², born Sept. 14, 1648, was a resident of Billerica, Mass., where John⁴, son of Thomas³, was probably born about 1670. Samuel⁵, son of John⁴, b. about 1691, married about 1713, Hannah Hill. Samuel⁶ (Samuel⁵), born about 1718, married Aug. 19, 1740. Martha Lane. Samuel⁷ (Samuel⁶), born July 11, 1743, married about 1768, Rebecca French, sister of Wm. French, killed in the Westminster massacre, March 13, 1775. See page 41.

Capt. Timothy Lull came to Dummerston in 1763 from Ipswich, Mass. His wife died and was buried in this town. He afterwards removed to Hartland, Vt.

SAMUEL WISWELL.

The census of Dummerston, taken Apr. 17, 1771, contains the name of Samuel Wiswell, page 37, and no trace of him could be found up to 1884, when the history of this town was first published. Since then we learned that he removed to Townshend, Vt. He was known as Ensign Samuel Wiswell, and his sister Mary married Lieut. Asa Austin. They made the first settlement on a farm in Townshend, now owned by Riley H. Austin and A. A. Nason.

The practice began in the spring of 1807. Among the prominent families warned out of town in the course of a few years, were Rutherford Hayes, father of Ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes, Oct. 14, 1811; Sardis Birchard, Aug. 31, 1815; Austin Birchard, Aug. 9, 1817, both men rich uncles of the Ex-President; also John Noyes who married Polly Hayes, a sister of Rutherford Hayes, was warned out, Aug. 9, 1817.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS NORTH FROM THE COMMON IN LOTS NOS. 65 AND 84.

Lieut. Daniel Gates purchased lot No. 65, Dec. 26, 1774, for \$77. At that time he was 23 years of age. How soon he made a clearing and built a house is not known. He was in the Revolutionary war and was an officer under Gen. Horatio Gates at the battle of Saratoga in 1777, when Gen. Burgoyne surrendered his army of 8000 British soldiers to the victorious American general. Lieut. Gates built at first a one-story house on his new land and encouraged others to build near his residence by selling them house lots on his farm. May 19, 1788, he sold Silas Fairchild, joiner and cabinet maker, $\frac{3}{4}$ acre of land for \$24, on which he built a house that is now, with several acres of adjoining land, the property of Rev. M. H. Wells. Fairchild built a house costing \$113, and sold his place Dec. 6, 1789 to Capt. John Metcalf for \$137. The captain probably fitted up the house for his approaching marriage. Mar. 9, 1791, he married Sally Taylor of Hinsdale, N. H. He bought of Dea. Simeon Colby a store standing on the north side of the common and in the southwest corner of land now belonging to the Benjamin Estabrook place. Dec. 19, 1791, he sold his homestead and store to Col. Wm. Moore of Greenfield, Mass., for \$567. He probably disposed of his real estate on account of ill health, as his death occurred in about two months from the time of the sale. A large slate stone marks the place of his burial in the cemetery east of the common. A portion of the stone has been broken into fragments, but the following epitaph on the tombstone has been made out after careful study:

Memento Mori.

Sacred to the Memory of Mr. John Metcalf, Capt. of a Company of light horsemen, in the Militia of this State; whom he served with Reputation; and who honored his Remains by burying them under Arms.

Death, the King of Terrors,
After a long Conflict,
Dismounted and triumphed over
This brave Captain of Dragoons:
Who, in the 29th Year of his age,
Much lamented by his friends,
Fell a victim to this last enemy,
Feb. 13, 1792.

Col. Moore sold the homestead, which he bought of Capt. Metcalf to Samuel Porter, Esq., April 5, 1797. In June, 1791, Mr. Gates sold $\frac{1}{2}$ acre of land just south of his house to Cotton Skinner, a shoemaker, for \$27, on which he erected a small house, and on Nov. 12, 1792, sold out to Nathan Cook for \$200. Mr. Cook was a son of Enoch Cook, sen., and married Levina Parmeter of Newfane. He sold to Seth Kellogg, a cabinet maker, from South Hadley, Mass., of whom Samuel Porter purchased the place. The building at one time was used for a store by Mr. Gates a few years before his death in 1807. Nathan Cook lived before 1792 in a house near the top of Prospect hill west of Gates' farm in lot No. 83. It was sold by him to Jonathan Barrus, a bricklayer, who sold it, with 25 acres of land, to Ebenezer Wait in 1796, who sold it to Enoch Cook, from whom Porter bought it in 1798 for \$400. At that time a house and barn, a good orchard and well were on the place. The apple orchard, which is a century old, still bears considerable fruit. Mr. Wait was a blacksmith from South Hadley, Mass., and bought five acres of land in 1784 on which he built a shop, the site of which is near a butternut tree just north of the gate on the road leading up to Clark Bacon's house. He bought a house which stood opposite the shop, of Mrs. Sarah Cutler, wife of Seth Cutler. Wait also owned a piece of land south of his dwelling, which once belonged to the minister lot.

He sold the whole of his real estate in 1800 to Stephen Woodbury, who in a few days sold it to Ebenezer Haven for $1000, and shortly transferred by Haven to Porter. These several purchases made by Judge Porter secured to him a farm in one of the pleasantest localities in Dummerston. On this farm he built one of the largest residences in town. Mr. Wait died in 1801, and his widow, Cloe Wait, married Thomas Turner, Aug. 26, 1802.

Lient. Gates built some years before his death a two-story addition to his house. He died very suddenly in 1807 while absent from home. His estate was sold to John Laughton in 1810. He was the grandfather of Augustine Laughton and was sometimes called "Dea." John to distinguish him from John Laughton, the father of Capt. Asa, then living in town. John the father of Asa, was a good mathematician. His name appears on the records as a county surveyor of lands and roads. After 1812 his surname was spelled Lawton. He died in 1817. "Dea." John lived on the Gates farm 43 years.

John Miller, brother of Marshall, both of whom were Revolutionary soldiers, bought one-half of lot No. 84 west of No. 65, in 1782, and Daniel Gates purchased the other half the same year. The northern half was settled by Miller, on which he built a house where the Miller family resided about 100 years.

PUTNEY.

That has its little history to be told,
Upon these pages, choicely here enrolled
By one, its Pastor forty years, we're told.

PUTNEY.

BOUNDARIES EXTENT AND NATURAL HISTORY.

This town is bounded north by Westminster, east by Connecticut River, separating it from Westmoreland; south by Dummerston, and west by Brookline. It is 12 miles south of Bellows Falls, and 10 north of Brattleboro. The Vermont Valley Rail Road passes through the eastern border, there being two stations, one called Putney, the other, East Putney.

It extends on the Connecticut River from north to south about 5 miles, and from the eastern to the western boundary between 6 and 7 miles, and contains, as reported by Asa Washburn, Esq., Vt. State's Assessor in 1814 15,791 acres and 70 rods. In variety and beauty of scenery, it is surpassed by few country places. In the easterly part of the town is the so called from its earliest history, formed by a large bend in the river. The meadow comprises not far from 500 acres. The soil is rich, easy of cultivation, and yields abundant crops of grass, corn, and other kinds of grain. The Great Meadow is seen to good advantage in passing through Westmoreland on the Cheshire Rail Road; and in midsummer, the prospect from that point is most enchanting. It is said, that the Hon. Edward Everett, once passing over that road, was so delighted with the prospect that he could not suppress his emotions. He broke forth in a strain of eloquence to the great admiration of his fellow passengers.

Back from the river, the town is agreeably diversified with swells of land and intervals, susceptible of high cultivation and very productive.

SACKETT'S BROOK

presents a distinguishing feature in the physical aspect of the town. This is a never-failing stream flowing from the west part of Westminster, receiving in its passage many tributary streams, and emptying into the Connecticut about a mile east of the village. This brook runs through a large meadow, at the lower end of which is The Village of Putney. The meadow is enriched by its frequent overflowings, and from year to year yields abundant crops of grass.

The Street (so called) passes from the village in a northerly direction, west of the meadow, for the distance of two miles and is lined with comfortable residences the whole distance. The traveler going north is delighted with the abundant verdure of the meadow and with Bare Hill crowned with pines and other evergreens, on the right; and he is no less pleased with the majestic swells of land and flourishing and productive fields, on the left.

Leaving the street, and taking a westerly course on what was formerly called the "County Road," leading to Newfane and Townshend, the traveler passes over West Hill, easy of ascent, presenting a varied aspect of beauty and fertility. The writer has ever considered the soil in this part of the town of a superior quality, and the advantages to the agriculturist of the first order. Yet for some reason, there has for forty years past, been a gradual decrease in the number of inhabitants; and many of the farms have been appropriated to grazing purposes. Cattle and sheep now occupy those fields which were once cultivated by the hand of man.

But the physical aspect at West Hill, and the magnificent prospect there presented still remain. As the traveler passes on to the summit, he is struck with wonder and delight. Beckley in his history of Vermont thus graphically describes the scene:

BECKLEY'S DESCRIPTION.

"The view from this eminence is rich and majestic. Few places are more enchanting. As you face the south, you have on your right the narrow and deep valley of West River; and on your left the somewhat broader one of the Connecticut, some two thousand feet below you. Then the whole compass of the horizon to a great extent opens to your view, excepting a few degrees on the north being intercepted by a clump of trees. A large portion of the south west of New Hampshire, the northwestern of Massachusetts, and the southern section of Vermont is before you. From the Connecticut valley, your eye goes over hill and dale, clearings and wood lands, villages, hamlets and cottages, till it reaches the summit of the Monadnock, and thence north on the blue highlands towards the White Hills. The silvery surface of the Connecticut below Brattleboro, distant 10 or 15 miles, and the irregular and broken ridges of Southern Vermont and Franklin County in Massachusetts, come in sight; and the summit of the Green Mountains far to the north with their endless variety of shapes, with the Haystack, and Saddle-back, and Stratton cliffs, limits your view on the right, but fixes your attention in silent admiration.

The original growth of forest trees, consisted of beech, birch, oak, maple, butternut and elm. The Great Meadow abounded with yellow pine; while the higher flats or plains were covered with white pines of majestic growth. In the valley through which Sackett's brook flows was one of the noblest groves of pines anywhere to be found. They lifted their heads to a vast height, the boughs closing over the traveler, rendering it dark, even at mid-day.

THE ROCK FORMATIONS

on the east side of Sackett's brook, are mostly mica slate, abounding with garnets and staurolite. Through the centre of the town run the extensive strata of argillite or roof slate. West of this range comes the mica slate again, interspersed with a hard, black lime-stone. In the east part of the town is found a very rare mineral, known by the name of fluete of lime, or fluor-spar, of a beautiful, emerald green. Specimens of this have been sent to the most distinguished mineralogists in this country and in Europe.

CIVIL HISTORY.

This town was early inhabited by the aborigines of our country, as appears from the discovery of arrows, spears, hoes, and broken pots. In several places on the intervals, when the settlements of the whites began, they found heaps of stones, evidently brought by hand from the high lands, bearing the marks of fire, and supposed to have constituted the fire-places of the Indian wigwams. But, what were the names or the number of the natives who occupied these grounds, or whether they had a permanent, or only an occasional residence, is not known. Previous to the

FIRST FRENCH WAR.

or the Cape Breton War, 1744, a settlement by whites was commenced on the Great Meadows, and a fort was built near the centre, called Fort Hill. The first attack made on the Fort by the Indians was on July 5, 1745. The sad fate of one of these settlers is worthy to be recorded; it is that of

WILLIAM PHIPPS.

He was captured by the Indians, while hoeing corn, near the south west corner of the meadow; was carried into the woods, and left in the care of one of the Indians, while the other was absent. Phipps watched his opportunity, and with characteristic intrepidity, with his hoe struck down the Indian in whose keeping he was; and seizing the gun of his fallen enemy, he gave the other who was returning, a fatal shot. He then attempted to seek refuge in the fort; but before reaching it, he was met by three other Indians who took his life. In the October following, the enemy again appeared at the Great Meadow and made an attack upon the garrison. An effectual resistance was made, one Indian killed, and the fort remained uninjured.

NICHEMIAH HOWE.

cutting wood one fourth of a mile from the fort, was captured. At this juncture, two men David Rugg and Robert Baker, were descending the river in a canoe; when perceived by the Indians, they were fired upon; Rugg was killed, while Baker gained the opposite shore and escaped. Howe was carried to Canada, where he died. During this war, which began in 1744, and ended with the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, in Oct. 1747, the settlement was broken up, the fort destroyed and the people fled to places of greater safety.

THE FIRST SETTLERS.

In February 1755, a family by the name of Averill removed from Westminster to the Great Meadow. This family originally came from Shirley, Mass. to Charlestown, N. H., or No. 4, as it was then called. This was in 1744. The Cape Breton war coming on they fled to Northfield, Mass. After the close of the war, in 1751, they removed to Westminster, and from Westminster they came to Putney, as above stated. Here, they found Philip Alexander and John Perry with their families; also Michael Gilson, unmarried, with his mother and two sisters. These were from Massachusetts and were the first permanent settlers in town, and were the only white persons known within its limits.

Early in 1755, hostilities again commenced, and for their safety, the few inhabitants built another fort, in the south east part of the Meadow. In this enterprize they were joined by a considerable number from Westmoreland; among whom was Mr. Aldrich, the father of General Aldrich, Daniel Howe, Thomas Chamberlain, Joshua Warner, Daniel Warner, Harradon

Wheeler, and Samuel Milott. At the close of the war, they all returned to Westmoreland, except Samuel Minott, who became a permanent citizen. Dr. Joseph Lord and William Willard joined the garrison during the French war.

The fort was of an oblong form, 120 feet in length, by 80 in width, and 17 feet high. It was constructed of hewn pine timber 6 inches thick. Some 16 houses were built within this fort; the back walls of the houses being formed by the wall of the fort, each with a single roof slanting up to the top of the wall. The houses fronted the hollow square in the centre. A great gate opened towards the east, and a small one towards the south. Here was a garrison of 12 men during the summer. A guard was kept while the men were at work, and they usually carried their arms into the field with them. No open attack was made upon the fort; though the Indians occasionally came shouting around it, rendering the night hideous.

The Meadow was now mostly in a rude state, being covered with yellow pine; with here and there a white pine and white oak, stretching their lofty boughs towards the heavens. Col. Willard, who owned the land, it is said, gave the use of it as a consideration for building the fort and defending it during the war.

LIEUT. JOSHUA HYDE.

In the summer of 1762, Lieut Joshua Hyde made a purchase of a large tract of land in the east part of the town, and in the same year, he removed his family to a house near the river, about 50 rods south of the old Westmoreland bridge. Previous to this, there were but two families in town, except those in the Great Meadow, viz: the family of John Perry and that of Philip Alexander. Their residences were about a mile south of the Meadow. Both had been inhabitants of the fort. There were now no mills and the people were subjected to the inconvenience of carrying their grain for grinding to Northfield, Mass and Chesterfield, N. H.

In 1764, Benjamin Hutchins and Samuel Skinner settled in the east part of the town near the great bridge. The same year came from Canterbury, Ct., and purchased a farm on Sackett's brook, at the north end of the street. During the year, he was engaged in making preparations to remove his family, and was the first man who drove a team through the street. In the Spring of 1765, he commenced keeping house in the place where he afterwards died. By this time, Henry Walton, James Cummings, and Moses Johnson had taken up residences on the street. In the year 1768, of Rehoboth, Mass., removed his family to town. His residence was near that of Joshua Parker. There was now, in addition to those already named, on the street, the families of William Wyman, and Charles Kathan. West of the street were the families of John Butler, Andrew Graham, Michael Law, and Dennis Lochlin. East of the mouth of Sackett's Brook were the families of Jonas Moore, Leonard Spaulding, Fairbank Moore, and Samuel Allen. By this time, mills were erected, roads to some extent constructed, and conveniences for living multiplied; the diversity of scenery and soil was inviting, and the population rapidly increased.

HON. NOAH SABIN

THE FIRST CHARTER of the town was from the State of New Hampshire, and bears date, Dec. 26, 1753. It was given to Josiah Willard and others, whose names are not known. After New York claimed the territory, a charter was obtained from that state bearing date, Nov. 6, 1766.

Grantees under the Charter from New York are the following: Josiah Willard Joshua Hide. Daniel Hubbard, Josiah Willard, Junior, Lois Butler, Thomas Frink, Jeremiah Hall, Joseph Hammond, Thomas Hill, Eunice Willard, Elijah Alexander, Sampson Willard, John Ellis, Henry Foster, Thomas Lee, Micah Lawrence, John Gould, James Scott, and Nehemiah Houghton.

The town was organized, and the first town officers chosen, May 8, 1770.

The record of this date is as follows:

"At a meeting of the Frecholders and Other Inhabitants of the Town of Putney on the second Tuesday of May, According to Charter, Capt. William Perce was Chosen Moderator for said Meeting, and the following persons was chosen to serve the Town in their respective Offices for the Ensuing year. [viz.] Supervisor, Noah Sabin; Town Clark, Noah Sabin; Assessors, Capt. Abijah Moor and Samuel Minott; Treasurer, Sept. Joshua Hide; Surveyors of the Highways, Benjamin Wilson and John Warner; Overseers of the Poor, Joshua Parker and Samuel Minott; Colector, James Cumings; Constables, Amos Haile, Jonathan Houghton, and John Perry—and the said meeting was adjourned to the Second Tuesday of July at the house of Ensign Comings in said Putney at One of the Clock on said day."

By subsequent records, it seems that other necessary officers of the town were chosen from time to time, such as selectmen, listers, grand and petit jurors, leather sealers, titthing-men, hayward, branders of horses, sealers of horses, sealers of weights and measures, pound-keepers, fence viewers. These officers all had their appropriate duties to perform, at once suggested to the minds of those in advanced years, however strangely the names of some of them may sound in the ears of the young.

At a regular town meeting held Mar. 15, 1784, it was voted to.

"Choose a committee of seven to divide the town into districts for the benefit of schooling."

At another meeting it was voted to "except of the report of the committee for dividing the town into school districts." It was also voted to "Choose one or more meet persons in each school districts as trustees of school affairs as the law directs." Accordingly twelve "meet persons," whose names are given, were chosen for the above purpose; from which it may be inferred, that the town was originally divided into 12 school districts.

A change, however, was afterwards made. Originally, a part of what is now Brookline belonged to Putney, embracing the somewhat abrupt descent on the west side of the Hill, as far as "Grassy brook. The vote of the town, passed Oct. 6, 1794, in reference to the excision was as follows:

"Voted to set off the westerly part of this town to join the south part of Athens, or some other town, as the General Assembly of this State may think fit: the bounds of said west part be as follows: (viz) 'Beginning on Westminster line at the north east corner of lot No. 1, in the 13th range, and running southerly to the south west corner of lot No. 8, in the 14th range; from thence to the north west corner of Samuel Bennet, Jr's. lot; then on the west line of said Bennet's lot, and the west line of Capt. Ezekiel Wilson's lot to Dummerston line.

According to the charter from New York, 19360 acres of land were originally comprised within the limits of Putney. By this action, some 3569 acres were cut off; leaving 15791, as reported by assessor Washburn in 1814.

In consequence of this action, a new arrangement in regard to school districts became necessary. At a meeting called Oct. 15, 1795, to act on the subject, a committee previously appointed made report that the town be divided into 8 school districts; which report was adopted, and the dividing lines were particularly described. Other changes were afterwards made, and the number of school districts at the present time is 10.

From the organization of the town in 1770, the population continued to increase by immigration and otherwise, so that, according to Thompson, in 1791, the number of inhabitants was 1848. Subsequently, the population began to decrease, and in 1860, it was only 1163. Emigration has had its influence. But other causes have had their effects. Once it was common to find large families, consisting, in many cases, of eight, ten, twelve, and more children. There are those now living who distinctly remember three families dwelling near each other in which were 42 children; in one there were 13, in another, 14, and in another, 15. Now, as we pass from house to house, we find one, two, three, and sometimes more children; but quite commonly none at all. And in school districts, where once there were 40 or 50 scholars, we now find but 15 or 20. And in two localities, where formerly there were schools of a respectable number of scholars, no schools are now supported. These changes are common to our rural towns, and they afford matter for reflection to thinking minds.

The early inhabitants were social in their habits, kind and genial in their intercourse with each other and sympathetic in seasons of sickness and bereavement. A record is now in existence showing the action of the town 70 years ago in reference to the conducting of funerals, which is highly creditable to their moral sense and Christian sympathy.

THE OLD LIBRARY.

They were a reading people. A large social library was for many years in existence, consisting of the standing authors of that period; and although the advantages for an early education were limited, yet the people generally were well informed. The writer was intimately acquainted with one far advanced in life, 50 years ago who, in her youth, had enjoyed but three weeks' schooling; yet, in point of general intelligence, it would be difficult to find her superior. With civil and ecclesiastical history, the biographies of distinguished individuals, and religious treatises then extant, she was familiar, and her conversation on these subjects could not fail of being edifying to any one.

In general, those who succeeded the early inhabitants have been intelligent, moral, and industrious. As a consequence, the common comforts of life have not been wanting. The vices that have existed are such as may be found elsewhere; and there has always been a conservative influence operating which has held in check those disposed to do wrong. Outbreaking crimes have been very few.

BUSINESS.

AGRICULTURAL PURSUITS

have engaged attention generally, and in these the people have been successful. Few towns afford greater facilities for the farmer. The soil is rich and productive. The "Great Meadow" has ever been proverbial for its heavy crops of grain. The farms back from the river are excellent for grazing purposes, and the herds of cattle and sheep have yielded profitable returns to their owners. The reports of the annual County and State fairs have borne testimony to the superior quality of the horses, cattle and sheep which the town has produced.

For a number of years past A. M. Winslow and sons have been extensively engaged in the raising and sale of the short horn Durhams. As a specimen of the size and weight of these animals, may be named, less than two years old, weighing 1600 pounds. These cattle are sold in various parts of New England at very high prices.

“ THE DUKE OF PUTNEY ”

Considerable attention is also paid to manufacturing and mechanical operations. On Sackett's brook which, in the distance of 80 rods, falls 180 feet, is a woolen-mill, owned by the

PUTNEY WOOLEN COMPANY,

George S. Coffin, Agent, doing a very considerable business in the manufacture of mixed flannels. The factory is 80 feet long by 32 wide, and 4 stories high. Adjoining this is a weaving-room 100 feet long, by 25 feet wide. A very commodious boarding-house belongs to the company.

[Since the foregoing account of the Woolen Mill was written the whole establishment has been sold. The large building is taken down and the materials removed. The boarding-house is owned by Mr. Lewis, and is fitted up in beautiful style for the accommodation of boarders for a longer or shorter period.]

PAPER MILL.

Next is a paper mill owned by John Robertson, in which $7000 is invested aside from the real estate. Stock from 150 to 200 tons is annually worked up, yielding from $30,000 to $40,000 worth of paper. Another paper-mill is owned by William Robertson, doing a business of some $29,000, annually.

There are also, a saw and grist-mill, a furniture-shop, a chair-shop, a blacksmith-shop, and a harness-shop, and Clark Roberts is largely engaged in the business of carriage-making. Messrs. George L. Pierce and Herbert L. Wheat are the two Merchants. Mr. Wheat is Postmaster.

THE VILLAGE OF PUTNEY is pleasantly situated in the valley of Sackett's brook, containing within its limits, besides the buildings already referred to, 75 dwelling-houses, two churches, 1 hotel, 2 school-houses, a beautifully constructed Masonic hall, and a very commodious Town House. The latter was built in the summer of 1871, at an expense of some $11,000.

It contains a spacious Town Hall, a large room for a High School, and four smaller rooms, for various useful purposes.

Since the opening of the Vermont Rail Road, a Post Office has been established in East Putney, named by the Post Office Department,

CORNTON :

A lively business is here carried on, in the lumber trade and the manufacture of horse-rakes, by Franklin L. Pierce and Warren Parker.

In addition to the residences previously standing, several new ones of taste and beauty have recently been erected, rendering this section of the town inviting.

EDUCATION.

The primary schools have compared favorably with the same order of schools in other towns. Well qualified teachers have generally been employed; and it could be said of nearly all our youth, that they possessed a good common education. Besides the schools just named, "select schools" were for many years sustained, in which the higher English branches, and the languages preparatory to admission to college, were taught. Instructors of superior qualifications were employed, and many youth were enabled to make those attainments in useful knowledge, by which they were prepared for the stations in life which they were called to fill. Others have been sent abroad to enjoy advantages still greater than any that could be found at home.

LAWYERS.

John Griffin, Phineas White, (see Biographical Sketch).

ASA KEYES.

born in Putney May 30, 1787, graduated at Dartmouth college in 1810, after teaching 2 years in Chesterfield, N. H., studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1814. He immediately commenced practice in Putney and continued it till 1833. Since which he has resided in Brattleboro, pursuing his profession to the present time, (1869.) He has held the office of judge of probate and justice of the peace; has been a member of the house of Representatives for 3 years, a member of the Senate 2 years, and a Trustee of the Vermont Asylum for the Insane for about 20 years.

[Judge Keyes has since deceased. See History of Brattleboro, this volume for a biographical sketch. Ed.]

commenced the practice of law in Putney, where he remained a few years, and then removed to Ohio.

JOSHUA LEAVITT

after a short practice of the legal profession, entered the ministry. For many years past, he has been connected with the religious press in the city of New York.

JOHN KIMBALL

was a native of Haverhill, N. H.; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1822, and studied law with the Hon. Moses P. Payson of Bath, N. H.

In 1828, he commenced his profession in Claremont, N. H., where he resided 10 years and was twice elected to the legislature. Sept. 2, 1834, he married Frances Mary, daughter of the Hon. Phineas White of Putney, to which place he removed in 1839, and continued the practice of his profession. He served 3 years in the office of States Attorney, and has been a member of the Senate and of the house of Representatives 6 years. For the past 6 or 8 years he has turned his attention principally to farming.

The preceding statements having been made by Mr. Kimball himself, it is due to him that some additional remarks be made. For more than sixty years the writer has enjoyed his acquaintance, and during this whole period it may be truly said he sustained an irreproachable character. In college, though not a professor of religion, he strictly observed the rules of the Institution; and in point of scholarship, he was among the first in his class. While in the practice of law at Claremont, he made a profession of religion, and soon after his removal to Putney in 1839, he united with the Congregational church in this place, and during the more than forty years of his residence here, his life was beautifully adorned by the Christian graces. His social qualities were of a high order, and his agreeable and instructive interviews endeared him to all classes, both old and young. His place in the house of God was seldom vacant on the Sabbath, and he was usually present at the meetings during the week. He always manifested a deep interest in the cause of religion, and its prosperity was an object of his efforts and his prayers. The sufferings of his last sickness were borne with sweet submission, and his hope of final acceptance was in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ. He died Feb. 25, 1884, aged 87 years and nearly 5 months, leaving an afflicted widow, and only son, and a large circle of other friends to mourn their loss.

MILITARY,

MILITIA COMPANIES.

In early days, considerable attention was paid to Military affairs. There was a large company of militia in the West part; and another in the East part of the Town. Besides these, there was a company of light infantry and one of cavalry or troops, as they were then called. These companies frequently met for the purpose of drilling; the annual meeting was the first Tuesday of June. These occasions drew together a large number of persons of all ages, and they were seasons of hilarity and mirth. The system was at length broken up by legislative enactment.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

In our Revolutionary struggle, Putney bore an honorable part. Twenty-four of her sons were in the war, viz : Daniel Adams, Samuel Bennett, *Daniel Brown, Seth Carey, Abram Houghton, David Foster, Caleb Houghton, Elijah Houghton, Joshua Hyde, *Zenas Hyde, Daniel Jewett, Elisha Johnson, *Moses Johnson, — Kathan, Daniel Martin, Aaron M. Martin, Isaac Palmer, *John Smith, *Ezekiel Pierce, *John Stowers, James Upham, George Ware, *Luke Wilson, Ezekiel Wilson.

DAVID CRAWFORD.

In the war of 1812, was David Crawford, concerning whom in Gardner's Dictionary of the army of the United States, is the following record :

" David Crawford, Vt. Second Lieut. 7 May 1812. First Lieut, June 1813. Adjutant 11 Regt. Infantry. 1814. Distinguished in the battle of Niagara Falls. Brigadier Major, distinguished in Genl. Brown's Sortie at Fort Erie, Sept. 17, 1814, in which he was wounded. Capt. Sept. 17, 1814.

In 1815, at the close of the war, he was retained in his full rank, the army being reduced to a peace establishment of 10,000; but not intending to spend his days in the army, he declined the honor.

He afterwards held various civil offices; was representative from 1828—1833; a member of the last executive council in 1835; elector of president and vice president in 1836; senator from Windham County in 1840-41; member of convention to act upon proposed articles in altering the State constitution in 1843; member of the council of censors in 1848; a justice of the peace for 25 years.

Samuel Bennett, Jr. Wilder Brown, Herbert C. Deming, Waterman Joy, Comfort Joy, Abel Steele, John Brown, Asa Washburn, Jr., were also in the war of 1812.

MISCELLANEOUS

THE WORMS OF '70.

In 1770, immense number of worms overspread the ground, like the worms of Egypt, by which the corn and grass were very much destroyed. But the corn so far recovered as to produce a tolerable crop. In 1793, the canker worm destroyed all the fruit. The leaves of the trees were so far devoured, that nothing but the stems were left. In 1823, in certain groves in the west part of the town for a mile or two in extent, a worm resembling the caterpillar that infests the apple-tree, appeared and consumed entirely the leaves of the maple, ash, beech, and some other trees. so that many of them died.

A VIOLENT TEMPEST.

In Aug. 19, 1788 a violent tempest swept over the country and prostrated a large portion of the forest trees whose decaying trunks long remained as a monument of the violence of the storm. The sugar maple was so far destroyed, that but little sugar was made for many years.

FRESHETS.

There have been a number of severe freshets in Connecticut River by which more or less damage was done on the Great Meadow. In some cases the water has risen so high as to oblige the people to leave their houses.

In 1828, there was a freshet on Sackett's brook, which swept off most of the mills and bridges. The woolen-mill, paper-mill, black-smith-shop and other property was destroyed.

THE SPOTTED FEVER.

In 1813, the spotted fever prevailed to an alarming extent. Rev. Mr. Andrews left a record descriptive of the epidemic, as follows :

"The fall of the year, 1812, was steadily, but not severely cold. On the last of November there fell about 4 inches of snow, which a few hours of sun would have carried off. But the cold was so uniform, that the snow lay without increasing or diminishing till the first of January. There then came considerable snows; but the cold was for the most part not severe, but very uniform. The weather was dry and clear, such as has generally been deemed most conducive to health. The fever began to rage the first week in January and continued with violence till the last of March, and did not wholly subside till May. There were between 200 and 300 cases of the epidemic, called the spotted fever. It was generally a very malignant typhus. From the 9th of January to the 13th of April, there were 38 deaths. When the thaws and rains commenced in March, the sickness abated; and the return of cold days never failed of producing new cases of the fever. So general and distressing a disease had never been known in this section of country.

FIRES.

Some 15 houses of more or less value have been destroyed by fire since the settlement of the town. In 1772, a log-house, standing near the centre of the street, belonging to Michael Law was burned, and three children perished in the flames; a daughter aged about 16 years, a son aged 10, and another son aged 7. The oldest son, aged 18 years had rescued two of the family from the flames, and in attempting to rescue a third, was so burned, that he died in about ten days.

In 1781, a house in the east part of the town, 50 or 60 rods east of Minott's Mills, was struck with lightning. Two persons were instantly killed; Mrs. Warner, the wife of Daniel Warner, and a girl by the name of Nancy Franklin.

In 1831, a house, standing near the old grave-yard on the street was burned, and an aged lady, the wife of Mr. Paul Moore, perished in the flames.

PERSONS DROWNED.

Seven persons have been drowned; Patience Wilson and James Milbury, both in Connecticut river; Thomas Minott, at Minott's mills; Jethro Brown, Archibald Allen, a child of Newell Moore, and another of Thomas Church, in Sackett's brook, near the village.

As illustrative of the resolution and courage of the wives and mothers in the early days of the town, it may be stated that the wife of Lieut. Joshua Hyde thrice narrowly escaped drowning in Connecticut river. Once she run her canoe against a snag under water by which means she was pitched into the river and sunk. She rose with the paddle in her hand, at some distance from the boat. But the current brought her near it again, so that her daughter 10 years old, was enabled to reach her hand as she was sinking the second time. But, notwithstanding her perilous situation, she had the presence of mind to give directions by which she was safely conducted to the shore.

At another time, as she was passing between a high bank of the river and the water's edge, in stepping round a cake of ice, she was plunged into deep water. The weather was intensely cold. She had the fortitude and strength to gain the shore, and by the help of her husband, she reached home, but not till she had almost perished with cold.

At still another time, as she was passing the river on the ice, she stepped upon a board laid on a weak place in the ice, which gave way, and she was supported only by the board. Her danger was imminent. But using her remarkable discretion, she succeeded in keeping herself out of water, till a man came to her rescue.

Also, Philip Black, aged 17 years, was drowned in the Connecticut river, at Ware's ferry, Putney, while bathing one day in July 1882.

PUTNEY LONGEVITY.

Within the period of 30 years, 47 persons have died between 80 and 90 years of age. In the same period 15 persons died whose united ages amount to 1411 years. The average is 94 years. The oldest person who has died in town was Mrs. Susanna Gould. She died Sept. 12, 1835, aged 104 years and 5 months.

EAR-MARKS

Many of the customs of the fathers are doubtless looked upon by those in modern times as curiosities; but to them they had their importance. One of these customs is that of marking their sheep. Each one had his peculiar mark, which was a matter of record in the town books; so that if one of his sheep strayed away the owner could easily distinguish his own among many others. Here is a specimen.

"John Talbert's Ear mark is a squar crop off the left Ear and Hole through Right."

"Samuel Wheel's Ear mark is a Squar crop of the Right Ear. And Two Swallows Tales in the End of the Same."

"Joseph Cushing's Ear mark is a Skew crop the upper Side of the Right Ear."

"Daniel Martin's Ear mark is a squar Crop of the Right Ear and Slit in the End of the Same."

"John Perry's Ear mark is a Squair Crop off each Ear."

"Lucas Wilson's Ear Mark is a Square Crop off the Right Ear, and Two Swallows tales in said Crop and a Slit in the top of the Left."

SUICIDE.

Several instances of suicide have occurred. John Henry, July, 7, 1818, in a fit of insanity drew out his tongue with a pair of pinchers and cut it off with a razor. But finding the process of dying too slow in this way, with a stick, he twisted his cravat around his neck and thus effected his object.

Daniel Davis, Mar. 21, 1834, ascended the great beams in his barn and with a hammar fractured his skull. He fell to the floor fatally injured. He survived a few days, expressing regret for his rash act.

Lucia Roberts, Nov. 13, 1836, took a large dose of opium, of which she died.

Mrs. Persis Knight, Dec. 3, 1836, cut her throat with a razor. For some months, she had exhibited signs of mental derangement.

Mr. Warren B. Richardson and Valentine A. Kerr both hung themselves;

Mr. R. April 27, 1859, and Mr. K. May 27, 1859.

FIRST THINGS.

FIRSTBORN.

The first child born in town was Aaron, son of Philip Alexander, who lived on the Meadow. His birth was before the building of the Fort. Tradition says Col. Willard gave him 100 acres of land in commemoration of the event. Several other children were born in the Fort.

The first child born off the Great Meadow was Lucy, daughter of Lieut. Joshua Hyde; and the first born on the street was Nathan, son of Joshua Parker, Oct. 30, 1765.

FIRST DEATHS.

The first natural deaths known to have occurred were those of a Mr. Howe and a Mr. Wheeler, on the Meadow, and they were buried in Westmoreland, N. H.

The first death on the Street was that of Jemima, daughter of Joshua Parker, Sept. 13, 1777.

FIRST FRAMED HOUSES.

In 1768, Hon. Noah Sabin, Jr., built the first framed house, towards the upper part of the Street. The same year Mr. Amos Haile built one a little north west, near where the Hon. Theophilus Crawford afterwards lived. Not long after Mr. Moses Johnson built the first two-story-house in town. The house still remains, though not without having undergone alterations and repairs. After having stood a century the frame may be found "as good as new."

THE FIRST GRIST MILL

was built in the East part by Dea. Minott in 1765. The second was built by Jonathan Houghton a little below the village on Sackett's brook; and very near it was to the first saw-mill, built in 1796.

* THE FIRST CLOTHING WORKS were established by Capt. Roswell Parker in 1785, in the East part.

THE FIRST STORE,

opened, was by Peter Wilson in 1770. It stood a little west of the house of Dea. S. W. Houghton. Here, also, was the first tavern.

The second store was kept by Charles Chandler. It stood a few rods north of where James Crawford now lives, and was opened in 1783.

The paper-mill was originally built by Stimpson, Greer, and Fairbanks, in the year 1822.

ECCLESIASTICAL.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

Religious services were held in the Fort on the Great Meadow for two or three years during the French war, conducted by Rev. Andrew Gardner, who had previously been chaplain at Fort Dummer.

The first settlers on the Street were those who loved the institutions of religion; and though few in number, they did not neglect to assemble together for divine worship. For a considerable time meetings were held in private houses or barns, as circumstances might be, generally conducted by Noah Sabin and Joshua Parker, the latter of whom was afterwards a deacon of the church.

The first sermon preached on the Street was by Rev. Mr. Goddard of Westmoreland, N. H., in the house of Mr. Moses Johnson, now owned by Mr. Geo. Hooper. Others were employed to preach for a longer or shorter time, till they were enabled to procure a pastor. Still they were without a house of worship. A meeting was at length called with a view to securing such an object. This meeting was held Jan. 13, 1773. It was voted that the house to be built should be "forty feet long, and thirty-five feet wide, and forty feet post. It was also voted:

"That the spot of ground for the said building to be erected and set on, be upon the northly side of the road leading westward towards Townshend, and in the most convenient spot within twenty-five rods of the main road (or Brook-road so called), leading through said Town of Putney."

A committee to superintend the business was chosen and the house erected according to the votes here recorded.

The way was now open to take measures for securing a pastor. Two or three ineffectual attempts having been made, the Rev. Josiah Goodhue was employed to preach in the summer of 1776.

The first action taken in reference to the settlement of Mr. Goodhue was as follows:

"Putney July 15, 1776. At a meeting of the inhabitants of this town legally notified and warned agreeable to covenant, first, Voted that Left. Joshua Hyde, be the moderator of this present meeting; 2ly voted to give Mr. Goodhue a call to settle with us in the work of the gospel ministry; 3ly voted to give Mr. Goodhue fifty pounds settlement Lawful money of the Bay province; 4ly voted to give Mr. Goodhue fifty pounds salary for the first year, and rise five pounds a year till it gets to sixty pounds and then stop. 5ly voted that Mr Lucas Wilson and Mr Jonathan Houghton and Capt. John Kerthan, and Left. Joshua Hyde and Joshua Parker and Mr Grindal Reynolds and Mr Michal Law, be a Committee to wait upon Mr. Goodhue and make known the proposals to him. And then said meeting was dissolved.

MATTHEW CUSHING, CLERK."

THE RESPONSE OF MR. GOODHUE.

To the call extended to Mr. Goodhue in pursuance of the above action, he returned an affirmative answer. As yet no church had been organized, and a council was called for the two fold purpose of organizing a church and installing the pastor. The council commenced Oct. 16, 1776, on which day the Congregational church was organized, consisting of four male members, viz; Rev. Josiah Goodhue, Joshua Parker, John Wilson and Joshua Hyde. On the next day, Thursday, Oct. 17, 1776, was installed first pastor of the church. Rev. Mr. Reeve of Brattleboro began the public and solemn exercises of the day with prayer. Rev. Mr. Farrar of New Ipswich preached the sermon from I, Tim. III, 1: "If a man desire the office of a Bishop, he desireth a good work." Rev. Mr. Emerson of Hollis made the prayer before, and gave the charge. Rev. Mr. Bullen of Westminster gave the right hand of fellowship, and Rev. Mr. Webster of Temple made the prayer after the charge, and the whole was conducted and attended with great solemnity and decency.

REV. JOSIAH GOODHUE

Mr. Goodhue remained pastor till his death, Nov. 14, 1797. During his ministry 56 were added to the church.

After the death of Mr. Goodhue for more than two years, the church was destitute of a pastor; when a call for settlement was extended to

MR. JAIRUS REMINGTON,

He was ordained, Feb. 12, 1800 and dismissed, Feb. 15, 1803. Two were added to the church under his ministry, was the third pastor. He was ordained June 25, 1817, and after a happy and useful ministry he was dismissed, May 27, 1827. During this pastorate several seasons of religious interest were enjoyed; but in 1817 a powerful revival took place, the influence of which pervaded every part of the community, producing a most happy effect upon the morals and habits of the people. As the direct result of this revival, 150 persons were added to the church. The whole number added unto the church during Mr. Andrews' ministry was 242.

REV. ELISHA D. ANDREWS

REV. BENJAMIN H. FITMAN was the successor of Mr. Andrews. He was installed March 3, 1830, and dismissed, Nov. 1, 1832. Under his ministry 70 persons were received into the church. In December 1832, a call was extended to of Canaan, N. H. to take the pastoral charge of the church and society. He accepted the call, and was installed, Feb. 13, 1833. This relation continued till Sept. 20, 1853. During this pastorate four seasons of special religious awakening were enjoyed, and 197 members were admitted to the church.

REV. JAMES AIKEN

was the next pastor. His installation took place, Jan. 11, 1854. He was dismissed, Dec. 9, 1857.

REV. HENRY M. GROUT was Mr. Aiken's successor. He was ordained, Sept. 1, 1858, and dismissed, Feb. 20, 1861. During these two last pastorates, 24 members were added to the church.

For several years after Mr. Grout's dismission, the church was without a settled pastor; but enjoyed the labors of stated supplies.

REV. THEODORE M. DWIGHT

was employed for four years; during which time 18 members were added to the church. On his retirement, by request of the Church and Society the resumed his labors as acting pastor on the first Sabbath in February 1866 and closed them Dec. 15, 1872. During this period 45 members were admitted to the church here.

Following Mr. Foster as stated supplies, were Rev. Jehial Claffin, Mr. James Mason and John E. Russell, licenciates, and Rev. Austin Dodge, by which gentlemen, the pulpit was supplied till Apr. 24, 1881, when commenced his labors as candidate for settlement; and having received a call from the Church and Society, on the 14th of September he was installed as pastor. Reckoning the number since Mr. Harlow's settlement, the whole number received to its membership is so far as can be ascertained, 752.

THE FIRST HOUSE OF WORSHIP

erected in 1773, continued to be occupied until 1803; when a new one more commodious was built on a gentle eminence about midway of the street. It was dedicated Nov. 29, 1803, was continued to be used for public worship till the spring of 1841, a period of 38 years. It was then taken down and a new house built in a more central part of the village. In the summer of 1867, this house was thoroughly repaired and fitted up in a style of beauty and convenience which does credit to the society. The audience room is in the upper story. In the lower are the vestries; one large for social meetings; the other smaller for the meetings of the Ladies Society.

MODERN PERFECTIONISM

The introduction of Modern Perfectionism in the year 1834, under the leadership of John H. Noyes, a member of the church, exerted a blighting influence upon the cause of good morals and religion.

This sect, while they held to the doctrine of sinless perfection, at the same time embraced sentiments of a most licentious tendency. They enjoyed apparent prosperity for a few years, until their Leader was arrested for a high misdemeanor, and was put under heavy bonds for his appearance for trial at the superior court. He immediately left the state, his bonds were forfeited, and the community broken up. In all measures relative to the offending members, the church acted in perfect harmony, but the deleterious influence of the doctrines and practices of the sect long remained in the community.

[Noyes went from here to Oneida, N. Y., where he established his community. A book entitled "Noyesism Unveiled" by Rev. H. Eastman, a Methodist clergyman and ex-presiding elder, gives a more extensive account than here.]

THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

By REV. HENRY C. BACON.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF PUTNEY

was organized, Nov. 12, 1787, consisting of about 40 members, and composed of persons residing in the West part of the town,—an industrious, thrifty people, mostly farmers.

In the year 1790, a house of worship was erected on the heights near where Oliver Wood now lives, and in 1793 was ordained pastor, who labored with this church several years. In 1818, was settled as pastor. He was a faithful and highly useful minister. He labored with the church six years, when he laid down his armor to enter into rest.

REV. ASHEL WOOD

A NEW MEETING-HOUSE.

In 1836, the old meeting-house was taken down and the following year a new house of worship was erected on a new site, far more convenient than the former one.

THE PASTORS.

whose labors this church have enjoyed were Revs. Jonathan Wilson, Lewis Allen, Nathaniel Cudworth, Zibba Howard, Ferris Moore, Caleb Smith, and Calvin Baker.

Many years of spiritual prosperity were enjoyed by the church and goodly numbers were occasionally added to its membership until it became one of the largest and most prosperous of the Baptist churches in the Windham County Association.

Rev. Elisha D. Andrews in his account of the interesting revival of 1816, states that 30 persons united with this church as the fruit of that revival. It may be said of this church that it was

“a living branch of the Living Vine.”

At this period a large proportion of the inhabitants of the town resided in the west part of the town; were a church-going people, their congregations were large on the Sabbath. The church was prosperous until about 1840 or 1845 when in consequence of the large emigration and death of its members the society began to decline and became extinct about 1860 and their house of worship was sold, taken down and the material used for other purposes.

In 1877, what few members of the old church were still living, together with others who had moved into the town during the interval from 1860 to 1877, connected themselves with the First Baptist Church of Brattleboro and in 1879, were organized as a branch church with 18 members. In December 1879, this Branch Church called of Hartford, Ct., to labor with them. In October 1880, Brother Parsons was ordained and became pastor of the Branch Church and is its present pastor. Success has crowned the labors of Pastor and people, the members have increased and Jan. 25, 1883,

BRO. M. D. PARSONS

THE BRANCH CHURCH

withdrew from the Brattleboro church and became an INDEPENDENT BAPTIST CHURCH.

Having no house of worship, they hold their services in the Town Hall.

During the 4 years of this Church's labors, there has been 54 added to its membership, making its present members, 54; and during the past year a site has been purchased and the funds solicited and arrangements made to build a house of worship during the coming season.

THE METHODIST CHURCH.

Although some individuals of this persuasion previously resided in town, yet they were not embodied till about the year 1826, when a class was formed and soon after a church was organized. The first circuit preacher labored in 1869. Considerable additions were made to the church and in 1832 a commodious house was erected in the East part of the town. The society increased in numbers and embraced persons living in different parts of the town and it was at length thought expedient that another house be built in the village. Accordingly, in about 10 years after the first house of worship another was erected in 1842, and from that time to the present, public religious services have been regularly maintained in the latter house while the former has been converted into a hall, and appropriated to various other purposes.

The Methodist society here has been favored with a succession of faithful and devoted preachers, and frequent additions have been made to the church.

PROMINENT MEMBERS.

Among those whose names are held in grateful remembrance as having been especially active in promoting the interests of the church are Mason Drown and Timothy Underwood. They were among the original members and took a leading part in whatever promised to advance its welfare. Mr. Drown was humble and devoted as a Christian and adorned the religion that he professed. Mr. Underwood was an efficient worker in the cause, not only devoting his time and energies to its advancement, but giving liberally for the support of religious institutions.

For several years after the organization of the church ministerial labor was enjoyed in connection with other towns.

The following are the names of those who supplied the Methodist Church of Putney in the manner above stated.

THE UNIVERSALISTS.

Of this denomination, there has ever been a considerable number in town. In 1833, a Society was formed and they had preaching for a few years. For a long time past until recently they have been destitute of preaching of their order. Some two years ago they organized a new Society and employed a minister, Rev. E. Smiley. He has received a call from another place and will soon leave town.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. JOSIAH GOODHUE,

THE FIRST PASTOR OF PUTNEY.

He was the third son of Dea. Samuel Goodhue, and was born in Stratham, N. H., July 1729. His mother's family name was Bartlett. He fitted for college under the instruction of Rev. Daniel Emerson of Hollis, N. H., and graduated at Harvard college in 1755, being a classmate of President John Adams, the elder. He was ordained over the Congregational church in Dunstable, Mass, where he remained about 16 years. Being dismissed from Dunstable at his own request, he came to Putney, where he was installed first pastor of Putney and the fourth settled in the County, Oct. 17, 1776. He remained in this pastorate 20 years; but was released from his public official duties for a year before his death, on account of ill health.

He married for his first wife, Elizabeth Fletcher, daughter of Dea. Fletcher of Dunstable. Mr. and Mrs. Goodhue were the parents of 7 children. One died in its infancy.

Josiah Jr. was for many years a physician, and stood high among the members of his profession.

Joseph was also, a physician, and for a considerable time held the position of a surgeon at Fort Constitution, in New Hampshire.

Elizabeth, the only daughter, married Dea. Peter Aiken of Windham.

Ebenezer was a highly respected deacon of the church in Westminster West.

Samuel Bartlett graduated at Dartmouth College, but never entered any profession.

Nathaniel became a lawyer and settled in the State of Ohio.

Mrs. Goodhue died Oct. 21, 1793. He afterwards married the widow of Mr. Joshua Hyde. She died Feb. 8, 1806. Both these women were persons of high respectability and moral worth. Mr. Goodhue died before his last wife, Nov. 14, 1797, aged 68 years. Many of his posterity are now living and are among the most useful citizens and members of the church of Christ.

At his funeral, a sermon was preached by the Rev. William Wells of Brattleboro, from Job 16, 22, which was published. As a preacher, Mr. Goodhue was strictly evangelical and impressive. As a pastor, he was devoted to the interests of his people, in his visits among them, always making religion some part of the topic of conversation. He was a man of an amiable and kind disposition; prudent and discreet in his conversation, and exemplary in his conduct. Rev. Mr. Wells in his funeral sermon bears the following testimony to his worth:

"I believe you will all agree with me in asserting, piety to God and benevolence to men were leading features in his character. The great object of his life was to be useful in his station as a minister of Christ, and to exemplify in his own conduct those virtues and graces which, with the greatest sincerity, he recommended to others. His end, like that of the godly man, was peace."

DEA. JOSHUA PARKER.

was born in Stoneham, Mass., June 4, 1720. He married March 7, 1745, Jemima Davenport of Charlestown. They resided in Boston till 1747; thence removed to Needham; afterwards to Canterbury, Ct., and in 1764 they came to Putney. In 1778 he was chosen deacon of the Congregational church, the duties of which office he discharged with promptitude and fidelity. He was a man of devoted piety, highly respected by those who knew him, and greatly useful as a Christian. Before the settlement of the first pastor, he usually conducted the exercises when the people were assembled for religious purposes. In his intercourse with others, he made religion the theme of conversation, and this was the source of his greatest comfort in life and in death. He died Feb. 21, 1813, aged 92 years. He was the father of six children, some of whose descendants are ornaments in the communities in which they live.

DR. JOSEPH LORD

was the son of Rev. Joseph Lord of Charlestown, Mass., and was born in the year 1704. He was a graduate at Harvard College where his father had been educated, in 1724. He entered the medical profession and commenced practice in Sunderland, Mass. In 1734, he removed to Athol with the first settlers of that town. Here he took a leading position among the people; was their physician, religious teacher, magistrate, proprietors' clerk, treasurer, tax gatherer and surveyor. A misunderstanding at length arose between him and the Proprietors, which led to an unhappy legal controversy. In consequence of these difficulties, in 1759, Dr. Lord left Athol and came to Putney. Here his abilities were appreciated. By commissions dated the 16 of July 1766, he was appointed second Judge of the Court of common Pleas and a Justice of the Peace for Cumberland, now Windham County. These commissions were renewed on two subsequent occasions, and he was continued in office till the Revolution.

As the infirmities of age came upon him he desired to be released from public service, that he might, to use his own language, "spend the remainder of his days in calm retirement, and concern himself in nothing else but doing good and preparing for a glorious immortality." The Courts, however, were so modified as to continue him in the Judgeship; but to take "as little share of the burden of office upon himself, as should be agreeable to him. This was highly complimentary to the worthy magistrate.

He was a man of intelligence, of an upright moral and Christian character, and was highly respected by all who knew him. He had six sons and several daughters. His last years were spent with his son Jotham in Westmoreland, where he died in 1788, aged 84 years. Many of his descendants survive and fill respectable positions in society.

CAPT. BENJAMIN PAGE,

A grandson of the preceding, was born in Putney in 1769. His advantages for an early education were not superior. But by observation and self-culture he became intelligent and especially was he highly skilled in the science of architecture. In this department of business, he was uncommonly enterprising and useful. His last labor was the building of the first Presbyterian meeting house in New Orleans. He drew his plan, prepared the materials, took them by ship to that city and completed the building to the satisfaction of his employers. Before he left the city, he took the yellow fever and died on his passage home, Aug. 11, 1819, aged 50 years.

It is an interesting fact, that the house built by Capt. Lord was the same in which the lamented Sylvester Larned officiated as the first pastor of the first Presbyterian church in New Orleans.

He was a graduate of Middlebury College in 1813, and died in New Orleans of yellow fever, on his birth day, Aug. 31, 1820, aged 24, about one year after Capt. Lord.

HON. NOAH SABIN.

FROM HALL'S HISTORY OF EASTERN VERMONT.

"He was born at Rehoboth, Mass., Nov. 10, 1714, and was the only son of Noah Sabin of that place. Being religiously disposed in early life, he was designed by his father for the ministry. But to this profession he was not inclined. In the year 1768, at the age of fifty-four, he removed to Putney, and at the first election of town officers, May 8, 1770, was chosen town clerk. On the 14 of April, 1772, he was appointed Judge of the Inferior Court of common Pleas of Cumberland County, and Justice of the Peace. Previous to the affray at Westminster on the 13 of March, 1775, Judge Sabin opposed in every practicable manner the attempts of the people to interfere with the management of the courts. His extreme conscientiousness led him to adopt this course, for he knew that he had received a commission from the Crown, and felt that his oath bound him, at the least, not to offer resistance to the mother country. After being taken prisoner on this occasion, he was confined in the Court-house at Westminster for a few days, was then carried to Northampton, afterwards to New York city, where he was imprisoned. Being subsequently tried and honorably acquitted, he was supplied by Governor Tryon with clothing and ample means to return home. He was absent more than a year.

Regarded as a Tory in principle and as a secret favorer of the court of Great Britain, he was for a time subjected to many annoyances. Soon after his return, William Moore, Daniel Jewett, and Moses Johnson, committee men of Putney, accompanied by a party of their friends, armed with swords, went to his house, ordered him to mount his horse and follow them. Obeying their commands, he was conducted to Westminster, where he was placed in jail.

Many were the threats used to intimidate him during this transaction. His imprisonment, however, lasted but a day. In the evening, the door of his cell was opened, and he was allowed to return home. On his death bed, Moore, who had been the principal actor on this occasion, sent for Judge Sabin, confessed with tears the abuses of which he had been guilty, and besought forgiveness. On being assured that his request was granted,—“Now,” said he, “I can die in peace.” Fearing that Judge Sabin might be in communication with the enemy, he was confined to his farm by an order of the committee of safety, passed in the year 1776, and permission was given to any one to shoot him, whenever he should be found beyond its limits. So bitter was the hatred towards him at this time, that one of his neighbors, a man zealous for the liberty of the colonies, and for the destruction of their foes, watched for him with a loaded rifle as he afterwards acknowledged, in the woods adjoining the Judge's house, prepared to shoot the despised Loyalist, should he venture beyond the prescribed lines.

Even the members of the church in Putney shared in these prejudices. Not being an original member, he was refused the privilege of occasional communion with them. This fact appears by the annexed extract from the church record:

“Putney, Dec. 7, 1778.

The church met and took under consideration the request of Noah Sabin, Esq., of occasional communion with his church, and came to the following vote, That it was best, all things considered, not to receive him at present.

J. GOODWIN, Moderator.

He was afterwards on the 29th of April, 1781, admitted by vote to full communion, and was known as a “most stable, useful, and consistent member.”

In 1781 he was elected Judge of Probate for Windham County, but on the 12th of April, in the same year, was suspended from office in order to satisfy the complaints of many who believed him to be dangerous as a Loyalist. He was reinstated on the 25 of October following, and it is believed continued in office until the year 1801. Judge Sabin was a man of uncommon powers of mind. He was cool and considerate in his purposes, sound and discriminating in his judgment. His counsels were often sought, and were generally safely followed.

For the period in which he lived, his education was superior. It is asserted with confidence that when the charter for Putney was obtained, he was the only person in the town possessed of sufficient skill to decipher the peculiar chirography in which the instrument was written. In his religious character, he was upright, sincere, and conscientiously true to his professions. It might be said of him that he was active as a christian, for when the people were destitute of a minister, the duty of conducting the exercises of their religious assemblies often devolved on him. Although at first strongly attached to the Crown, and for some time after the commencement of the Revolution, undecided as to the course he should take in the struggle between the colonies and the mother aountry, his sympathies were subsequently enlisted on the side of the former, and no truer patriot was to be found than he. Upon retiring from office and active life, the remainder of his days was marked by acts of piety towards God and beneficence to mankind. He died on the 10th of March, 1811, at the advanced age of ninety-six years."*

In illustration of the character of Judge Sabin, it may be added, while some sportsmen were hunting on West Hill, one of them attempted to imitate the Indian war-whoop. The people in Brookline were alarmed by the apprehension that the Indians were about to fall upon them. The consternation spread into Athens and other towns. Large numbers, men, women and children instantly left their homes and made a hasty flight to escape the ferocity of the savage foe. Passing by the house of Judge Sabin in Putney, they found him quietly engaged in his accustomed occupations. They related to him the cause of their alarm; but he remained unmoved. They at once supposed him to be in alliance with the enemy, and the bitterest maledictions were heaped upon him. They pursued their flight as far as Westmoreland, and on the following day when their fears were dissipated, they attempted to return. But a severe snow storm, (it being about the 1st of Nov. 1780,) blocked the roads and greatly impeded their progress. Arriving at the house of Judge Sabin cold, weary and hungry, they were invited to enter his hospitable dwelling. Here they were furnished with food and clothing and every comfort the house afforded; in short, were treated in the kindest possible manner. Their prejudices were all removed, and the man who, the day before, had been so bitterly cursed, now received their most hearty thanks.

HON. NOAH SABIN JR.

son of Noah Sabin, was born at Rehoboth, Mass., April 20, 1750, and removed with his father to Putney, when he was about eighteen years old. He held the office of Register of Probate of Windham County, from 1791 to 1801, and from the latter year until 1808, was Judge of Probate, in which station he succeeded his father. He was early elected a Justice of the Peace, and filled the office for nearly half a century. He represented the town of Putney in the General Assembly during the years 1782, 83, and 87. His death occurred at Putney, Dec. 5, 1827, in the 78th year of his age. In an obituary notice written soon after his decease, it is said:

"Judge Sabin was a man of sound mind, of a placid temper, and manifested upon all occasions that urbanity of deportment which commanded the love and respect of his acquaintance. He was an early settler of the town, and ever took an active interest in its civil and religious concerns. He was more than forty-seven years a magistrate, and sustained for many years the office of Judge of Probate and other office with honor to himself and usefulness to the public. He discharged the duties of office with such firmness and fidelity as to escape with a much less share of censure than is common in like cases.

As a christian, he appeared humble and unostentatious, steady and uniform in his principles and practices. He seemed always to love religion, and to be governed by a sacred regard for its doctrines and duties. It appeared to be his stay in the closing scenes of life. He was resigned to the will of God, and ready to depart at his bidding. He was willing to be absent from the body, and to go and be present with the Lord.*

CAPT. DANIEL JEWETT.

was born in Manchester, Mass., Mar. 7, 1744. At the age of 20, he married Zilpah Hibbard and settled in Canterbury, Ct. He soon removed to Putney, and is said to have been the first blacksmith in town, commencing business in 1773. Residing 2 or 3 miles northwest from the street, he was connected with the Baptist congregation on West Hill, and for many years a leading member of that church. He was a man of firm religious principle, of unbending integrity, and of an irreproachable moral character. In all town matters and in every thing which concerned the public welfare, he exerted a great influence, as is evident from the fact that he represented the town in the State Legislature 13 years. He died March 28, 1829, aged 85. He was the father of Drs.

*From Hall's History of Eastern Vermont.

Luther and Calvin Jewett of St. Johnsbury, both distinguished physicians, and the former for some years pastor of the Congregational church in Newbury; and the grand father of Rev. Milo P. Jewett, L. L. D., President of the Vassar Female College at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

REV. ELISHA D. ANDREWS

was born in Southington, Ct., in 1783. In the year 1803, he graduated at Yale College, and afterwards read theology with the Rev. Joseph Lathrop of West Springfield, Mass. The first Sabbath he preached in Putney was Nov. 2, 1806. In April following, he received a call to settle in the ministry, and was ordained the third pastor of the Congregational church and Society June 25, 1807. Rev. Dr. Lathrop, his theological teacher, preached the sermon, on the occasion.

And now commenced a scene of peace, harmony, and religious prosperity, which it is a pleasure to recall. In the early part of his ministry, there were two or three seasons of more than usual religious interest, and a goodly number were added to the church. But not till the year 1816, was there a general revival of religion. To use his own language:

"During this season there was a deep impression of the importance of religion and of the worth of the soul; a deep conviction of sin and an anxious inquiry after the way of salvation. With the youth generally and to a considerable extent with others, the salvation of the soul was the 'one thing needful.' The vanities of life were laid aside and religion was the great concern. The house of worship was thronged and the Sabbath religiously observed. Other places of worship were gladly attended. Multitudes came and confessed Christ before men. In about a year 150 were added to the church. Eighty were added in one day."

Mr. Andrews' pastorate continued till May 27, 1829, a period of twenty-two years. The dismissing Council left the following testimony:

"From long acquaintance and christian intercourse with Mr. Andrews, the Council are constrained to express their regret and sorrow at this separation, and their approbation of the spirit manifested by the people towards their late pastor, particularly in their generous subscriptions paid in defraying the expenses of his removal."

He went first to Bloomfield, N. Y., and then to Michigan, where he died in 1852.

He married Miss Betsey Lathrop of West Springfield, Mass., grand-daughter of Rev. Dr. Lathrop.

THE DR. CAMPBELLS OF PUTNEY

was born in Oxford Mass., in 1754. In early life he came to Putney and commenced the practice of medicine. He was a man of intelligence, energy and moral worth, and exerted a wide influence in his profession and in civil life. The confidence reposed in him by his fellow-citizens is indicated by the fact that he was chosen to represent the town from 1790 to 1796 inclusive. He died Jan. 15, 1820, aged 66 years. His pastor gave the following testimony concerning him: "He had been for 37 years a useful physician in the place."

DR. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

Brother of the preceeding, was born in Oxford, Mass., in 1760, and was for many years a successful practitioner in medicine. He died, Dec. 15, 1839, æ 70 years.

DR. JOHN CAMPBELL, 2D.

was a son of the above. He was a native of Putney and here spent his life in the medical profession. He acquired an extensive practice, was a physician of superior judgment in the treatment of diseases, and was often called to a distance in consultation upon difficult cases. He died June 4, 1866, aged 73 years.

HON. PHINEAS WHITE

BY JOHN KIMBALL, ESQ.

He was the son of Dea. Enoch White, and was born in South Hadley, Mass. Oct. 30, 1770. He graduated at Dartmouth college in 1797, and studied law with the Hon. Charles Marsh of Woodstock, Vt., and Judge Samuel Porter of Dummerston, Vt. In 1800, he commenced the practice of his profession in Putney, where he resided through life. He was called to many positions of honor and responsibility. He was Postmaster of Putney from 1802 to 1809; was for several years State's Attorney for the County of Windham, was Judge of the Probate Court, and from 1818 to 1820, was chief Judge of the County Court.

In 1820, he was elected a Representative to Congress and served one term. In 1836, he was a member of the Convention for revising the Constitution of Vermont, and from 1838 to 1840, was a Senator in the State Legislature; having previously been several times a Representative from the town of Putney. He belonged to the Masonic Order and was Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Vermont.

After his election to Congress, he almost wholly abandoned his law business, engaging extensively, and with good success, in farming. The colleges of the State, and various benevolent institutions shared largely in his counsels and liberality. He was one of the trustees of Middlebury College, and was for several years President of the Vermont Bible Society, and of the Vermont Colonization Society. He was also, an active member of the Congregational church in Putney, with which he and his wife united in 1815. He died July 6, 1847, aged 76.

He married, July 5, 1801, Esther Stevens of Plainfield, Ct., daughter of Nehemiah Stevens and Hepzibah Kelum. She was born Jan. 1777, and died Sep. 25, 1858, aged 81.

THE CRAWFORDS OF PUTNEY.

HON. THEOPHILUS CRAWFORD.

was born in Union, Ct., Apr. 25, 1764. He removed to Putney in 1799, having been for a number of years an inhabitant of Westminster. He purchased the farm originally owned by Mr. Amos Haile. Though engaged in agricultural pursuits, he was distinguished for his extensive reading, his retentive memory, his knowledge of the political history of the country, his keen observation of men and things, and his correct discrimination of character. His life was marked by uprightness and integrity. He enjoyed the confidence of his fellow citizens to a great degree. From 1816 to 1819, he was in the Executive Council; was Delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1822; and was also representative of the town and justice of the peace. He died Jan. 10, 1856, aged 95.

DEACON DAVID CRAWFORD.

He was the son of the Hon. Theophilus Crawford, and was born in Westminster West, Aug. 1789. When he was about ten years of age his parents removed to Putney, and this was ever after the place of his residence. From his youth he sustained a good moral character.

He was a regular attendant upon public worship and a generous supporter of the gospel. His attention was especially called to the subject of religion in the summer of 1833, and on the first Sabbath of November following, he entered into covenant with the Congregational church. In March 1834 he was appointed Deacon of the church, the duties of which he continued to discharge till advancing age rendered it expedient for him to retire.

Deacon Crawford was a man of a sound and discriminating mind and of correct moral principles. He was not hasty in forming his opinions, but when his mind was made up, he exhibited great firmness and decision. His reading was extensive and his knowledge on subjects of general interest was beyond what we generally find. By his fellow-citizens he was honored with various civil offices, the duties of which he discharged with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of his constituents.

In his Christian life he maintained a consistent walk and conversation before the world. He felt that the vows of God were upon him, and it was his endeavor so to live as not to dishonor the Christian name. He loved the house of God and the meeting for prayer, and on all occasions he was present unless providentially detained. To him the truths of the gospel were precious, and by these his soul was refreshed and his hope strengthened. During the last months of his life, his thoughts seemed to be more conversant with spiritual subjects. The prosperity of religion was an object of his ardent desires. In his last sickness he suffered much; yet patience and submission to the Divine will marked his spirit. His end was peace. He died March 1, 1871, aged 81 years and 6 months.

WARREN PARKER

was born in Putney, July 15, 1791. He was son of Capt. Roswell Parker, who was a son of Joshua Parker, one of the first settlers on the street, and one of the original members of the Congregational church. A daughter of Joshua Parker and sister of Roswell Parker, married Mr. John Adams of Canterbury, Ct., and they were the parents of Mr. John Adams, Jr., for many years the distinguished Principal of Andover Academy, Mass. Warren Parker and John Adams, Jr., were, of course, own cousins.

Mr. Parker spent about 12 years of his early manhood in Lyndon and Rockingham doing the business of a clothier. He at length returned to Putney where he spent the remainder of his days. For nearly forty years he was employed in manufacturing the horse-hay-rake, an employment which proved highly profitable. But at length it was his misfortune to lose a large share of his property in the failure of the First National Bank of Brattleboro. Still he had a competency left and he did not suffer for a want of the necessities of life. For several of his last years, he was deprived of the use of his limbs, which, with other infirmities rendered his situation very uncomfortable. Yet he was a patient sufferer and was not known to complain of the dealings of his Heavenly Father. He died Jan 14, 1882, in his 91st year.

Descending from an ancestry of great intellectual and moral worth, he inherited traits of character which contributed largely to his usefulness as a member of civil society and secured for him the respect and good will of his fellow-citizens. The cause of Temperance, Moral Reform, and Human Rights enjoyed his approval, and his patronage.

He was ever ready to lend a helping hand to relieve the needy and destitute, and whatever objects of public welfare called attention, he was one of the first to proffer his influence and means for their promotion. Although not a member of the church, to sustain the Institutions of religion was a leading object of his desires and efforts. Not only was he a liberal supporter of the gospel pecuniarily, but during the years of his health and bodily activity, his place in the Sanctuary was usually occupied. But he has left us, and although missed in his family, in the social circle, and in the house of prayer, he will long be remembered with affection and high respect by all who knew him.

HON NATHAN SARGENT.

was a son of Samuel and Mary (Washburn) Sargent and was born in Putney, May 5, 1794. [An anonymous sketch of Mr. Sargent sent in since the death of Mr. Foster gives the date of his birth May 17, 1794.] His parents had been early residents of Leicester, Mass. but removed to Putney in 1790. Of the grandfather of Nathan Sargent, it is said "he was a staunch patriot, and is mentioned, in connection with the march of the Leicester troops at the time of the Lexington battle, as having melted his clock-weights to provide bullets for the soldiers."

Samuel Sargent, the father of Nathan, married Mary, the daughter of Seth Washburn of Leicester and sister of Asa Washburn, an early inhabitant of Putney, who sustained through a long life a worthy reputation as a Christian and a civil magistrate. He died in 1825, aged 71 and his wife in 1848, aged 89. The subject of this notice, therefore was a cousin of the late Judge Washburn, many years a citizen of Ludlow, Vt.

An account of the public life of Mr. Sargent is given in Johnson's Cyclopædia, probably being as correct as any that can be given, is here inserted :

"He received a good education; studied law; settled in Cahawba, Ala. in 1816, where he became County and Probate Judge; resided at Buffalo, N. Y., 1826—1830; established a Whig newspaper at Philadelphia, 1830; was afterwards Washington correspondent of the 'United States Gazette,' becoming widely known under his nom de plume of "Oliver Old School;" was Sergeant at Arms at the U. S. House of Representatives 1849—51; Register of the Treasury 1851—53; Commissioner of Customs 1861—71; and was for some years A resident of the Washington Reform School. He was author of a Life of Henry Clay (1844) and Public Men and Events (2 vols. 1872) issued but a few days before his death. It contains many interesting reminiscences of the days of Jackson, Clay, and Calhoun. He died in Washington, D. C. Feb. 2, 1875."

The few survivors who knew Mr. Sargent speak of him in high terms as an agreeable and intelligent gentleman; and a warm friend of all good and worthy objects; and as one whose endeavor was to be faithful in all his official and private duties, and to be useful to his country and the world.

[Here the Ms. of Mr. Foster closes. We have received from Rev. Dr. Grout the following additional paper for Mr. Sargent, since the death of Mr. Foster. We understand it comes from the family of Mr. Sargent.]

Before Nathan was fifteen he had read Rollins Ancient History and other histories. His fondness for reading, created the desire for a good education, but his father was blessed with more children than means, of whom two only were boys, and Nathan had to depend upon himself to carry out his desires; but he saved every penny he could earn until he had $10 when he went to Brattleboro, (March 1811,) and bought at Fessenden's book-store a Latin dictionary, $4.50; a Virgil, $4.50 and Adams' Latin grammar, $1.00, (total $10,) and with these studied Latin, occasionally reciting to his pastor, Rev. Elisha D. Andrews. Two years after, he taught school in Putney, having in the mean time attended the academy at West Brattleboro, paying his own way, by working on a farm during August and September. The following spring, he entered Judge Phineas White's office as a student at law. During the winter of 1813-14, he taught school in the East Parish of Westmoreland, N. H., and in the spring, went back to Judge White's office. The following winter he taught school at Brattleboro.

June 1, 1816, he went to Troy, N. Y., and entered the office of Stephen Ross as a law student, teaching school at the same time. He was admitted to the Bar Nov. 1818, and immediately went to Alabama, settling at Cahawba, then the seat of government of the future state.

In Alabama he was very successful as a lawyer, and was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas and Judge of Probate in 1822, and afterwards elected by both Houses of Legislature. But, finding the climate unhealthy for one born on northern soil, he returned to New York, May 1824.

In 1830, he removed to Philadelphia, Pa., and became Editor and Proprietor of the Commercial Herald. In the New Year's address of the Public Ledger of Jan. 1837, Nathan Sargent is thus alluded to: "In 1842, he sold the 'Herald' and became the correspondent of the U. S. Gazette and other papers, over the signature of "Oliver Old School."

Ben Perley Poore, in his "Reminiscences of Washington" published in the Atlantic Monthly for Sept. 1880, says, writing of Oliver Old School:

"His carefully written letters gave a continuous narrative of all important events, as they occurred at the National Metropolis, and he was one of those who aided in making the Whig party, like the Federal party which had preceeded it, eminently respectable."

He held successively the offices of Sergeant-at-arms of the U. S. House of Representatives, Recorder of the Land Office, Register of the Treasury and Commissioner of Customs. The last named position, he resigned about two years before his death. He was also the chief agent in establishing the Reform School for juvenile delinquents in Washington, and at the time of his death was President of the Board of Trustees of that institution.

His last literary labor, a book entitled "Public Men and Events," was highly commended by the press throughout the country.

His widow survived him two years, dying in 1877. He left but one child, a daughter, the widow of the Rev. M. L. Olds of Washington, D. C. He was a man of whose memory his daughter and grand-children may be proud; an honest politician, a good man in every relation of life.

*"Who is that snarler, Cassius like and lean
With humor caustic and with satire keen;
Who drubs the drones, the foplings and the fools,
Who flings at fashion lead by folly's rules?
Who while his trampling heels around he throws,
Cares not how hard he treads on others toes;
Who dares be just, nor fears to say the right,
Who will not flatter, but will sometimes bite:

Who makes e'en scoundrels sometimes say their prayers:

Commercial Herald is the name he bears."

PUTNEY WEST HILL.*

A BRIEF SKETCH OF ITS SETTLEMENT,

BY DAVID L. MANSFIELD.

The writer accepted an invitation to spend the 4th of July, 1882, with a party on Putney west hill, and view the landscape o'er, as seen from that elevated situation. The particular spot visited from which the prospect appeared most pleasing, was the height of land just north of the Simeon Reed place. The first settlements in that vicinity were made soon after 1780, by persons from the southeastern part of Massachusetts. Mr. Reed's father, John Reed, came from Dighton, Mass.

Near Mr. Reed were located Samuel Bennett, Capt. Ezekiel Wilson, with a family of ten children, Thomas Turner, the Kerrs, the Johnsons, Moses Joy, and Charles Cudworth, Sen., who was the father of Charles, Jr., and grandfather of Gideon, the father of T. J. B. Cudworth of Brattleboro; South of where Mr. Cudworth lived was the Allyn family. Near the site of the old homestead in a pasture by the roadside were seen lying on the ground two slate stone slabs, on which were inscribed the names of "Joseph Allyn died Dec. 16, 1797, aged 77," and "Mary, wife of Joseph Allyn, died May 18, 1802, aged 78. Others were buried there, but no stone marks their lowly bed. Joseph Allyn was the father of Rev. Lewis Allyn, known as Elder Allyn, who preached many years in the Baptist church on Putney hill, and several years in Hinesburgh. Joseph Allyn came with his family from Rehoboth, Mass., west of Dighton, in which place the Allyn family were among the first settlers in 1644. Luther Allyn who was Postmaster in Dummerston many years ago, was a son of Lewis and grandson of Joseph Allyn.

Just east of the Reed place stood the old brick school house, that was pulled down some years ago; its foundation is overgrown with briars. About 1830, eighty scholars attended this school, and from it went out several who became professional men.

J. WHEELER TURNER. ESQ.,

one of the prominent lawyers in Branch County, Michigan, and a native of Putney West Hill, sent to the Writer a book of poems of which he was the author, from which is taken the following, relating to the home of his youth.

PUTNEY WEST HILL.

Oh may I once again with arms extended wide,
Embrace my sacred Muse upon that mountain side!
And sing one evening hymn where star-lit hills arise
And cloud their Alpine tops, high reaching to the skies.
And may I view again some autumn evening, bright,
The friendly harvest moon in cloudless
chrysolite,
Move o'er those lofty peaks, lamp-like as they do stand,
The sentinels of earth, set by the great Command.
And in the troubled storm when ocean heaves
her waves,
And pent up raging winds howl from their mountain caves,
While lightnings bolt the sky and strike from hill to hill,
As through the hollow glens at darkened interval,

The mountain-shaking thunders roll, subdued
by roll,

In death's sepulchral tones resound from pole to pole.

Oh! let me be there then, the darkest midnight hour,

For there my soul received its spirit-stirring power.

"HOME"

The reflection of a Native of Putney in the far distant West.

When night her dark mantle

Hath spread o'er the earth,
And hushed in sweet slumber

The songsters of mirth;

When those who are weeping

And pining by day,

In the kindly embrace

Of forgetfulness lay,

When naught but the phantoms

And visions of night,

Deluding my fancy

With scenes of delight

Are floating around me

Bewildering the view

With things that deceive me,

So false, so untrue;

Yet let me be sleeping

When far from my home

When far from my kindred,

A stranger I roam;

For in dreams I revisit

My own native land,

In dreams see my father,

Extending his hand;

Dear mother and sisters

Come circling around;

My brothers I see them

And hear the glad sound

Of voices familiar

That oft times before

I've heard when awake,

But shall hear them no more.

Oh! let me while sleeping

Be welcomed to-night

At the home of my childhood,

That land of delight.

PUTNEY WEST HILL.

The soil in this locality, though rocky, is very good, and such as those farmers preferred to cultivate. It produced abundant crops of hay and grain which enabled them to keep a large stock of cattle. They supported large families and managed to accumulate property. They were hard working people; heavy stone walls enclose the fields and pastures on each farm which must have cost them much labor. As we looked down from our place of observation on these once cultivated farms, we were reminded of the following lines, so illustrative of the labors performed by those early settlers.

" Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield;
 Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has
 broke;
 How jocund did they drive their team
 a-field!
 How bowed the woods beneath their stately stroke."

The height of this hill as shown by barometer from each place indicated, is 1225 feet above the valley in Brookline and 1325 above the valley in Brattleboro. From West Hill may be seen not less than fifty townships lying in Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts; and the view in midsummer is unsurpassed by any in New England. On the west you can trace the line of the Green Mountains from Florida, Mass., on the south to Mt. Holly on the north, Saddleback, Haystack in Wilmington, Municknung in Stratton, and Shatterack, tower up above the Green Mountain ridge on the western boundary. The eye takes in the entire space of the Connecticut valley from Ascutney Mountain in Windsor on the north, to Mount Holyoke in Hadley, Mass. on the south. Farthest to the east is the majestic Monadnock. The highlands of New Hampshire are distinctly visible from Sunapee to Mount Holyoke, a distance of more than 80 miles. Wachusett in Princeton, Mass. with its cloud capped summit, may be seen far to the south east, and mountain tops and fertile valleys are visible all along the southern horizon. Connecticut river is plainly seen for 10 miles below Brattleboro', and West river is in sight winding its course past Black Mountain which rises 1150 feet above the surface of the water. The pen fails to describe the beauty of the landscape in every direction; and this article is brought to a close with the feeling that the reader has been given after all, but a vague idea of the view from the summit of Putney West Hill.

THE GREAT MEADOWS.

WRITTEN FOR PUTNEY HISTORY

IN THE VT. HIS. GAZ.

BY DAVID L. MANSFIELD.

Ten years of the Writer's early life were spent near the "Great Meadows in East Putney, which will account for the interest manifested by him in its history and settlement. The Meadow is located in the Connecticut River Valley and is overlooked from the east by a long range of high hills in Westmoreland, N. H. A similar range of Vermont hills extends along the western border, at the foot of which runs the highway in a northerly and southerly direction. A great bend in the river, beginning at Taylor's island on the northwest corner of the meadow, forms its boundary line, which is completed on the west side by the highway. The Vermont Valley Railroad passes across it in the west part parallel with the traveled road, and the Cheshire railroad is in plain view on the New Hampshire side. The meadow is about one mile across in a direct line from the west side to the eastern limit at the river, and contains 500 acres of rich alluvial soil which produces excellent crops. Its waving fields of corn and luxuriant vegetation, in midsummer, afford a fine view to the lover of natural scenery. In early times the lowest meadow lands were covered with a tangled growth of yellow pine, elm and butternut trees. This will explain why the fishing ground at the north end of the meadow is called "Butternut orchard," although no such trees are now standing near. The range of steep hills on the west was formerly covered with a fine growth of majestic white pines, nearly all of which have disappeared, and they are succeeded by a younger growth of the same kind. The lofty white pine is the glory of the American forest, yet the woodman spares it not. Here and there a tall pine or a stately elm may be seen standing alone and reminding us of the grandeur of the primeval forest. The first settlement in the town of Putney was made on the Great Meadow in 1742 or '43. Nehemiah How of Grafton, Mass., William Phipps, David Rugg of Lancaster and their families, with Robert Baker and others, made a clearing and built a fort in the central part of the meadow called Fort Hill. A settlement was also made on the opposite side of the river at No. 2, Westmoreland, during the same year. Daniel How, Thomas Crisson and others from Rutland, Mass., made a clearing and built log huts. As far back as 1736, Massachusetts held an undisputed right to the territory as far north as the present south line of Westmoreland, N. H., and claimed a good title to the country about 30 miles to the northward and to the east as far as the Merrimack river. Many persons were desirous of securing the rich meadow lands in that region, and accordingly petitioned the General Court, which voted Jan. 15, 1736, "That it was expedient to lay out four townships to be of the contents of 6 miles square, and not to extend more than 6 miles from the river." The grants lying on the east side of the river were numbered going up stream, as follows: No. 1, Chesterfield; No. 2, Westmoreland; No. 3, Walpole; No. 4, Charlestown. Those on the west side were numbered coming down the stream as follows: No. 1, Westminster; No. 2, Putney; No. 3, Dummerston; No. 4, Brattleboro. The township south of Brattleboro was called Hinsdale until 1802, when the name was changed to Vernon. Both Vernon and Hinsdale, N. H., formed one township when first chartered, Sept. 3, 1753. The charter was altered the same year, Sept. 26, and the grant was divided into two towns, both called Hinsdale. The line of separation was the west bank of Connecticut river. Previous to 1753 this tract of land was regarded as part of Northfield, but when the new state line was surveyed in March, 1741, it was cut off, and subsequently called the cut-off territory. Till the incorporation of Hinsdale in 1753, the people living on the cut off territory were styled in deeds and official documents, "of the northerly part of Northfield township above the line of the Massachusetts government." At the same session of the court, Jan. 15, 1736, two townships were laid out on the west side of the river south of the "Great Falls." Joseph Tisdale of Taunton was empowered to call a meeting of the proprietors of No. 1, Westminster; and Palmer Goulding of Worcester to call together the proprietors of No. 2, Putney. The first settlement in Westminster was made in 1739. During that year Richard Ellis and his son Reuben built a dwelling house (log hut) and broke up five or six acres of land. Seth Tisdale and John Barney were with them. John Kilburn, the first settler in Walpole, N. H., started from Weathersfield, Conn., in 1740, stopped in Northfield, Mass., with his family, where he was taxed in 1741, and then moved on to No. 3, Walpole. The settlers on the Great Meadow prospered well and in three years' time had gathered quite a stock of cattle. There is evidence to show that this settlement was not abandoned at the beginning of the French and Indian war in 1744, or during its progress. The General Court in Massachusetts passed an order April 23d, 1746, for raising 171 men to be sent to the western frontiers, and 93 more to be apportioned to various forts, the one at "Great Meadow" receiving two men. The first violence occasioned by the Indians in the Connecticut valley, in this war, was on the Great Meadow, July 5th, 1745. A party of Indians captured William Phipps, who was hoeing in his cornfield at the southwest corner of the meadow. He was taken about half a mile into the woods on the west by two Indians. One of them went back down the hill for something which he had left, trusting the prisoner in care of his comrade during his absence. Phipps, with a determination characteristic of early settlers, watched his chance, struck down his keeper with his hoe, snatched away his gun and shot dead the other Indian as he came back up the hill on his return. Having disabled the one he struck by chopping him with his hoe, he then started for the fort, but unfortunately met three other Indians who shot, killed and scalped him and otherwise mangled his body. Rev. Benjamin Doolittle, to whom the Indians gave an account of the attack, says in a pamphlet printed in 1750, that the Indian who was struck down by Phipps afterwards died of his wounds. He also states in his narrative of mischief done by the Indians in the French war, that the same, or some other party of Indians, came to a place called Upper Ashuelot, (Keene, N. H.) killed and scalped Dea. Josiah Fisher, as he was driving his cows to pasture, about half a mile from the garrison. This event happened July 10th, five days after the killing of Mr. Phipps. The French and Indians assaulted the fort on Great Meadow Oct. 11th, the same year. The party numbered about 80. They took Nehemiah How captive and killed David Rugg, both residents of Putney. How had been cutting wood about 40 rods from the fort, and was on his way back when he was seized, hurried off into a swamp, probably where the creek now is, and bound by his captors. They were seen and fired upon from the fort. One Indian was killed, another mortally wounded, and a third, who had hold of Mr. How, had a bullet shot through his powder horn. The guard at the fort, who was on the lookout at the time, told Dea. Noah Wright, he thought the number of the enemy that came in sight of the fort was about 50: when he first saw them there were eight of them stripped and without their guns, in pursuit of Mr. How. When he saw they would catch him, he turned, and with hands lifted up resigned himself into their hands. The enemy were in the meadow scarce an hour, including the attack on the fort and killing the cattle." The fort was not much damaged. The cattle were all killed and their hides and the best parts of the flesh carried away by the Indians. Rugg and Thomas Baker were coming down the river in a canoe and were met by the Indians just below "Taylor's island." Rugg was shot and scalped, but Baker escaped. As soon as the assault on the fort was known at Northfield, Ensign Stratton started with ten men for Fort Dummer. They were joined by others, and under command of Col. Josiah Willard started late at night for the Great Meadow, which they reached at 2 o'clock next morning. This was on Sunday. After gaining what information they could of the soldiers at the fort, they followed the enemy's track till near sunset, when they came to a place where the Indians had scattered in different directions. Next day they made further pursuit, but the enemy had disappeared, and Col. Willard returned with his company to Northfield, having inflicted no punishment upon the Indians.

Capt. Phineas Stevens of No. 4. [Charlestown, N. H.] marched at the head of 60 men, to the Great Meadow in Putney, Aug. 5, 1746, and remained during the 6th and 7th, guarding the people while they were reaping their grain. On the 8th, he returned with his men to No. 4, to find that the cattle, horses and most of the hogs of the settlers had been killed by the Indians during his absence. All the houses outside the fort were burned except one near the stockade, and 16 horses were killed that belonged to Capt. How's force.

The fort built on the site of the Col. White place inclosed 15 dwellings. The great gate of the fort was on the south side toward Connecticut river. On the N. E. and the S. W. corners of the fort, watch-towers were placed. In the summer time during the Indian war, the garrison besides the inhabitants usually consisted of ten or twelve men from New Hampshire. During the year 1755, Philip Alexander, John Perry,

John Averill, their wives and families, and Capt. Michael Gilson, a bachelor, his mother and his two sisters, were the only inhabitants. John Averill belonged to Westminster, but the place was so poorly protected at the beginning of the French and Indian war that he removed to Walpole with the other inhabitants of the town. There they remained with Col. Benjamin Bellows until October, following when they returned to Westminster. In February, following, the Averill family moved to Putney. The inhabitants of Westminster and Westmoreland, N. H., aided in building the fort for their mutual protection. When it was completed, Capt. David How, Thomas and Isaac Chamberlain, Joshua Warner and son, Daniel Warner wife and son, Harrison Wheeler, Deacon Samuel Minot, who afterwards married Capt. Gilson's mother, and Mr. Aldrich and son joined the garrison from Westmoreland. The son of Mr. Aldrich was afterwards Gen. George Aldrich. He died at Westmoreland in 1807. At the close of the French war, all who had removed from Westmoreland, returned, with the exception of Dea. Minot. William Willard joined the garrison in 1755. The father of Capt. Daniel How and the father of Harrison Wheeler died in the fort. Both were buried in Westmoreland. Religious services were held at the fort for a long time, and there Rev. Andrew Gardner, who had previously been chaplain and surgeon at Fort Dummer, preached nearly three years. Col. Josiah Willard owned the meadow, which was not more than half cleared at this time, and gave the use of the land as a consideration for building the fort and defending it during the war. The land was portioned out to each family and the inhabitants were accustomed to work in company for better protection in case of an attack from the enemy.

The widow of William Phipps married again in 1746. She was Jemima Sartwell, daughter of Josiah Sartwell, who built in 1739, Fort Sartwell. Her second husband was Caleb How, one of the grantees of Westmoreland when that town was chartered in 1752, and son of Nehemiah How, whose wife was Margaret Willard, daughter of Benjamin Willard. When Fort Bridgman was taken June 27, 1755, Caleb How was mortally wounded by the Indians and died next morning at Hinsdale fort, and was buried a short distance to the northeast of it, where his gravestones are still to be seen. His wife was captured when the fort was taken, and with her seven children carried to Canada. She was redeemed and brought home with three of her children by Col. Schuyler before 1760. Afterwards she went again to Canada and obtained her second daughter Submit Phipps, who married Nathan Willard, Nov. 22, 1775. Nehemiah How, Caleb's father, who was taken prisoner on the Great Meadow, was carried to Canada by way of Lake George and Crown Point, and died at Quebec May 25, 1747, leaving a journal of his captivity, which was printed, 1748. The town of Putney was chartered by New Hampshire Dec. 26, 1753, to Col. Josiah Willard and others, and rechartered by New York Nov. 6, 1766. South of the central part of the Great Meadow stands a marble monument erected to the memory of Prentice Willard, who died March 25, 1796, aged 47 years. He was probably a descendant of Col. Josiah Willard, and at one time was the owner of all the Great Meadow. By his own request he was buried on the spot where his lone monument now stands, which may be plainly seen by the traveller passing the meadow in the cars. In 1754, John Perry, Philip Alexander and Michael Gilson removed from Massachusetts and settled on the Great Meadow as their predecessors had done, and in the following year, 1755, in company with others who had lately arrived, built a fort in the southeast part of the meadow on the site of the house now standing and once occupied by Col. Thomas White. The fort was built of yellow pine timber, hewed six inches thick, and was about 16 feet high, 120 feet long and 80 wide. The houses were built within the enclosure against the wall of the fort with a roof slanting down from the top of this wall which formed the back of the houses, all of which fronted the hollow square in the centre of the fort, Philip Alexander did not move from Massachusetts directly to Putney. He belonged to a family of nine children, five sons and four daughters, and was born in Deerfield Sept. 29, 1712. He lived in Winchester, N. H., in 1743, and removed thence to Putney. It is stated that he lived in Westmoreland in 1755, which is doubtless a mistake. He was one of the grantees of that town when it was chartered Feb. 12, 1752. Michael Gilson, Jonathan Cole and John Rugg were among the number of grantees. Mr. Alexander had a family of six children of whom Philip, the youngest, was born Oct. 26, 1755, and was probably the first white child born in Putney. Joseph Alexander, [father of Philip, born 1712,] was born Oct. 16, 1681. He removed from Deerfield to Northfield about 1716; resided a few years in Winchester, N. H., 1737-43; again in Northfield 1748-58; soon after removed to Hadley, where he died Sept. 30, 1761. He was a soldier and captain at the sacking of Deerfield, Feb.

29, 1704, but made his escape the first night. His father had nine children, five sons and four daughters. John Alexander, the grandfather of Philip, was born July 25, 1645; was a settler in Northfield in 1673; returned to Northampton, where he died Dec. 31, 1733. His father, George Alexander, who also had a family of nine children, making three families of nine children each in as many successive generations, was born in Scotland, from which country his father, John Alexander, emigrated before 1644, and settled with his family in Windsor, Conn. George Alexander removed from Windsor to Northampton in 1655; was a settler in Northfield in 1673, and died May 5, 1703.

Probably Rev. Joseph Lord was the first resident preacher in Putney and lived in the east part of the town on the Great Meadow, as the place where Putney street now stands was not settled till 1764, when Joshua Parker made a settlement there on Sackett's brook, which passes through the village. Rev. Joseph Lord was born about 1704; graduated at Harvard College, 1726; lived in Hatfield 1733; was one of the original settlers of Athol, "who sat down in the forest there," Sept. 1735. He was for many years the leading man in the settlement; being the first preacher, first magistrate, first proprietor's clerk, first treasurer, first surveyor, and first tax-gatherer. In 1755, Col. Ebenezer Hinsdale paid him £3.6s. 10d. (11.07 par value) for preaching four Sundays at Hinsdale. In 1759, he removed to Putney, and later to Westmoreland; was judge of the Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland county (which includes what is now Windham county) and in high favor with the king's party before the Revolution. He died Dec. 7, 1778. There were seven children in his family. Sarah Lord, the youngest, married July 21, 1763, Judge Thomas Chandler of Vermont, who was elected to the bench of the Supreme Court in October, 1778. Joseph Lord, (the father of Joseph, born about 1704,) was also a minister. He was born June 23, 1672; graduated at Harvard College 1691; was a preacher at Dorchester, S. C., for 20 years; was the first minister of Chatham, Mass., where he was ordained and the church organized 1720, and where he remained till his death in 1748. Thomas Lord, the grandfather, was born in 1633; a resident of Charlestown; died June 4, 1713. The great grandfather, Robert Lord, lived in Ipswich, Mass.; was representative in 1638; town clerk, clerk of the courts and register of deeds. He died in 1658.

REV. AMOS FOSTER.

BY HENRY M. GROUT, D.D.

OF CONCORD, MASS.

Amos Foster, the son of Richard and Esther Jewell, was born in Salisbury, N. H., March 30, 1797, fifteen years after the birth of Daniel Webster in the same town. Richard Jr., an elder half-brother, was remarkable for mental vigor and moral worth, and as an old time farmer who, with limited means, raised a family of wide awake boys, seven of whom graduated from Dartmouth College, and six of whom — Eden Burroughs, William Cowper, Daniel Davis, Roswell and Richard Baxter — found their way into the Christian Ministry, as in turn have several of their sons. A younger brother, Benjamin F, graduated from Amherst College, entered the ministry, and had useful settlements in Salisbury, N. H., and Dummerston, Vt., where he is still remembered as an unassuming and genial man, a writer of unusual felicity and force, and a preacher and pastor always faithful, sympathetic and beloved.

Amos was about a year old when his parents removed to Hanover in the same state. And it was there, not far distant from Dartmouth College, that he grew up. Baptized in infancy and religiously trained at home, he was converted during a religious revival at the age of eighteen; and soon after, the first Sabbath in January 1816, connected himself with the Congregational church at Hanover Center.

The next two years were spent at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, whence he went to Dartmouth College to graduate in 1822. With the ministry in view, he had no sooner graduated than he gave himself to the study of theology; retaining for that purpose his connection with the College, and together with a number of other graduates enjoying the instruction of President Tyler and Professor Shurtleff. Two years were thus consumed, though he was licensed to preach, by the Windsor Association at Norwich, Vt., February 1824. His first sermon was preached, the very Sabbath after receiving license, in his own church at Hanover.

His first settlement was at Canaan, which joins Hanover on the east, and was at that time a thriving center of trade for the surrounding country. During the twenty-two years of its previous history the Congregational church in that place had never had a settled pastor; and the people gave to him a cordial welcome. He was ordained Mar. 2, 1825, the sermon being preached by President Tyler, very soon after his ordination, June 29, 1825, he was uni-

ed in marriage to Harriet Amelia, daughter of Rev. Broughton and Ruth Sabin White, then of Washington in the same state. His ministry in Canaan was happy and prosperous; lasting nearly 8 years, or nearly 9, counting from the time of his first preaching there. But his salary was meager, $400 and no parsonage, and that was not always fully paid. Accordingly, when the church in Putney invited him to its pastorate, with an offer of a salary of $450, and parsonage, the invitation was interpreted as a call of Providence, and in due time accepted.

His installation in Putney occurred Feb. 13, 1833. The sermon was preached by Rev. Phineas Cooke, then of Lebanon, N. H., on account of his influence and stature, known as the high priest of New Hampshire. At that time Putney had a larger population than it now has; and much of this was on its greatly deserted hill sides. The Meeting-house stood at the upper end of the village, half a mile north of the present edifice; and the house, into which he soon moved, was a few rods north of that, and has continued to be his home during all the subsequent years of his residence in the town.

The first months of his ministry in Putney were marked by revival, and a number of similar seasons were enjoyed during the years which followed. At the time of his installation, such men as Judge White, Dea. Reynolds and Dea. Taft, were leaders in the church. James and Mark Crawford and Isaac Grout were among the subjects of the first revival. The church was one of the strongest in the county, having a membership of not less than two hundred.

To the duties of this new field, he gave himself with ardor, teaching in the Sunday School as well as preaching in the pulpit and visiting the people at their homes. He loved his people, and his affection for them was warmly reciprocated. Soon after his settlement the meeting-house was removed to its present location; a change which naturally involved discussion and differences of opinion; but he had the somewhat rare wisdom and grace to leave all that to the wise heads of the leaders of the flock. Then came the demoralizing movement of 80 called perfectionism, under the leadership of Mr. John Noyes. A graduate from Dartmouth College, Mr. Noyes had studied theology at Andover and New Haven; but the opinions he adopted and taught, and the practices he defended, were not simply fanatical but grossly immoral. Arrested for a high misdemeanor and put under heavy bonds, he confessed the crime charged against him by forfeiting his bonds and fleeing the state. Of his subsequent career at Oneida, N. Y., the world has sufficient knowledge. Through all, Mr. Foster was the wise leader and counsellor of the church in its prompt and firm treatment of this most blighting heresy.

At the end of twenty years, Mr. Foster was called to the church in Ludlow, Vt.; a call which was supported by such good reasons, having to do with his health and the pecuniary needs of a growing family, it seemed to be his duty to accept it. His stay in Ludlow was, however, not long. The business failure of his largest supporters soon compelled another removal; which this time was to Acworth N. H. His ministry at Ludlow lasted about three years, and that at Acworth about nine. At Ludlow the little church on the hill was always filled, the prayer-meeting full of life, and his work most happy, and not unfruitful. At Acworth he had a people staunch in principle and forcible in character. The church has been one of the strongest in the state. It gave to him a better support than he had ever before received. He was never happier, nor did he ever anywhere form warmer attachments, than at these two places. But the field at Acworth was wide, and demanded physical vigor for its proper cultivation which, at sixty-eight, he felt that he did not enjoy. And having a home in Putney, he decided that it was best to return to the place where it had always been his desire to end his days.

His return to Putney was in the autumn of 1865. During the eleven and a half years of his absence from them, his former flock in that place had had a succession of short pastorates, and was now without a shepherd. He was at once asked to resume labor among them. To this he consented, but was never again installed. For seven years he served them as their "stated supply," doing the work and taking all the interest of a state pastor. He was never more earnest or useful than during these last years. Two seasons of revival renewed the courage and increased the strength of the church. Old and young gathered about him with the old time confidence and affection. But in 1872 it seemed to be time to lay off the harness, and retire from active responsible service; and to this the people gave reluctant consent. He was now in the 76th year of his age, and had wrought in the ministry 40 years. Of these nearly 28 years had been spent in the service of the church in Putney.

In ceasing from his stated ministry, Mr. Foster did not cease to be interested in the work to which his life had been given. Several of his last winters were spent with his youngest daughter, in Concord, Mass. But whether there, or among his own former people in Putney, he was always welcome in the pulpit, and loved to be there. More than once after he had reached his 87th year he was invited to preach, and performed the service with remarkable animation and ease.

Mr. Foster was in the best sense a successful minister. During his ministry in Canaan 67 persons were received into the church and 197 members to the church in Putney during his first settlement there, at Ludlow 15 and 30 at Acworth, and 45 during his second ministry in Putney; in all, 347. He never made a large use of the press; but was an occasional contributor to secular and religious newspapers, and published three sermons: A THANKSGIVING DISCOURSE, preached at Canaan Nov. 29, 1827; A SERMON TO YOUNG MEN, preached at Putney Feb. 28, 1836; and AN ORDINATION SERMON at the ordination of the late Rev. Dr. E. B. Foster, his nephew, at Henniker, N. H. He also preached on six other ordination and installation occasions, and the Commission sermon at the General Convention of the churches of Vermont, at Manchester, in 1842.

Mr. Foster's worth and power for usefulness did not center in any single talent or quality, towering above the rest, but rather in an admirable balance of many in which few surpassed him. More than some others he was an ethical preacher, dwelling much on religious duties and Christian graces; but, in the best sense, he was also a doctrinal preacher, delighting to emphasize the truth of God's free grace to perishing men. He had a remarkably pleasing voice; clear, mellow and musical. His manner was animated, by turns solemn and tender. He withheld no part of the truth: when he warned men, it was with tears.

His sympathetic nature made his services specially acceptable on occasions either of sorrow or of joy. The whole number of funerals at which he officiated was 739; and of weddings 378.

An old lady once paid him the compliment of being "dreadful neat at funerals." He never excused himself from any kind of service because of the labor or the expense it might involve. When he was sent for to go some miles out of the state to conduct a funeral he went; and when the man who had sent for him, instead of offering to pay for the conveyance which had brought him, said, "I thank you for coming so far to bury my wife, and should be glad to return the favor," Mr. Foster answered that the man was welcome to the service, and need not trouble himself to return the favor.

One secret of his success in his work was his interest in the young. Among them he was always happy, and to them he gave much of his best thought and strength. They were never repelled by any coldness in his manner, but were drawn by his cordial tones and kindly words.

Mr. Foster was happy in his home, and loved by his children. He owed much to his wife, who did him good and not evil all the days of her life. She was a descendant of Judge Sabin, a prominent figure in the exciting scenes of early Vermont history. From both her parents she inherited energy, firmness, mental quickness, and expertness at whatever she had occasion to put her hands. But for her wisdom, skill and ordinarily good health, the family could never have thriven as it did. She was a model minister's wife; a wise, patient affectionate mother. "Her children arise up, and call her blessed: her husband also, he praiseth her."

THEIR GOLDEN WEDDING.

In June 1875, Mr. and Mrs. Foster kept their golden wedding. It was a gala day for the town, as well as the family; for it was first of all a town celebration, though all the churches with which Mr. Foster had been connected participated in it. The town hall, where public exercises were held, was decorated with wreaths and flowers, the village band discoursed lively music, neighboring ministers and friends from a distance helped at the speech-making, and there were poems and songs and laughter and tears, and gifts in gold and silver amounting to more than he had ever received for any single year's salary, and last of all the banquet for which the good ladies of Putney had done their best, and that was well indeed.

Mrs. Foster survived the scenes of this day 7 years and 4 months. She passed peacefully away, Oct. 13, 1882. At the time of this writing Mr. Foster still waits in the now lonely house, into which they moved fifty years ago, in serene anticipation of the time when he shall be permitted to follow on.

Jan. 1884.

[During the last sickness of Rev. Mr. Foster, Dr. Grout, kindly volunteered to finish reading the proof of Mr. Foster's papers in this work, which he has done. The above, we have thought well to give as written, so little time before Mr. Foster's death. At our request, to Dr. Grout, first, as the biographist of Mr. Foster, for the completion of his sketch, he thus completed the paper he had already given,—next column: We have also, a few papers from others we will add after we have closed the Doctor's paper:—Ed.]

Mr. Foster lived nearly two years longer. His last months were spent in reviewing and completing his history of Putney for the Gazetteer. But he was not permitted to see more than its first pages in its printed form. He died in Putney, Sept. 22, 1884, aged 89 years, 5 months and 22 days.

A biographical sketch of his life, written by the author of this article appeared a few weeks after.

October. 1884.

[We will open our additional papers for Mr. Foster with a selection from his manuscript sermons. In over 4000 pp. of the work now printed, we have given but three sermons: "The Ox Sermon" of Mr. Merrill, Peacham, the famous temperance tract—made into—of which more than 2,000,000 copies were published; Mr. Lord's dedication sermon of Bethany church, his crowning life work in the history of Montpelier, and Dr. Shelton's Historical Sermon in the same; but when any of our town historians has been a minister fifty years, we will give a specimen from his sermons. We have selected the funeral sermon of the Hon. Reuben Washburn who was raised in Putney, a copy of which has been furnished by Miss Hannah Maria Washburn.]

THE SERMON OF MR. FOSTER AT THE FUNERAL OF JUDGE WASHBURN.

APR. 26, 1860.

"I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil." John xvii. 15.

This is a part of the prayer which our Lord offered for his disciples just before his crucifixion. No language could better express his concern for them than that which he uses on this occasion,

They were about to be thrown dependent and helpless into the midst of their enemies. Every kind of opposition would be raised against them. Various means would be resorted to and perseveringly used to destroy their influence and bring ruin upon the cause they had espoused.

Therefore, to prepare them for the bitterness of separation, and to meet the various evils which awaited them, Christ gave them his parting counsels, and affectionately commended them to the care and protection of their Heavenly Father. They would greatly need Divine support; for the world had already begun to hate them on account of their attachment to Christ and their zeal in defending his religion: and they would be still more persecuted, because they were no longer of the character or party of the rest of the world who rejected and despised their Savior.

It is to be noticed, Christ did not pray that his followers might be taken out of the world, although this would have been much better for them as individuals. Immediately to be delivered from the trials and persecutions which awaited them and ascend to glory with their Lord, would have been a great privilege. But there were important reasons why it was desirable for them to remain a while longer in this world. Their residence on earth was connected with a system of means by which the purposes of Infinite Benevolence were to be accomplished. The gospel was not yet promulgated; its efficacy not yet tasted; its benefits not largely enjoyed. It was needful, therefore, that they should remain longer on earth, that the influence of their pious example might be felt; the efficacy of their prayers experienced; and that, by their means the holy gospel which they were afterwards commissioned to preach to all nations might be spread abroad.

It is doubtless true, that if each christian successively as he is converted were at once taken to heaven, it would be to his individual advantage. He would escape many evils which he is otherwise called to meet. But, as regards the general interests of religion and the welfare of mankind, it is of importance for Christians to remain a time in this world. Their own final salvation is not the only end of their conversion. Other important purposes are to be accomplished in connection therewith. They are brought into the kingdom to be the means of good to their fellow-men; to be co-workers with God in promoting the interests of his kingdom.

Without pretending to exhaust the subject, I propose to state some of the reasons why the continuance of good men in this world is desirable.

1. That vital godliness may be maintained. Mankind have ever been prone to degeneracy. This was the case with God's ancient people. How did he throw up entrenchments on every side to preserve the true religion among them. What vigilance on the part of their Prophets was necessary to keep them from the contaminating influence of the surrounding nations. And yet, how often did they depart from God. Into what degeneracy did they at length fall.

The same propensity is characteristic of every age. And to what result would it lead, were none of the truly pious left on earth to counteract it? True religion would soon die away; its doctrines would lose their hold on the affections of men; the bible itself would be thrust aside; and the last gleam of its light would be extinguished.

To the church is committed in a peculiar sense the responsible trust of preserving the word of God,—the record of his dealings with men,—the source whence we derive our knowledge concerning the way of salvation,—the chart of the Christian's hope,—the Fountain from which he draws his sweetest consolations. Let the church become extinct, or, let all good men be removed out of the world, and what would become of this sacred deposit? Who would give the scriptures circulation? Who would advocate the doctrines of the bible? Who would observe the ordinances of Divine Worship? Who would pray? Who would perform deeds of active piety? These things would not be done. The bible would become an obsolete, neglected book. The Sabbath and all outward religious observances would cease. The doctrines of religion would be exploded, and vital piety entirely disappear!

2. The continuances of good men in this world is desirable, because of the influence arising from a pious example. Men are creatures of imitation; and it is impossible for us to estimate the moral power they exert over each other in the various relations of life. They are thus mutually helping form each other's character, making each other more intelligent, virtuous, and useful, or the reverse. What an influence goes out from the daily and hourly example of parents. How strong the impressions which children early receive from that example. If it be radiant with deeds of piety, those impressions are favorable to the formation of a similar character in them. Let us acquaint ourselves with the early life of the most pious and useful men who adorn the Christian church, and we shall find that the moral influence exerted on them under the paternal roof was, in most cases, of the best kind. They were taught their relations to God, as moral and accountable beings. The importance of religion was urged upon their attention, and its excellences portrayed by an example corresponding with its precepts.

Such an influence as this must be felt; and it is felt, whether we consider its operations as confined to the family, or extended to the neighborhood or of the town.

It is sometimes the case, that a Christian example borrows power from the position of him who exhibits it. The consideration that men of high position and commanding influence in society have embraced religion has, doubtless, led others to examine its claims, and been the means of their conversion. If the child who is accustomed to look up to a parent with confidence and respect, is influenced by that parent in regard to his opinions and practices; so will those be influenced by the religious example of men of high standing to whom they are accustomed to look with deference.

On this principle, therefore, Christians by the exhibition of a pious example will exert a favorable influence on those around them. Others will read the bible, because their Christian friends read it; they will attend public worship, because their pious neighbors go; they will sympathize in a certain degree with serious people with whom they converse and are on terms of friendly intercourse. Thus, on the mere principle of imitation men receive many important shades to their moral character from the example of piety which they daily behold.

Such an example, however, will operate still more favorably to religion through the lovely traits of character which it exhibits. The attributes of the Christian fully and clearly developed present the most interesting character that can be exhibited. For proof of this, I need only ask you to look at the character of Jesus Christ. That was a perfect character,—the model of every excellence,—the pattern of every virtue. Contemplate the beautiful moral traits exhibited by him. Behold the assemblage of virtues that shone forth from his life. What eye is so blind as not to see them?

In the same degree in which those traits are exhibited by the humblest and most obscure of his disciples, will they now be admired by all who behold them. The exhibition of moral excellences, seen and admired as they appear in the life of any one of the followers of Jesus, must carry conviction to the mind of the beholder of the value of the principles from which they spring, and which, in their practical tendency, produce effects so desirable.

Such an example will, moreover, operate as a restraint upon the wicked. The consistent Christian will command respect. As much as wicked men sometimes slander and abuse him; as much as they profess to despise him;—if his deportment is such as it should be,—if he lives agreeably with his holy profession, always exhibiting the spirit of the gospel in his conduct and conversation, they will honor and respect him. Their judgment and conscience are on his side. The very presence of such a man strikes the mind of the wicked with a kind of awe. The mouth of the blasphemer is closed before him. The drunkard and reveller shrink away from his sight. The despiser of religion is abashed in his presence; for in him its excellency is seen. The life and conversation of the devoted Christian is a standing reproof to wicked men.

3. The continuance of good men in this world is desirable, in order that, by their piety, they may save it from the judgment of heaven. 'These have been sent upon communities and nations according as wickedness has prevailed, where that wickedness has not been counteracted in its effects by the piety of good men. Why was the old world destroyed by a flood! Because the wickedness of men became so great, and there was not piety enough to avert that terrible calamity. Why were Sodom and Gomorrah destroyed by fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven? Because the cry of their sin came up before God, and there were not ten righteous persons whose prayers might have saved them from the impending destruction.

History records the infliction of severe judgments upon nations and communities in more modern times. We are not warranted in scripture that they were sent with a special design to punish those nations and communities for their sins, because there was not moral goodness enough to prevent it. But, from the analogy of God's dealings with nations in other times, we may thus judge.

The principles, by which God regulates his dealings with mankind are the same in every age. Formerly, He punished nations for their wickedness, when there were not righteous men enough to avert the evil, and spared them when there were. Why then may we not conclude it is so now?

There is wickedness enough in the world to procure its destruction. Why has it not been destroyed? Why has not God poured out upon the earth the vial of his wrath? Because the cries of his people have come up before him, and prevented. Were the last saint of God removed to heaven, and the last breath of prayer spent, it seems to me, the world would not long survive. It must sink beneath the weight of its own iniquities.

We sometimes read of battles and victories, and like others often ascribe them to the superior valor and generalship of those in whose favor the tide of battle turns. But we are liable to misjudge. The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. More commonly, the cause of success lies out of view. God is always the direct controlling Agent. How often is this forgotten. There are other secret agencies and influences such as the piety, and prayers, and faith of Christians. To these God has respect; and for the sake of the sixty, the forty, the thirty, the twenty, and even the ten. He spares the city otherwise doomed to destruction.

Alarming apprehensions sometimes come over us, in regard to the future of our own country, and in view of the "impending crisis," we look around in amazement, and inquire, "Whence will help come?"

Talk we of patriotism—of wise legislation—of the expedients of statesmen—of the intelligence of the people? Do we put our trust in wealth? the number of our people, and our power, both by land and by sea? What is patriotism? What is wise legislation? What, the expedients of statesmen? What, intelligence? What is wealth and power? What are all of them combined without religion? Of one thing we may be sure—If religious principle goes down in our country, our free Institutions will go down with it. If the judgments of heaven are averted from our land, we shall owe it under God, to the faith, the piety and prayers of good men.

4. The continuance of good men in this world is desirable, that they may exert an agency in promoting the interests of Christ's kingdom. God has revealed to us the fact, that He has great and glorious purposes to be accomplished; certain plans to be carried out, involving the highest interest of his people. But how is this to be done? We know how it might be done. God, of his own pleasure, independent of any human agency, would with perfect ease accomplish all his stupendous designs.

But he does not see fit to take this course. He chooses to make use of human instrumentality for this purpose. He calls men into his service, and permits them to be co-workers with himself in the upbuilding of Zion. However desirable it might be for them to go at once to Heaven, and be with Christ; yet to the benevolent mind, it is also desirable to do something for the promotion of Christ's kingdom and the welfare of men. Although God could accomplish all his purposes without the use of means, yet he never will. It should never be forgotten, that it is thro' human means this work is to be done. And who are to be employed as instruments? Are they those who have no heart for the work of the Lord. Sometimes they are made the indirect means of promoting the interests of religion. But this is not the object of their labors and efforts. It does not absorb their desires and urge them on to action.

We might ask here, where are those great plans originated which contemplate the conversion and salvation of the world? Who are they, that contribute of their substance for the spread of the gospel? Who are they, that use a direct influence to bring men to a knowledge of the truth? Are we not to seek an answer to these questions by a reference to christians? Are they not the agents by whom the wheels of benevolent effort and Christian enterprize are rolled forward?

Let every good man, therefore, be taken from this world, and the moral machinery now in operation, by which so much has been done and more is promised, towards the conversion of the whole world to Christ, would at once stop. Who would be left to keep alive the benevolent societies now in existence? Who would sustain the Christian seminaries of learning in our land? Who would give circulation to the bible? Who would distribute tracts? Who would maintain the Sabbath school,—that institution, blessed of heaven, which has done so much for the rising generation, and for the world? Whose heart, burning with love for souls, and with strong desires for the salvation of the heathen, would lead him to sacrifice home and country, and much else that is dear of an earthly nature, that he might carry the light of the gospel to those who “sit in darkness and in the shadow of death!” Who would pray for the success of missions, and by other means urge on the work of the world’s conversion? Who would there be to promote the cause of temperance, or any of those objects of moral reform, so dear to the Christian heart? These things would not be done, were there no good men on earth to do them!

From the preceding views we learn, 1st, What is the true mission of Christians to this world. Their own ultimate salvation is not the only object for which they were brought into the kingdom, and for which they should labor. Other interests of vast moment are to be promoted in connection with that work of the spirit of God. Our Saviour has denominated his disciples the “salt of the earth, and the light of the world.” And he prayed that they “might not be taken out of the world, but that they might be kept from the evil,” intimating, that for some important purpose, it was necessary they should have a dwelling-place on earth. If valuable purposes were to be answered by the continuance of the early disciples in this world, valuable purposes are to be answered by the continuance of Christians in the world now.

And the same reasons which render it needful why any Christians should live, render it needful for you to live. As Christians, you have much to do. It is for you to maintain the worship of God pure, to preserve true religion, to exhibit a pious example before men, one worthy of their imitation. It is for you to illustrate before the world by a holy conversation the principles of the religion you profess, so to live as to make its excellence appear. It is for you to offer prayer to God for the conversion of your fellow men. It is for you to maintain the institutions of the gospel; to sustain and carry forward those plans of benevolence which contemplate the removal of the moral darkness which overshadows the earth, and the ushering in of the light of day upon the world! How great the work before you. How important the mission of Christians to this world.

2. The weakest and most obscure may be exerting an influence for good of which they are not aware. We sometimes hear Christians who think they have outlived their usefulness, wondering why they are spared; and seeing nothing in this world which should create a wish in them to remain, they choose rather to depart.

Now such may altogether misjudge. It is certain, that if it were not needful for them to remain in the world, God would take them out of it; for, when he has nothing more for his children to do here, he removes them to another sphere of activity. And besides; they may not be aware of the good of which they are instrumental. Have they piety at heart? Are they the lovers of God? Do they fear and worship Him? Do they pray? Then, they are doing good. They are exerting a healthful moral influence on all about them. No matter how obscure, how unknown they are to men. God regards their piety and their prayers, and on their account he averts his judgments and sends down blessings upon men.

3. It is not intended, however, by anything said in this discourse, that this world is to be the everlasting home of good men. God has prepared better things for them than can be found on earth. Their eternal inheritance lies beyond the limits of mortality. In order, therefore, to enter upon the possession of it, they must pass through the change which we call "death." And, from the beginning, God has thus been taking them away from the world, and introducing them to the realities of another, transferring them from earth to heaven. It is interesting to trace the long line of worthies who have lived and acted their several parts in the cause of truth and righteousness, and, at length, been dismissed from service here, and gone up to receive their reward on high. This process is agreeable to the Divine plan, and will continue to go on till the whole company of the redeemed shall be gathered into heaven. Our blessed Lord said to the sorrowing disciples, and the same is true in respect to every good man, "I go to prepare a place for you; And if I go and prepare a place for you. I will come again and receive you to myself that where I am, there ye may be also." This is said of the very men, concerning whom Christ prayed, that they might not be taken out of the world. Tho' they were to remain here awhile, they were not to remain always. There is a moral fitness in the Divine arrangement in this regard. Pious men are the subjects of Christ's kingdom, and it is suitable that they should be near him, and behold his glory. So then after having passed through their term of service and of discipline He, their Lord, comes and transfers them to that blissful state, where they find every thing adapted to their purified and exalted natures.

One by one, they are called for; and at Christ's bidding, go from earth and enter upon their reward in heaven. This is according to the design of God in their conversion. They are to be made meet, that is, qualified or prepared, to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. There is a sense in which that inheritance is to be possessed by Christ and his people in common. They enjoy a joint heirship to it. He is the first born among many brethren; and is not ashamed to call them brethren. Having had fellowship in suffering, they will have fellowship in glory.

4. The subject suggests the chief reason for mourning, when good men die. It is not on their own account. They make a happy exchange. They make a blessed exchange. They go to be with Christ in Heaven; and "We should ill requite them to constrain

Their unbound spirits into bonds again"

It is not merely on account of Christian friends who survive. I do not mean that such may not mourn, when loved ones bid them adieu. How can it be otherwise. We should be wanting in the common sensibilities of our nature, were all tender emotions suppressed, when called to close the eyes of those who had been our bosom companions, the guardians and counsellors of our youth, our daily associates in the common pursuits of life, in religious duty, in those domestic and social joys which had gladdened our hearts by the way. It would not be well to suppress them. Jesus mingled his tears with the tears of the mourning sisters at Bethany. And then, too, the due indulgence of such emotions has a good moral effect. "By the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better." We learn how to sympathize with the suffering and are more ready to relieve them. And yet, as deeply as we may feel the temporary separation, we need not regret it over-much, for it is but temporary. Soon indeed, will our work on earth be ended; and if found ready, we shall then enjoy a happy re-union with those who have preceded us, on the shores of a blessed eternity!

But the chief reason for mourning when good men die is the fact, that their direct influence for good ceases to be felt. Their removal is a loss to the world. God has, indeed, a service for them in heaven; they move, no doubt, in an enlarged sphere of usefulness. But their labors on earth have ended. The light of their example is extinguished. Their prayers have ceased. Their endeavors to suppress vice, to promote intelligence, morality and piety among men have closed. They are not here, as once they were, to encourage by their counsels, their prayers, and their active co-operation, those pious and benevolent enterprises which contemplate the removal of all those evils that afflict our race, and the establishment of righteousness and peace through the world.

It is true, their memories do not perish with their bodies. They are cherished in the affectionate recollection of the living. Thus, they exert an post-humous influence beneficial to survivors.

But their presence is not felt in the domestic and social circles, and in the still wider relations in which they had moved. We hear not their voice lifted up in prayer, or their pious expostulation with wrong-doers, or in tones of approval and encouragement to those who do well. They mingle not with us in the devotions of the Sanctuary. The places which once knew them know them no more. Look for them which way we will, we find them not. A sense of vacancy, of a loss, comes over us, painful to the heart.

Truly, in view of the removal of such, we may say, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men." Such cause of mourning have this community in view of the death of some whose names are fragrant with worthy deeds, and will long live in the grateful recollection of those who survive. They were such as could ill be spared; for they were the friends and patrons of learning, morality and religion. We might have prayed that, if it could have so pleased God, He would not take them out of the world, but permit them still longer to remain among us, not for their own sake, but for the sake of society, the church, and the world.

Among the men whose influence for good has long been felt in this place, and whose removal must be deemed a public loss, is the venerable man who has just bidden us adieu.

Judge Washburn was a descendant of a pious ancestry, and was early instructed in the doctrines and precepts of our holy religion. He was born in Leicester, Mass., Dec. 30, 1781, was graduated at Dartmouth College in 1808. Studied law in Boston, and admitted to the Bar at the age of 28. In early life he made a public profession of faith in Christ, and was ever the steadfast friend of Religious institutions. He was an associate and lover of wise and good men

His ideas of a civil government were those entertained by Washington, Adams, and other political worthies whose memory posterity will never cease to honor. Of the grand principles which form the basis of our free institutions, he was an unflinching advocate. To show the confidence reposed in him by the public, I need only refer to the fact, that he occupied a place on the Bench and in the Halls of Legislation. Various other offices of trust were at different times committed to his hands by his fellow citizens: in all which relations he demeaned himself with uprightness and integrity. He was a friend and patron of learning; and to him this community owe a debt of gratitude, as the principal agent in procuring the chartering and establishment of Black River Academy; an institution that has done much in training the young for positions of usefulness and respectability.

From my first acquaintance with the deceased more than twenty years ago, I have ranked him among my true friends. And I regard it as a singular coincidence, that I officiated at the funeral of his father, step-mother, two aunts, two cousins, and a brother-in-law—all, parishioners of my own; also, at the funeral of a brother, in Proctorsville; and now at his own; and I feel a melancholy pleasure in being present, at his own particular request, on this occasion, and paying this feeble tribute to his memory.

TO THE MOURNERS:

I cannot forbear saying to these afflicted relatives, it was with deep sorrow I received the intelligence of the removal of this Husband, Father, and Friend. The sympathies of my heart at once clustered around you, and my prayer was, and is, that you may enjoy the sustaining grace of God. Precious promises are to those who like you are called to drink the cup of sorrow. Accept these promises, and derive from them the comfort they are designed to impart. God spared your friend to a good old age; and the Providence that took him away is as wise, and as much to be adored, as the Providence that continued him to you so long. You mourn his removal; but not as those who mourn without hope.

If he had accomplished his mission to this world, it was as fit that he should leave it, as it was that he should remain in it, during the will of the Master; and the Christian spirit teaches you to say, in view of the loss you sustain, "The will of the Lord be done."

May the good Lord support you under your bereavement, and prepare you for your own departure hence.

This providence impresses a lesson on all our hearts, which alas, we are too slow to learn.

May we not turn a deaf ear to the voice which now admonishes us.

My beloved Friends—I need not remind you that we live in a world of change, of sorrow, and of death. This truth has often been illustrated in your own experience; and it has found a lodging in the deep places of your own hearts; and scarcely ever did I feel it more sensibly than to-day.

I behold affecting manifestations of it in the tears of sorrow-stricken survivors, who can tell of sons and daughters, brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, whose presence but lately blessed their domestic circles.

But, alas, their sun has found its setting; and what a shadow has it cast around those hearth-stones once made cheerful by their presence.

When you recur to them now, your thoughts do not take you to their own once happy homes on earth; but they gather around the gloomy grave, where your own hands have laid them, and where you have shed your tears, and sent forth your prayers.

But I come not to open anew the wound which affliction has made; but rather to apply, if I may, the soothing balm. I come as a brother and a friend to express the sympathy I feel in your sorrows, and to re-assure you, that however other relations call me away, I am still one of you, taking a part both in your joys and in your griefs, and to speak to you those words of holy comfort with which the blessed Master has taught us to comfort one another in our distress.

Let me say, then, though the loved ones who were once with you are now sleeping the sleep of death, they have not lost their conscious being. It is the body only that dies. The spirit lives in its disembodied state, far beyond the ills of mortality; awaiting the resurrection morn, when their now lifeless forms shall be restored and reproduced, and made spiritual and immortal, like unto Christ's glorious body.

And to you, in this time of your sorrow, God says, "I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward."

Although beloved friends leave you, He never does. How much reason, therefore, have you to trust in him. For, "He maketh sore, and bindeth up; He woundeth, and His hands make whole." "He shall deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven, there shall no evil touch thee." "He knoweth the way that you take; and when He hath tried you, you shall come forth as gold."

REV. MR. BECKLEY'S FUNERAL SERMON.

Mr. Foster preached the funeral sermon of Rev. Hosea Beckley, the early historian of Vermont. See Beckley, Mansfield's History of Danvers.

MR FOSTER'S HISTORY OF PUTNEY was written some 12 years since. He reviewed it during the past year. Returning the Ms., Apr. 10, 1884, he, in his letter, states:

"It is mostly the same as I had before sent you. There are some changes and additions, you will understand. It is your privilege to make any corrections you please."

An admission which comes so gracefully from a good writer, an editor can hardly find it in his heart to cut that man's paper down. Mr. Foster's history, as the Writer every way merited, has been as fully given as it came.

One of the chief additions in the revision was the extensive list of deaths of the old people, of Putney, which is we believe, the largest one any historian for his town in the State, has furnished, as yet: and he had the satisfaction before his death, at least to know his Town had given for their History to the Gazetteer the largest subscription that has ever been given by any town, exceeding even that of Montpelier for her History. We are proud of Putney; he must have been, more than we.

A FEW NOTES FROM LAST LETTERS:

May 19th.

 As I was expecting to leave town for the summer, I was desirous of expressing my heartfelt thankfulness for the many manifestations of your kindness and good-will during the years of our acquaintance, and also, my earnest desires for your prosperity in completing the worthy object you have in view.

* * Mr. Mansfield [Emery] informs me he has obtained 300 names. [Since Mr. Foster's death the list has risen to 350.]

"Be assured of my kind regards and best wishes. I have always been interested in the work on your hands."

June, 11th. * * * thank you for some of the Dummerston prff's. It would be a real pleasure to me if I could help you as Mr. Mansfield does. Inform me, if I can be of any help to you in your important work."

July 15th. * * * Perhaps you consider it not necessary to send the proofs; if so all right." [All was right with him.]

Later, on his last finished paper — of Nathan Sargeant, "It is very difficult gathering facts, concerning former generations; the early acquaintances are nearly all gone."

Aug. 18th. * * * After my return to Putney, I will have ample time to assist you all that will be necessary. * * The Lord bless you and give you health and strength for the work in your hands."

Sept. 8th. : Still at work. "I will soon send a short account of the Hon. John Noyes, who for several years was a prominent citizen of Putney." This, he proposed for his last paper; but did not live to finish and send it.

Two more letters: the next is touching. He was gratified at last to see his town entered in press. He read, corrected well, and returned the first 8 pages, the second 8, corrected, but did not return as the first; calling for them, we received them and the following letter:

* * * I ought to have sent the inclosed before; but I had put them away in a safe place, and they were entirely forgotten. Please, pardon my neglect and other faults of my old age."

Mr. Foster's last letter, probably, he ever penned, just a week before he died:

"Friday morning — Please excuse, my neglect. I have been quite unwell, most of the week, and unable to attend to any secular business. I now sit up, but little. — A. F."

THE FUNERAL was from the church, where he had preached so many times; a town was his mourners; the church was draped; the services impressive; among the relative mourners were Rev. Dr. Grout, his son-in-law, and Rev. Mr. Foster, his nephew, whose installation sermon he had preached. Rev. Dr. Stevens of West Westminster, whose parish and Mr. Foster's had lain so many years side by side, spoke very feelingly in the funeral. Mr. Mansfield of Dummerston, first to give us an account of the funeral, Historian of the Town where Mr. Foster's brother preached twenty years, says: "Mr. Foster was a beloved friend of the people here in Dummerston, as well as in Putney. He was one of the best men I ever knew. It is certainly to be lamented, he did not live to see the Putney History printed * * The last interview I had with him was in reference to Putney History. He spoke highly of you, and was confident Putney History would certainly be printed. Inention, this, so many despaired of ever seeing either Dummerstor or Putney printed."

And, it had been doubtful, but for the happy faith and help of these two most firm friends, in the two last, hard years for our local history and us: Mr Foster was a personal and literary friend of 25 years standing, or more; when the losses on Vol. IV. came upon us, he doubled his own subscription and bent to the work of completing his history; — "died in the harness," past the middle line of his 88th year. His daughters write, — Mrs. Grout: "I write in behalf of my Father, sitting by his sick-bed. He wish-se me to say to you he has looked over the Ms. and finds you have already corrected the few errors, he found. * * * I regret to say Father is very sick, and we fear, failing fast. * * He wishes me to say it will be useless for you to depend upon him any longer as his health is so poor. This is how he puts it. [It was the first time he ever said he could not help, 4 days before he died. Mrs. G. continues:] The dear man is "all ripe for the harvest, and I think that he longs to join our precious Mother in that better world. * * If there are any questions you wish to ask Father in regard to the history, I will endeavor to get as satisfactory answers as possible in his weak state." Such were this kind family.

LETTER OF MRS. JONES, who being requested has also sent a memorial record of Rev. Mr. Foster, s family which follows the letter for w'ch we have only room now for extracts.

Speaking of his death-bed: "I shall never forget the sweet smile that lighted his countenance, as he called us each by name and gave us a parting kiss, and said "I love you all alike." This was a few moments before he passed away. Dear precious Father! with his sweet and loving life, much of brightness has gone from our lives. But, he had his heart's desire—he died in the home he so dearly loved, and has found our dear Mother, whom he so tenderly loved and deeply mourned. * * * I love to think of them in that bright world. * * A precious legacy they have left us in their pure lives, their love and their prayers. When I wrote you from Putney, I did not think that Father would pass away so soon. * * His interest in the Gazetteer continued to the last. He often asked if I had written to you and told you why he did not write. It would have been an unspeakable pleasure to him to have seen your work completed; especially to have seen the History of Putney; for everything however trifling, connected with that place, touched a tender cord in his kind and loving heart."

HENRY D. FOSTER. — LUDLOW GAZETTE.

* * * Young Foster, although always of a frail constitution was fitted for college and entered at Middlebury in 1852, and graduated 1856, being a classmate of Rev. C. W. Wheaton, D. He maintained an honorary position in his class and graduated with honor. His social qualities made him a great favorite with his fellow students and all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. After his graduation he taught for a short time but finally settled in Sullivan County, New Hampshire, where he held the office of County Register for about five years, and was a very popular officer. He also had the office of Trial Justice in said County for several years and tried a large number of cases displaying much clearness of judgment and a great love of Justice; after retiring from the office of Register in Sullivan county, he removed to Vermont and became for a time the editor of the Gazette, (published at Ludlow.)

[We regret to retrench, a tribute to his talent as a writer, but we wish to close on this page, also, he and the Gazette will re-appear in the Ludlow History. How beautiful! that they who are dead may re-appear in history.]

VERNON.

BY A. H. WASHBURN, ESQ.,

AND HIS WIFE,

LUCINDA W. B. WASHBURN.

The Town that Claims the Oldest Charter in the State—Whose Second Centennial Anniversary was Aug. 13, 1872.

VERNON.

SQUAKHEAG PROVINCE.

A township, including a part of Vernon named Squakheag, Province of Massachusetts Bay, was granted in the year 1672. A deed was given* by four Indians of the place to William Clark and John King, agents for the proprietors of Northfield, Aug. 13, 1687.

FALL TOWN,

was granted,† June, 1736, by the Provincial Legislature of Massachusetts, on petition of Samuel Hunt (son of Samuel Hunt who was in the Falls fight) and others of Billerica, Mass., for services rendered at the battle and sixty years after the battle of Turner's Falls.

On surveying the north line of Massachusetts in 1763, it was found, about half a mile in width belonged to New Hampshire, now Vernon, taking about 3 miles from the owners of Fall Town township.

VERNON INCLUDED IN HINSDALE.

Hinsdale, Cheshire Co. was chartered Sept. 5, 1753, by Benning Wentworth, Provincial Governor, which included a part of Vernon. The charter was altered, or another issued, Sept. 26, 1753. The inhabitants manifested their disapprobation and the King, on the 19th of March, 1768, re-established the County of Cumberland by letters patent, under the great seal of the Province of New York, again changing its limits. By act of Legislature of New York, passed Mar. 24, 1772, the boundaries were again changed.

*See Barber's Historical Collections, p. 285.

†See Centennial Addresses by Lt. Gov. Henry W. Cushman at Barnardston, Mass.

UNITY COUNTY—CUMBERLAND.

April 1, 1775, other alterations were made. At the first session of the General Assembly of Vermont, Mar. 4, 1778, divided into two counties, that on the east side of the Green Mountains called Unity county, being Gloucester and Cumberland counties. This latter name was changed on the 21st of the same month, and that of Cumberland was substituted.

FOUR CLAIMS BEFORE CONGRESS.

In 1779, four different claims were before Congress, to the same tract of country (now Vernon) Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and New York. Sept. 27, 1780, Congress took under consideration the settlement of the New Hampshire grants. The inhabitants residing in the western portion of New Hampshire expressed a wish to be received into Vermont. Another proposition was at the same time received from them which made the land into towns, rendering this Hinsdale, Cumberland Co., Vermont, although still claimed by New York.

Vermont* was claimed, anciently, both by the Province of New Hampshire and that of New York. The Governor of New Hampshire began to make grants in 1749. A violent contest ensued between the two Provinces, which was not settled till 1764, when it was decided by the King of England in favor of New York. Connecticut river west bank to be the western boundary of New Hampshire,† Decree of George the III., July 20, 1764. So Hinsdale west part was Hinsdale, Vermont, and so remained until 1802, when it was Vernon.

By act of Legislature‡ of New York, the boundaries of Cumberland Co. were established July 3, 1766, including a part of Vernon. June 26, 1767, the King disallowed and declared void, the previously established boundaries, and the Governor of New York was ordered to act in accordance with the decision; New York adherents, residing in Cumberland and Gloucester Counties. Oct. 1, 1780, a union was effected, and again dissolved, Feb. 23, 1782.

WINDHAM COUNTY FORMED.

By act of General Assembly of Vermont, Feb. 1781, the county of Cumberland was subdivided into counties of Windham, Windsor and Orange. Feb. 19, 1781, by act of General Assembly, Windham County was divided into half shires called Westminster and Marlborough, and the courts were held alternately in the shire towns of the same name.

Vernon is situated in the south-east corner of the state.

PHINEAS MUNN'S SURVEY.

The boundary of the town from Phineas Munn's survey, 1777, Fall Town Gore being on parchment: Beginning at the northeast corner on the west bank of Connecticut river at the mouth of a small brook, called Venter's brook, near the south end of Dummer meadow, about one-half mile south of Mr. Brooks' house, the site of old Fort Dummer; thence, W. 10 deg. N. on Brattleboro' south line, 224 4-10 rods to the northwest corner: thence S. 10 deg. W. on Guilford east line 1972 3-10 rods to the southwest corner: thence E. 10 deg. S. on Massachusetts state line and N. line of Bernardston and Northfield 1692 rods to the southeast corner on the west bank of Connecticut river: thence northerly following the west bank of the river and west line of Hinsdale, N. H., to the place of beginning.

The average width of the town is about three miles and it contains 18 square miles and 108 acres.

It joins Bernardston 792 rods and Northfield 900 rods. A straight line drawn from the southeast to the northeast corner, is 2404 rods or 7 1-2 miles; 4 rods in length, and crosses the river 4 times and divides the land into two nearly equal parts between the two towns, giving to Vernon all south of Stebbins (formerly Carey's) island and nearly all north to Hinsdale. Richard Hazen's survey in February and March, 1741, cut it off after remaining a part of Northfield 69 or 81 years, till chartered by New Hampshire, Sept. 5, 1753.

It was called Northfield 69 years; Bridgman's Fort 12 years; Hinsdale 49 years; then Vernon to the present time.

By diversity of claims and lines, Vernon has successively been in Northfield, Hampshire Co., Mass., Hinsdale, Cheshire Co., N. H., Hins-dale, Cumberland Co., N. Y., Hinsdale, Windham Co., Vt., and since 1802, it has been called Vernon, Windam Co., Vt. In that year the voters in town instructed their representative, Jonathan Hunt, to name this town Huntstown; but at the suggestion of his wife it was incorporated by the name of Vernon.*

PYNCHON—SQUAKHEAG.

In 1672, a township was granted to John Pynchon, a Mr. Pearson and other associates at Squakheag, now Northfield, Mass., and the following year a few people from Northampton, Hadley and Hatfield commenced a plantation at that place.

The township was laid out on both sides of the river and included an area of 6 miles by 12, extending several miles into the present States of New Hampshire and Vermont, including a valuable tract of interval land. The northern boundary of Massachusetts was then unknown, but the grant was supposed to be within the limits of the Province. A deed to William Clark and John King of Northampton, agents for the proprietors of Northfield, covering the grant, was made Aug. 13, 1687, by Nawelet Gongegua, Aspiambelet Addarawanset and Meganichcha—Indians of the place, in consideration of 200 fathoms of Wampum and £57 value of trading goods. It was signed with the marks of the grantors and witnessed by Jonathan Hunt (Grandfather of Lieut. Gov. Hunt of Vermont) Preserved Clap, William Clark, Jr., Peter Jethro, Joseph Atherton and Israel Chauncy.†

In June, 1736, the General Court of Massachusetts, J. Belcher, Governor, granted Fall Town to the soldiers and their descendants, who fought the Indians May 18, 1676, at Turner's Falls, Gill, Mass.; hence its name. It extended north into Vernon as far as Northfield did.

*A pleasant change to a very fair name; and the only town in the State, we now remember, named by a lady.—Ed.

†See Barber's Historical collections.

The name of Fall Town was changed to Bernardstown, Mass., in 1764. The part in Vernon, west of Northfield old line, was called Fall Town Gore, and north of this was called Hinsdale Gore. Fall Town, Fall Town Gore and Hinsdale Gore were all allotted and surveyed by Phineas Munn.

ORLANDO BRIDGMAN, [L. S.]

Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of

DAN'L JONES,
CALEB LYMAN.

Windham Co., ss. } June 16, 1795.

Personally appeared Orlando Bridgman, subscribed to the within written instrument and acknowledged the same to be his free act and deed, before me.

JOHN BRIDGMAN, Justice Peace.

The above is a true copy taken from the original and recorded December ye 25, 1795.

Attest, JOHN BRIDGMAN,
Town Clerk.

(Copy from Vernon Town Records.)

This township contains some good alluvial meadows, a proportion of pine, plain land, and some rough and rocky mountains. Some of the hillsides are susceptible of high cultivation and upon them are some fine farms. There was originally, a heavy growth of timber, a large part of which has been cut down, and in many places a second growth has sprung up.

MINERALS.

In the west part of the town, there are large quantities of argillite slate, though it has not been extensively quarried. In the northwest part, glass sandstone abounds; large quantities of which have been carried to Warwick, Mass., and Keene, N. H.

WATER-MARKS.

The Connecticut River (the Quonecticut of the Indians and which in their language means long river) forms the eastern boundary. At the spring freshets it frequently rises 30 feet above low water-mark. In 1763 it was 37 1-2 feet. At this time, Lower Salmon Brook was higher than ever known, and the embankment on the north side of the mill-pond gave way beside two dams above, and thousands of tons of earth were washed through the meadow below. Sept. 6, 1828, it was 32 feet, 6 inches. In April 27, 1854, the Connecticut River was 34 feet above low water-mark after a four days' rain. Feb. 20, 1857, the ice dammed the river at Rock Island, and the water stood 35 feet. Apr. 12, 1862, no rain had fallen, but from 3 to 4 feet of snow melting by the sun, the river reached the same height as 99 years before, 37 1-2 feet. Oct. 4, 1869, 8 1-2 inches of rain had fallen and the river was 35 feet from low water mark. In Sept. 1870, it was 37 1-2 feet below high water mark, 2 feet more than usual, being 2 feet, 2 inches, below the top of a boulder with a fissure in it, lying in the small eddy a few rods below the mouth of Lower Salmon Brook.

The reason for the great rise of the river in Vernon, more than above or below, is, undoubtedly, that it is at the foot of swift water. Between Brattleboro and Vernon, a distance of 7 miles, the river has a fall of 13 feet, and yet the track of the railroad that passes through Vernon is 70 feet higher at the middle of the town than at Brattleboro.

OLD FISHING-PLACES.

Salmon and shad were formerly abundant in the waters of the Connecticut River in this vicinity, and furnished food to the early settlers. The two best fishing places were at Rock Island and at the foot of Stebbins Island.

COOPER'S POINT.

Connecticut River for about three-fourths of a mile above and below the middle of the town has been forming almost a complete circle of 70 or 80 rods in diameter, called Cooper's Point, which belongs to Hinsdale, N. H. According to a recent survey by John Stebbins, Esq., the river on the west side of this Point in high water, is only 12 rods 6 feet distance across the peninsular at the narrowest place, where for several rods the current of the river runs almost exactly north and then resumes its general southerly direction.

PRINCIPAL STREAMS.

Broad Brook, Upper and Lower Salmon Brook, Island Meadow Brook, and Belding's Brook are the principal streams, and all are small.

LILY POND,

in the westerly part of the town, covers about 100 acres. Pickerel, pout, and some other fish are found in its waters.

THE POOL.

(so called) is a mineral spring, on the land of Alonzo Stebbins, formerly owned by Ensign Samuel Stratton, was occasionally used by some of the early inhabitants, and considered beneficial in scrofulous and cutaneous diseases. By request of John Stebbins, Esq., some of its waters were analyzed in 1851, by C. H. Hitchcock, Vermont State Chemist. He called it a compound chalybeate, containing carbonic acid, sulphuretted hydrogen, per oxide of iron and a bare trace of lime. The spring is of the same nature as the noted springs of Newburg, Williamstown, and in other parts of the state.

FORTS.

Sartwell's Fort was built in 1737, by Josiah Sartwell. It was situated nearly opposite Fort Hinsdale in Hinsdale, N. H., about two miles south of Fort Dummer in the south-east part of Brattleboro, and about three miles north of the present centre of the town of Vernon. Its walls were of hewn timber with a hewn plank outside door (the door is still preserved). It covered an area of almost 38x20 feet and was a story and a half high. At the top of the first story, the timbers projected about three-fourths of their thickness, so that port-holes, over the door and elsewhere, were conveniently made from which those within were enabled to fire down upon their assailants.

The public road ran east of it. It was taken down in 1837, having stood 99 years. Some of the timbers, being sound, were put into a new house, erected on the site of the old fort, and occupied by the late Hon. Ebenezer Howe, (a great, great, grandson of Josiah Sartwell and a great grandson of Caleb Howe who was killed by the Indians in 1755,) and which is still occupied by descendants of Mrs. Jemima Howe and owned by two young men, George Ebenezer (son of George) and Warren Maynard (son of Arad) grandsons of Hon. Ebenezer Howe, and great, great, great, great, grandsons of Josiah Sartwell, or the 7th generation.

Bridgman's Fort was of similar construction and was probably built the same year by Orlando Bridgman. It was situated on the east side of the road, one-half mile south of Sartwell's Fort, and with the exception of Fort Dummer was the only place picketed and considered secure in that vicinity. June 24, 1746, a party of 20 Indians burned the fort and killed* William Robbins and James Parker while working in a meadow near Bridgman's Fort; wounded Michael Gilson and Patrick Roy and took John Beeman and Daniel Howe prisoners, but not until the latter had killed one of his captors. It was soon afterward rebuilt and strongly picketed.

In 1755 another attack was made by the Indians, who killed several, and captured three families, viz: Mrs. Jemima Howe and her 7 children, Mrs. Submit Grout and her 3 children and Mrs. Eunice Gaffield and her daughter, 14 persons in all. After plundering and firing the place, they proceeded north with their captives.

Aug. 20, 1756, Capt. Joseph Stebbins of Hinsdale (now Vernon) and two children, Tabitha and Elijah, were harvesting wheat upon his farm on the plain above the meadow, when they were surprised by the Indians and would have been taken, had not his brother Zebediah and Reuben Wright come along and discovered the savages. The Indians fired upon the two men, wounding Wright, and the party at work fled. An Indian skeleton was found, Aug. 1869, buried near the side of the old Stebbins road on the border of the brook on land of Geo. M. Lee, and from its near proximity to the place where the Indian fell, and at the time as they tracked the Indian by blood a short distance, it is probably the one shot by Zebediah Stebbins. The bones immediately crumbled on exposure to the air, having been buried 115 years. Several bushels of stones were used in walling the sides of the resting place where the skeleton was found deposited.

In July, 1698, a small party of Indians killed a man and a boy in Hatfield meadow on Connecticut River, and captured two lads, Samuel Dickinson and Charley. They put them on board of canoes and proceeded up the river. The intelligence thereof being received at Deerfield, 13 miles above, 12 men were detached from that place to intercept them. Advancing about 20 miles, they chose a favorable spot on the west bank of the river, within the present town of Vernon. Here they lay until morning when they discovered the Indians coming up the river near the opposite bank with the captured lads in two canoes. The whole party gave the Indians an unexpected fire, by which one was wounded. The others with one of the lads leaped from the canoes and gained the shore. The Indians then attempted to kill the lads, but receiving another well-directed fire, they fell back, and the lad on the shore joined his companion in the canoe and both escaped across the river to their deliverers. Five or six of the party then embarked with the design of seizing the other canoe which had lodged on an island a little below. Two Indians, who lay secreted below, fired and killed Nathaniel Pomeroy, one of the party. The Indians then retired into the woods and the English returned to Deerfield. The island was called Pomeroy's Island.

The first settlers of Vernon were from Northampton and Northfield, Mass. They suffered all the discouragements and horrors incident to frontier location and Indian wars and barbarities. For many years the inhabitants resided in forts and labored in armed companies from farm to farm. But with all their care and prudence they were subject to frequent incursions of the Indians and were several times driven back with the settlers of Hinsdale and Northfield, alarmed by the fight at Beers Plain, in the destruction at Deerfield, and Turner's contest with the Indians at the Falls which bear his name.

MEETING HOUSES.

The first church was built in 1802, for the use of the Congregationalists and Baptists, each society to have the privilege of occupying at alternate months. It was situated on a hill between Upper and Lower Salmon brooks, and from it there was a fine view of the river, islands and adjacent country for many miles. To defray the expense of building, a tax of 10 cents on a dollar on the grand list of the town was assessed. The building committee were Arad Hunt, Timothy Bascom, Isaac Johnson, Isaac Pratt and Daniel Goss. Total cost of building and painting was about $1050. The dedication sermon was written by Rev. Bunker Gay of Hinsdale, N. H., but owing to necessary absence, it was delivered by Rev. Mr. Wood of Chesterfield, N. H. In 1844, the house was sold at auction for $160.

A second church was built about one-fourth of a mile east of the first by the Unitarian and Universalist societies, each to have the privilege of occupying it one-half of the time. Building committee: Marshall Whithed, Jarus F. Burrows, A. H. Washburn and Elijah Stebbins. It was raised in 1844, finished in 1845, and cost $3300. Capt. Elijah Stebbins, Marshall Whithed, and Mrs. Sally Hunt, widow of Arad Hunt, Esq., gave a bell. The names of the donors are cast upon it.

THE ADVENT CHAPEL

UNITARIAN CHURCH.

Organized, Apr. 10, 1827, with 25 members. A Sabbath school was founded, previously, by Miss Hannah Wells, daughter of John Wells, D. D., of Brattleboro, formerly from Liverpool, England, she leaving books in each school district. Twenty-seven children were baptized.

This church has been supplied by Rev. T. F. Rogers and by exchanges or otherwise, by Rev. Messrs. Thomas Mason, Daniel Huntington, Addison Brown, Preserved Smith, E. S. Gannet, Mr. Bailey, Samuel Willard, George C. Channing, Mr. Field, Alphens Harding, Dr. Thompson, Mr. Moore, A. M. Bridge, George Hosmer and O. C. Everett, up to 1845.

The church has been assisted from the first by the American Unitarian Association of Boston. Some few years after 1845, it was supplied by Rev. Addison Brown of Brattleboro.

THE FIRST UNIVERSALIST SOCIETY was organized May 8, 1858, with about 25 members. Rev. H. B. Butler supplied the desk a portion of the time during the next 4 years. Rev. D. H. Ranney, Wm. T. Stone and others received what money the society could raise for preaching.

In May, 1866, the services of Rev. N. C. Hodgdon were secured at an annual salary of $700, which was raised by the aid of a general subscription.

Mr. Hodgdon resided in town nine years and preached most of the time.

There is a Sunday school of about 75 members connected with the society and a library of 400 volumes.

THE MARSH FUND.

Anna Marsh, daughter of Lient. Gov. Hunt, and widow of Dr. Perley Marsh of Hinsdale, N. H., bequeathed by her last will $2000 to Vernon, her native town, the annual interest to be expended for public preaching of the gospel in Vernon. Three agents received this fund in 1835.

The interest has been divided among the different denominations according to the number of legal voters who signify their choice by subscribing to a paper annually for that purpose.

METHODISTS.

The Methodists held meetings in their dwellings and at the school-houses in various parts of the town.

There never was a regular Methodist church organized, but Methodists here connected themselves with the church at Brattleboro.

Rev. Ebenezer Washburn, a brother of Dr. Washburn, did much to aid the denomination in Vermont and preached here occasionally. There has been Methodist preaching in town a considerable portion of the time and the denomination has regularly received its portion of the Marsh fund.

THE VERNON JUVENILE LIBRARY.

The Vernon Juvenile Library commenced in 1827, and from that time to 1848 there was raised by subscription $100, and expended for 400 volumes.

AGRICULTURAL LIBRARY.

Cost $105; purchased by 21 members or shareholders, about 1865.

DR. CYRUS WASHBURN

was born Nov. 5, 1774, in Hardwick, Mass. He was the fifth of a family of seven children, three sons and four daughters, all of whom he survived. One of his brothers, Artemas, died while a member of the senior class in Harvard College, in 1792. The other brother, Ebenezer, died in Wisconsin in 1857, having been for more than sixty years an able minister of the gospel. Two of his sisters, Susan and Hannah, died young. Another sister, Dolly, was for many years a successful teacher, and died in Hardwick, Mass., in 1835. The other sister, Clarissa, married and had a large family of children, and died in Bangor, Me., in 1848.

The Doctor's ancestry may be traced back to John Washburn, who settled in Duxbury, Mass., previous to 1663, and from him through succeeding generations of the Washburn family, to the Doctor's grandfather, Joseph Washburn of Bridgewater, Mass., who married Mary, the daughter of Ben Johnson of that town, a relative of Ben Johnson, the celebrated English poet and dramatist. They had five children, viz: Joseph, jr., Seth, Ebenezer, (the Doctor's father,) Abiah and Sarah; and with their family, they moved in 1749, to Middletown, Ct. A few years subsequently, they, with the exception of their oldest son Joseph, jr., who remained at Middletown, Ct., removed to Leicester, Mass., where at an advanced age, they died in 1780.

EBENEZER WASHBURN,

the father of the Doctor, married Dorothy Newhall, daughter of Jonathan Newhall, Esq., of Leicester, Mass., in 1757; lived for a short time in Spencer, and then moved to Hardwick. He was a teacher for more than forty years.

He served in the expedition to Crown Point, and, subsequently, in the army of the Revolution.

He died in 1795, and his wife in 1807.

CYRUS WASHBURN, the subject of this memoir, remained at home, assisting his parents till he was 16 or 17 years of age, and was trained to habits of industry and economy. He enjoyed the advantages of the common schools of those days. He was fond of books and study, and eagerly sought for knowledge.

His parents being in limited circumstances, he immediately engaged in school-teaching, to procure the means of prosecuting his studies. He taught in several places in Massachusetts and pursued his academic studies at Leicester Academy in the same state.

Dr. Washburn studied medicine three years with Dr. Spencer Field, of Oakham, Mass. Medical schools were rare in those days, and he received his Medical Diploma in Vermont.

He was thrice married. His first wife was Electa Stratton, daughter of John Stratton, of Hinsdale, Vt., whom he married in 1800. She was a niece of Dr. Field, with whom he was pursuing his medical studies. By her he had two children, who died young. She died suddenly in Vernon. His second wife was Rhoda Field, daughter of Henry Field, of Northfield, Mass., with whom he lived 20 years. She died in 1826. They had six children, four are now living. His third wife was Lucy Hathaway, daughter of Timothy Hathaway, of Hardwick, Mass. She died in 1837.

But he was not left alone,—an affectionate and self-forgetting daughter was ready and willing to devote the best years of her life to the comfort and happiness of his old age.

He did not forget his obligations to society, but met and performed every duty, professional, or otherwise.

After completing his medical studies, he settled in Hardwick his native town, in 1800, and practiced medicine successfully for about three years.

In 1803, yielding to the solicitation of the people of Vernon, he removed to that town, and a cordial reception greeted his coming.

When he removed to Vernon a church edifice had just been erected, but there was no settled minister, and no organized society of church members. At the time of the Doctor's death, March 2, 1860, there were living in the town only a few (32) persons who were residents when he came there 57 years before. And it is a fact worthy of notice that Dr. Washburn performed professional business in five generations in five families, and in one other family of six generations.

As a physician he had a long and successful career. He was fond of his profession, and pursued it with energy and untiring industry. In a few years, he became the leading physician of the town. He practiced not only in Vernon, but more or less in all the adjoining towns; his practice extended many miles in all directions. He was frequently called to advise with other physicians in dangerous and difficult cases.

Dr. Washburn was for several years President and a censor of the Medical Society of Vermont. He was also appointed, by that society, a delegate to the American Medical Association, whose first meeting was held at Boston.

Dr. Washburn continued in the full and successful practice of his profession till age and infirmities compelled him to resign the field to younger hands.

In addition to his labors as a physician, he took a lively interest in the affairs of the town, and bore an active and prominent part in town offices. The office of town clerk he held 28 years; and with but few exceptions, he was superintendent of schools, or one of the school trustees, for a period of over 50 years.

In 1810 he was elected to the following town offices: town clerk; first selectman; lister; overseer of the poor; and one of a committee to report on the subject of establishing a House of Correction.

In 1812, in 1831, and in 1840, he was elected representative to the General Assembly of Vermont.

In 1814, he was chosen delegate to the Convention at Montpelier, for revising the State Constitution.

In 1824, he was chosen delegate to the Convention at Newfane, for locating the shire town of the county. In addition to these offices and trusts, the Doctor held a commission as justice of the peace every year but one from 1805 to 1861.

"THE GRETNA GREEN OF VERMONT."

Among the duties which he performed as justice of the peace, there was none more agreeable to him, and we may also, presume, to the other parties concerned, than that of performing the marriage ceremony. He joined in marriage 853 couples, a larger number than any other man in that part of the country.

His manner of performing the ceremony was characteristic and somewhat peculiar. It was almost as varied as the appearance of the candidates for marriage. Of the many forms of ceremony used by the Doctor the following may serve as a specimen:

MARRIAGE CEREMONY

BY DR. CYRUS WASHBURN, ESQ.

Parties and relatives, being agreed,
To solemn joyous rites we will proceed.
Worthy and much respected Groom and Bride,
That you by nuptial ties may be allied,
In preparation for the endearing bands,
In token of united hearts; join hands.

Considering this union of hands expressive of a reciprocal interchange of heart and affection, do you mutually espouse and avouch, each the other, to be your betrothed, your married companion for life,—solemnly promising, covenanting and engaging that you will, forever hereafter, according to the best of your powers and abilities, whether in the pleasing scenes of health and prosperity, or the more trying ones of sickness and adversity, provide for, support, comfort, nourish, and sustain each other, as a kind, provident, indulgent husband and as a loving, prudent, submissive wife ought to conduct toward each other in the marriage relation; and that you will ever with trust and fidelity demean yourself each to the other, and to all else in reference to this your marriage covenant, by the known strict rules of duty, law, and love to each other so long as you shall both live? Do you thus promise and engage?

Then by authority as law requires,
And in accordance with your just desires,

I pronounce you married—Husband and wife.

Be each to each a loyal spouse through life:

May smiles from Heaven and men on you await,

And may your joys be numerous, pure and great.

While these fond subjects through your bosoms move,

And you resolve to please and live in love.
 Your friend will now in simple verse draw near
 And wish you joy through many a happy year.
 Let no discordant jars your bliss destroy,
 But virtue, peace and love your lives employ.
 May Gospel faith and works be well combined,
 Adorn your lives and regulate your mind.
 Where'er you dwell, let virtue be your guide,
 And God, above, will bless both Groom and Bride.
 To good old age may Heaven protract your span,
 The kind assuagers of each other's pain.
 Remember, too, all earthly joys must end,
 And each be severed from your dearest friend;
 But death, itself which earthly joys removes
 Still heightens virtue and true love improves.
 Then keep the goal of happiness in mind,
 And what you lack on earth in Heaven you'll find;
 Where none are married, none in marriage given,
 But are, as are the angels, pure in Heaven.

LECTURES AND ADDRESSES.

In addition to his professional and official duties, the Doctor was frequently summoned to other labors. He was invited to give orations on the 4th of July, lectures before lyceums, and addresses on various occasions.

During his long practice, riding by day and by night, he was exposed to accidents, and experienced many hair-breadth escapes. In 1817, while riding in a chaise, his horse became unmanageable and ran off a steep embankment. His escape was considered as almost miraculous; but he crept from the wreck with only slight bruises, and with a new outfit, was soon on his way to visit his patient.

In 1818, during a severe rain storm he mounted his horse, and suddenly raising his umbrella, his horse reared and fell over backwards upon him, severely injuring one of his legs, from the effects of which he never fully recovered.

In February, 1826, while he was rapidly driving, the king-bolt to his carriage broke, and he was thrown violently to the ground, breaking his left shoulder, which confined him to his house for several weeks.

In 1841, after visiting a patient, he stepped into his gig, when his horse, a high spirited animal, started off upon a run. The horse took the road to Brattleboro, and after running about a mile the Doctor was thrown from his gig a distance of about twenty feet, striking upon the right side of his head and shoulder. He was taken up insensible. He immediately received medical aid from Doctors Dickerman, Hyde and Rockwell of Brattleboro, and Dr. Twichell of Keene, N. H. The deltoid muscle of his right shoulder was severed from the bone, and he never recovered the free use of his right arm.

In all relations of life, private and public, Dr. Washburn had the confidence and respect of those who knew him. A prominent trait of his character was hospitality. He received his friends, and also strangers, with frank cordiality. His power of interesting his visitors by wit and anecdote was quite uncommon.

He was not wanting in the higher sentiments of religion. His seat at church was never vacant except at the call of duty, and he contributed cheerfully, his full share to the support of public worship.

Dr. Washburn was not wanting in a clear and earnest faith; faith in God, in duty, in immortality, in the great truths of religion, and the vital truths of Christianity. This faith was vividly portrayed in the last days of his earthly existence. He died in 1859, aged 85.

(1884.)

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES.

A society was organized, Jan. 1836, and two years afterward numbered 101 members. Another society was formed in Aug. 1841, consisting of 69 members, and still another organized in 1849, with 110 members.

A society of Young Temperance Volunteers was formed in 1865, consisting of 155 members. The Order of Good Templars established a lodge here known as Mt. Vernon, No. 60, Sept 9, 1867.

MILLS AND MANUFACTURES.

There have been several steam mills in town. The first one was built about 1852, near Vernon depot, by a company known as Messrs. Ely, Newkirk & Frink, who did an extensive business in clearing up land and manufacturing lumber. Their mill was burned about 1864, and the company dissolved. Another was erected on the same site and burned, and yet another was built and is now standing.

A steam saw and grist mill at South Vernon, also did a thriving business until burned about 1874. There is now a saw and grist mill near South Vernon depot on Belding's brook, also one at the centre of the town, built by Messrs. Whited and Ball at a cost of $7000. It has a stone dam and wheel-pit and a 25 feet overshot wheel. There are two other saw mills in the west part of the town; one on a tributary of Fall River does some business. In former years, over a million feet of lumber have been shipped from Vernon depot, annually. Matches and chair stuff have also been manufactured quite extensively.

There are three hotels and two stores in town.

DEATH OF MR. HUNT.

OBITUARY BY CYRUS WASHBURN, M. D.

Died at Vernon, Vt., Aug. 30, 1833, Arad Hunt, Esq., aged 43. While in the first bloom of manhood, he was assailed by a disease, which neither admitted of cure, nor scarcely the hope of mitigation. During the last 8 years of his life he was confined almost exclusively to his bed. He possessed intellectual power which, if developed under happy auspices, would probably have led to distinction in any congenial walk of life. A love of books solaced him in the tranquil hours of his confinement. His reading was various, and in some departments of knowledge, his information was extensive and accurate. In the education and welfare of his family, his abundant means was liberally and judiciously dispersed.

Upon the final settlement of his estate, his residence, with a large share of his lands, passed into the possession of his son. This place, situated a short distance north of Vernon depot, was long famed for its good cheer and the antique domicile was always welcome to the wayfarer and its many visitors. Col. Hunt retained possession of the place until 1871, when he sold it to Hon. E. L. Norton of Boston, Mass., and Mr. Hunt removed to Brattleboro and finally bought the Dummer farm (so called) where he now lives; his children: Ellen Morris married C. W. Hubbard of Vernon; Arad; Leonora, married C. M. C. Richardson, Brattleboro.

HON. JONATHAN HUNT, M. C.

HON. JONATHAN HUNT, (son of Gov. Jonathan) born Aug. 12, 1780, married Jane Maria Leavitt; his children were: Jane, William Morris, Jonathan, Richard, Leavitt.

He graduated at Dartmouth College, 1807, studied law and engaged extensively in practice at Brattleboro, was member of Congress 1827-32. He died at Washington, D. C., May 15, 1832.

OBITUARY.

House of Representatives. Mr. Everett, of Vermont, addressed the House as follows:

"Mr. Speaker: It has become my painful duty on behalf of my colleagues to announce to this House the death of one of their number, the Hon. Jonathan Hunt. On this occasion I may be permitted to say that he has long been a member of this House and that the talents and assiduity with which he executed his duties in this place were alike honorable to himself, to this House and to his constituents. I have known him long, I have known him well, and a purer spirit never inhabited mortality. His place in this House may indeed be filled, but the void in the affections of his family and friends can never be filled."

Mr. Everett then submitted the, following resolution :

"Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of Jonathan Hunt, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Vermont, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the present session of Congress."

A resolution was subsequently adopted by which Messrs. H. Everett, Choon, Slade, E. Everett, Taylor, Choate and Candish were appointed to superintend the ceremonies at the funeral, which should be attended on Wednesday by the Speaker, officers and members, according to usage. The House then adjourned to Thursday.

"The news of the death of the Hon. Jonathan Hunt, which took place in Washington City, on the morning of the 15th inst., will probably have been generally known among the readers, ere the reception of this paper. By this sudden and unlooked for event the state has been deprived of an able and faithful representative in the National Legislature, and our community of a member who was very generally and very highly esteemed in all the relations of social life. We speak to those who knew him well, when we say that the character of Mr. Hunt for professional uprightness, political independence and unsullied integrity in his private affairs was not surpassed by that of any man in the community. Attended from early youth by all the allurements which wealth can furnish, few men have arrived at the meridian of life through a course of more uniform industry and perseverance.

LIEUT. GOV. JONATHAN HUNT.

BY CYRUS WASHBURN, M. D.

Lieut. Gov. Jonathan Hunt was born at Northfield, Mass., Sept. 12, 1738, died in Vernon Vt., June 1, 1823, in his 85th year. In early life he shared in the fatigues and anxieties incident to the perilous state of those who plant themselves in the wilderness, liable to the depredations, of savages. Persevering industry, and well deserved promotion to many honorable offices, civil and military, to that of Lieut. Governor of the state, rendered him a distinguished character during the struggle of the New Hampshire Grantees and the New York claimants during the Revolutionary war, the formation of this State, its union with the United States, and the foundation of our State Government.

LOVINA SWAN HUNT,

widow of Lieut. Gov. Hunt, was born at Boston, Mass., Aug. 12, 1749; died at Vernon, June 29, 1834, aged 85 years. In her youth she attended school at Worcester, under the tuition of the late President John Adams. She early attained, and through life possessed superior intellectual endowments. June 1, 1823, after a happy union of 50 years, her husband died, and since, both of her sons, the Hon. Jonathan Hunt, M. C., at Washington, and Arad Hunt, Esq., at Vernon. Both were gentlemen of superior attainments and great mental powers, often promoted to posts of public trust.

Gov. Hunt and his lady, with ample pecuniary means, with social and cordial manners, animated and sweetened with pleasantries, were entertaining and delightful companions with their numerous friends and acquaintances, among whom I should name Rev. Bunker Gay, the philanthropic Wells, the devout Hubbard, the Hon. Messrs. Bridgman, Jones, Knowlton, Bradley, and their ladies, with hosts of other worthies from Massachusetts, New Hampshire and young Vermont. As a wife, mother, friend and Christian, she was a pattern worthy of commendation, illustrating the happy effects even in this life, of that gospel which she long ago professed.

EPITAPH

Of Mrs. Abigail P., wife of Rev. Bunker Gay, who died July 15, 1792, Æ. 52 years.

*To rise again the sun goes down,
And in the furrows grain is sown,
Beauties that sleep through winter's reign,
When spring returns revive again.*

Shall then the friend for whom we mourn.

*Never again to life return?
Great source of light, life, love and joy,
Let no such thought our hope destroy;*

*Our lively hope that sometime hence
Through the Redeemer's influence,
Shall burst the tomb in sweet surprise.
And in our Saviour's image rise,
Ascend to where God holds his throne
And immortality put on.*

REV. BUNKER GAY.

Trinitarian Congregationalist was ordained over Hindsdale, including Vernon, in 1764, and remained pastor until 1802; he died Oct. 20, 1815, aged 80 years. His text on the Sabbath following the death of his wife is recorded in Ps. 88—18.

"EPITAPH"

TO MRS. URIEL EVANS.

BY REV. BUNKER GAY.

*Throughout the world it is not common
To find so great and good a woman, Industrious, temperate, frugal, just:
In God through Christ she put her trust
And kept habitually in view
His precepts and example too.*

TO URIEL EVANS

ON THE DEATH OF HIS WIFE.

BY REV. BUNKER GAY,

(aged eighty years.

*Long since I felt the fatal stroke,
That cleft in twain the nuptial yoke,
And my yoke-fellow from me fled,*

*Cut down and numbered with the dead,
And now, alas! it is your turn,
A loss akin to mine to mourn.
Can it be greater? Yes 'tis true,
'Tis greater far; that is to you;
For so our own experience shows,
We can't sustain each other's woes;
But every mortal everywhere
Must his own destined burden bear.
Pity from all you now bespeak,
For God has touched you to the quick.
My cordial pity sure you have,
I almost chide the cruel grave
That tore from your unfolding arms
Your virtuous spouse in all her charms
And in its rough and cold embrace
Hath thus usurped her bed-room-place:
Still you'r not left devoid of props,
Your cup retains some precious drops,
Better than wealth or golden mines
The mother in her offspring shines.
The Rev. Bunker Gay wrote some rather famous "poetry!"—Ed.*

NARRATIVE

BY REV. BUNKER GAY,

OF THE

CAPTIVITY

OF MRS. JEMIMA HOWE,

TAKEN BY THE INDIANS AT HINSDALE,
N. H. JULY 27, 1775.

As Caleb Howe, Hilkiah Grout and Benjamin Gaffield, who had been hoeing corn in the meadow, west of the river, were returning home a little before sunset, to a place called Bridgman's Fort, they were fired upon by 12 Indians who had ambushed their path. Howe was on horseback with two young lads, his children, behind him. A ball which broke his thigh, brought him to the ground; his horse ran a few rods and fell likewise, and both the lads were taken. The Indians in their savage manner, coming up to Howe, pierced his body with a spear, tore off his scalp and left him in this forlorn condition. He was found alive the next morning, by a party of men from Fort Hindsdale and being asked by one of the party if he knew him, he answered, "yes I know you all." These were his last words, though he did not expire until his friends had arrived with him at Fort Hindsdale. Grout was so forfortunate as to escape unhurt. But Gaffield in attempting to wade through the river at a place which was indeed fordable at that time, was unfortunately drowned. Flushed with the success they had met with here, the savages went directly to Bridgman's Fort. There was no man in it and only three women and some children—Mrs. Jemima Howe, Mrs. Submit Grout and Mrs. Eunice Gaffield,—their husbands I need not mention again; and their feelings at this junction I will not attempt to describe. They had heard the guns of the enemy but knew not what had happened to their friends. Extremely anxious for their safety they stood longing to embrace them, until at length, concluding from the noise they heard without, that some of them were come, they unbarred the gate in a hurry to receive them, when lo ! to their inexpressible disappointment and surprise, instead of their husbands, in rushed a number of hideous Indians to whom, they and their tender offspring became an easy prey, and from whom they had nothing to expect but either an immediate death or a long and doleful captivity. The latter of these, by the favor of Providence, turned out to be the lot of these unhappy women, and their still more unhappy, because more helpless, children. Mrs. Gaffield had but one, Mrs. Grout three, and Mrs. Howe seven. The eldest of Mrs. Howe's was 11 yrs. old and the youngest but six months. The two eldest were daughters which she had by her first husband, Mr. William Phipps, who was also slain by the Indians, an account of which is given in Mr. Doolittle's history.

It was from this woman that I lately received the foregoing account. She also gave me, I doubt not, a true, though to be sure a very brief and imperfect history of her captivity, which I here insert for your perusal : The Indians, she says, having plundered and put fire to the fort, we marched, as near as I could judge a mile and a half into the woods where we encamped that night. When the morning came and we had advanced as much further, six Indians were sent back to the place of our abode, who collected a little more plunder, and destroyed some other effects that had been left behind, but they did not return until the day was so far spent that it was judged best to continue where we were through the night. Early the next morning, we set off for Canada, and continued our march 8 days successively until we reached the place where the Indians had left their canoes, about 15 miles from Crown Point. This was a long and tedious march, but the captives, by divine assistance were enabled to endure it with less trouble and difficulty than they had reason to expect. From such savage masters in such indigent circumstances, we could not rationally hope for kinder treatment than we received. Some of us, it is true, had a harder lot than others, and among the children, I thought my son, Squire, had the hardest of any. He was then only 4 years old and when we stopped to rest our weary limbs, and he sat down on his master's pack, the savage monster would often knock him off, and sometimes with the handle of his hatchet. Several ugly marks, indented in his head by the cruel Indians, at that tender age, are still plainly to be seen. At length we arrived at Crown Point and took up our quarters there for the space of near a week. In the meantime some of the Indians went to Montreal, and took some of the weary captives along with them with a view of selling them to the French. They did not succeed, however, in finding a market for any of them. They gave my youngest daughter to the Governor DeVandreuil ; had a drunken frolic, and returned again to Crown Point with the rest of the prisoners. From hence we set off for St. Johns in four or five canoes, just as night was coming on, and were soon surrounded with darkness. A heavy storm hung over us, the sound of the rolling thunder was very terrible upon the waters, which at every flash of lightning seemed to be all in a blaze. Yet to this we were indebted for all the light we enjoyed. No object could we discern any longer than the flashes lasted. In this posture we sailed in our open tottering canoes almost the whole of that dreary night. The morning indeed had not yet begun to dawn when we all went ashore, and having collected a heap of sand and gravel for a pillow, I laid myself down, with my tender infant by my side, not knowing where any of my other children were, or what a miserable condition they might be in. The next day, however, under the wing of that ever present and all powerful Providence which had preserved us through the darkness and imminent dangers of the preceding night, we all arrived in safety at St. Johns. Our next movement was to St. Francois, the metropolis, if I may call it, to which the Indians who led us captive, belonged. Soon after our arrival at that wretched capital, a council consisting of the chief Sachem and some principal warriors of the St. Francois tribe was convened, and after the ceremonies usual on such occasions were over, I was conducted and delivered to an old squaw whom the Indians told me I must call my mother. My infant still continued to be the property of its original Indian owners. I was nevertheless permitted to keep it with me a while longer for the sake of saving them the trouble of looking after it. When the weather began to grow cold, shuddering at the prospect of approaching winter, I told my new mother that I did not think it would be possible for me to endure it, if I must spend it with her, and fare as the Indians did. Listening to my repeated and earnest solicitations, that I might be disposed of among some of the French inhabitants of Canada, she at length set off with me and my infant, attended by some male Indians, to Montreal, in hopes of finding a market for me there. But the attempt proved unsuccessful, and the journey tedious indeed. Our provision was so scanty as well as insipid and unsavory, the weather so cold, and the traveling so very bad that it often seemed as if I must have perished on the way. While we were at Montreal, we went into the house of a certain French gentleman, whose lady being sent for and coming into the room, where I was, to examine me, seeing that I had an infant, exclaimed with an oath, I will not buy a woman with a child to look after. There was a swill pail standing near me in which I observed some crusts and crumbs of bread swimming on the surface of the greasy liquor it contained. Sorely pinched with hunger I skimmed them off with my hands and ate them and this was all the refreshment which the house afforded me. Somewhere in the course of this visit to Montreal my Indian mother was so unfortunate as to catch the small pox, of which distemper she died soon after our return, which was by water to St. Francois.

And now came on the season when the Indians began to prepare for a winter's hunt. I was ordered to return my poor child to those who still claimed it as their property. This was a severe trial. The babe clung to my bosom with all its might, but I was obliged to pluck it thence, and deliver it shrieking and screaming enough to penetrate a heart of stone, into the hands of those unfeeling wretches whose tender mercies may be termed cruel. It was soon carried off by a hunting party of those Indians to a place called Messiskon,* at the lower end of Lake

*Missisquoi, probably. There was an Indian village by that name on both sides of the river and small bay of Missisquoi, in Swanton at the foot of Canada, next north of St. Albans. See in Vol. iv, this work, page 960. Mr. Perry who gives the Indian History of this vicinity states that one of the children of Mrs. Howe lived here.

Champlain, whither, in about a month after, it was my fortune to follow them, and here I found it, it is true, but in a condition that afforded me no great satisfaction, it being greatly emaciated and almost starved. I took it in my arms, put its face to mine, and it instantly bit me with such violence that it seemed as if I must have parted with a piece of my cheek. I was permitted to lodge with it, that and the two following nights, but every morning that intervened, the Indians, I suppose on purpose to torment me, sent me away to another wigwam which stood at a little distance, though not so far from the one in which my distressed infant was confined but that I could plainly hear its incessant cries and heartrending lamentations. In this deplorable condition I was obliged to take my leave of it, on the morning of the third day after my arrival at the place. We moved down the lake several miles the same day, and the night following was remarkable on account of the great earthquake which terribly shook that howling wilderness. Among the islands hereabouts we spent the winter season, often shifting our quarters, and roving about from one place to another, our family consisting of three persons only beside myself, viz: my late mother's daughter, her sanhop and a papoose.

They once left me alone two dismal nights and when they returned to me again, perceiving them smile to each other, I asked them what is the matter? They replied that two of my children were no more, one of which, they said, died a natural death and the other was knocked on the head. I did not utter many words, but my heart was sorely pained within me, and my mind exceedingly troubled with strange and awful ideas. I often imagined, for instance, that I plainly saw the naked bodies of my deceased children hanging upon the limbs of the trees, as the Indians are wont to hang the rawhides of those beasts which they take in hunting. It was not long, however, before it was so ordered by kind Providence that I should be relieved in a good measure from those horrid imaginations, for as I was walking one day upon the ice, observing a smoke at some distance upon the land, it must proceed, thought I, from the fire of some Indian hut, and who knows but that some of my poor children may be there. My curiosity thus excited, led me to the place, and there I found my son Caleb, a little boy between two and three years old, whom I had lately buried in sentiment, at least, or rather imagined to have been deprived of life and perhaps denied a decent grave. I found him likewise in tolerable health and circumstances, under the protection of a fond Indian mother, and moreover had the happiness of lodging with him in my arms one joyful night.

Again we shipped our quarters, and when we had traveled 8 or 10 miles upon the snow and ice, came to a place where the Indians manufactured sugar, which they extracted from maple trees.

Here an Indian came to visit us whom I knew and who could speak English. He asked me why I did not go to visit my son Squire. I replied that I had lately been informed that he was dead. He assured me that he was yet alive and but two or three miles off, on the opposite side of the lake. At my request, he gave me the best directions he could to the place of his abode. I resolved to embrace the first opportunity that offered, of endeavoring to search it out. While I was busy in contemplating this affair the Indians obtained a little bread, of which they gavd me a small share. I did not take a morsel of it myself, but saved it all for my poor child, if I should be so lucky as to find him.

At length, having obtained of my keepers leave to be absent for one day, I set off early in the morning, and steering as well as I could according to the directions the Indian gave me, I soon found the place he had so accurately marked out.

I beheld, as I drew nigh, my little son without the camp, but he looked, thought I, like a starved and mangy puppy, that had been wallowing in the ashes. I took him in my arms, and he, spoke to me these words: "Mother are you come!" I took him into the wigwam with me, and observing a number of Indian children in it, I distributed all the bread, which I had reserved for my own child, among them all, otherwise I should have given them great offence.

My little boy appeared to be not very fond of his new mother; kept as near me as possible while I stayed, and when I told him I must go he fell as though he had been knocked with a club. But having recommended him to the care of Him who made him, when the day was far spent, and the time would permit me to stay no longer, I departed, you may well suppose, with a heavy load at my heart.

The tidings I had received of the death of my youngest child had a little before been confirmed beyond a doubt, but I could not mourn so heartily for the deceased as for the living child.

When the winter broke up we removed to St. Johns, and through the ensuing summer our principal residence was at no great distance from the fort at that place. In the mean time, however, my sister's husband, having gone with a scouting party to some of the English settlements, had a drunken frolic at the fort. When he returned his wife who never got drunk, but had often experienced the ill effects of her husband's intemperance, fearing what the consequences might be if he should come home in a morose and turbulent humor, to avoid his insolence proposed that we should both retire and keep out the reach of it, until the storm abated. We absconded accordingly, but it so happened that I returned and ventured into his presence before his wife had presumed to come nigh him. I found him in his wigwam, and in a surly mood, and not being able to revenge upon his wife because she was not at home, he laid hold of me and hurried me to the fort, and for a trifling consideration sold me to a French gentleman whose name was Saccabee. It is an ill wind certainly that blows nobody any good.

I had been with the Indians a year lacking 14 days, and if not for my sister, yet for me it was a lucky circumstance indeed which thus at last snatched, in an unexpected moment, out of their hands and placed me beyond the reach of their insolent power.

After my Indian master had disposed of me in this manner, and the moment of sober reflection had arrived, perceiving that the man who bought me had taken the advantage of him in an unguarded hour, his resentment began to kindle, and his indignation rose so high that he threatened to kill me if he should meet me alone, or if he could not revenge himself thus that he would set fire to the fort. I was therefore secreted in an upper chamber and the fort carefully guarded until his wrath had time to cool.

My service in the family to which I was advanced was perfect freedom in comparison with what it had been among the barbarous Indians. My new master and mistress were both as kind and generous toward me as I could reasonably expect. I seldom asked a favor of either of them but that it was readily granted. In consequence of which I had it in my power in many instances to administer aid and refreshment to the poor prisoners of my own nation, who were brought into St. Johns during my abode in the family of the benevolent and hospitable Saccabee. Yet even in this family difficulties awaited me I had little reason to expect, and I stood in need of a large stock of prudence to enable me to encounter them. In this I was greatly assisted by the governor and Col. Schuyler, who was then a prisoner. I was moreover under unspeakable obligations to the governor on another account; I had received intelligence from my daughter Mary, the purport of which was that there was a prospect of her being shortly married to a young Indian of the tribe of St. Francois, with which tribe she had continued from the beginning of her captivity. These were heavy tidings and added greatly to the poignancy of my other afflictions. However, not long after I had heard this melancholy news, an opportunity presented of acquainting that humane and generous gentleman, the commander-in-chief and my illustrious benefactor, with this affair also, who, in compassion for my sufferings and to mitigate my sorrows, issued his orders in good time and had my daughter taken away from the Indians and conveyed to the same nunnery where her sister was then lodged, with his express injunction that they should both be well looked after and carefully educated as his adopted children. In this school they continued, while the war, in those days between France and Great Britain, lasted.

At the conclusion of which war, the Governor went home to France, took my oldest daughter along with him and married her there to a French gentleman whose name was Cron Lewis. He was at Boston with the fleet under Count de Estang (1778) and was one of his clerks.

My other daughter continuing in the nunnery. A considerable time after my return from captivity had elapsed, when I made a journey to Canada, resolving to use my best endeavors not to return without her. I arrived just in time to prevent her being sent to France. She was to have gone in the next vessel that sailed for that place. And I found it extremely difficult to prevail with her to quit the nunnery and go home with me. Yea, she absolutely refused, and all the persuasions and arguments I could use with her were to no effect, until after I had been to the Governor and obtained a letter from him to the superintendent of the nuns, in which he threatened, if my daughter should not be delivered immediately into my hands, or could not be prevailed with to submit to my parental authority, that he would send a band of soldiers to assist me in bringing her away. But so extremely bigoted was she to the customs and religion of the place, that, after all, she left it with the greatest reluctance, and the most bitter lamentation, which she continued as we passed the streets and wholly refused to be comforted. My good friend, Major Small, whom we met with on the way, tried all he could to console her, and was so very kind and obliging as to bear us company and carry my daughter behind him on horseback. But I have run on a little before my story, for I have not yet informed you of the means and manner of my own redemption, to the accomplishing of which, the recovery of my daughter, just mentioned, and the ransoming of some of my other children, several gentlemen of note contributed not a little, to whose goodness therefore I am greatly indebted, and sincerely hope I shall never be so ungrateful as to forget it. Col. Schuyler, in particular, was so very kind and generous as to advance 2700 livres to procure a ransom for myself and three of my children. He accompanied and conducted us from Montreal to Albany and entertained us in the most friendly and hospitable manner a considerable time, at his own house, and I believe entirely at his own expense.

ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF ENSIGN SAMUEL STRATTON.

BY THE REVEREND BUNKER GAY.

Would you on rural dainties fatten,
Be sure to pattern Ensign Stratton :
Of those who on earth's surface dwell,
Few lived so long and lived so well.
Placed in that class that props the nation,
(For farming was his occupation)
In this 'tis owned by those who knew him,

But few could equal, none outdo him.
 Healthy and strong the tools to wield
 To clear and cultivate the field,
 He, by the vigor of his arm,
 Soon realized a fertile farm.
 With good success furnished his house,
 First with a virtuous, loving spouse,
 Then with a likely, sturdy son,
 Greatly beloved; they had but one—
 He in due time procured a wife,
 The crown and comfort of his life:
 In course three lovely daughters came,
 For each a sacred love the same.
 Thus did this family increase;
 All lived together and in peace.
 With this fond group encompassed round,
 The good man felt his joys abound,
 And cheerfully his toil pursued,
 Inspired with love and gratitude.
 A hunter bred he loved to run,
 Equipped with powder-horn and gun,
 When he'd return with a huge pack
 Enough to break another's back;
 Yea, oft from hunting the wild bees
 Come laden from the honey'd trees.
 In such amusing hunting tours,
 He only spent his leisure hours,
 So that in this there was no harm,
 Since in good time he kept his farm
 And raised enough of farmer's fare,
 Both for his own and some to spare.
 He kept a hospitable hall,
 Free to refresh and comfort all
 Who visited his friendly dwelling,
 If rich, or if not worth a shilling;
 His liberal heart and bounteous hands
 Were always open to his friends.
 Thus uniformly kind and steady,
 To every social duty ready,
 They took delight in doing good
 As every honest Christian should;
 Of pure religion ne'er thought lightly;
 Chose wisdom's ways and walked up-rightly.

But hitherto my pen displays
 Only his bright and happy days,
 Others replete with clustering woes,
 As we proceed we shall disclose.
 This world wherever fancy ranges
 Is liable to frequent changes.
 Grief may endure a night, forlorn,
 And gladness crown returning morn;
 Joy reign to-day and yet to-morrow
 Be dashed with overwhelming sorrow;
 This latter mortals not a few
 By sad experience find too true;
 Thus was our hero often tried;
 In him this truth was verified:
 Who without weeping can relate
 The story of his dismal fate;
 A train of evils then begun
 When death deprived him of his son,
 His only son, his Absalom,
 The joy and sunshine of his home.
 One woe is passed, another comes;
 No flower on earth for ages blooms;
 Many still fade in every clime,
 Cut down and withered in their prime.

And so it fares in every place
 With many of the human race:
 So to be sure it fared with one,
 Who tasted death as has been shown
 So too with his all lovely widow.
 Ah! what is life? a fleeting shadow,
 As sketched above you've seen the end
 Of her unhappy bosom friend;
 The tears for him were scarcely dried,
 Death took and lodged her by his side;
 And by this sudden, awful stroke,
 Their parents hearts were almost broke;
 And thus he twice severely tried,
 Still other trials had to abide:
 For soon the Almighty with a stroke
 His wife, his long loved object took.
 From his dim eyes and withered arms.
 This world appeared to have no charms,
 But though of almost all bereft,
 He'd still one precious comfort left,
 His Roxalana, lovely one!
 Daughter of his deceased son,
 But, Oh! what earthly joys abide?
 To him this comfort was denied.
 The seasons oft grow dark and rainy,
 Alas! the lovely Roxalana
 Came like a flower that blooms in May
 And like a shadow passed away.
 Of this sweet comfort thus bereft,
 No brother dear or sister left.
 The world's enjoyments fast decrease,
 Death's harbingers alone increase.
 When nearly all earth's joys had fled
 In death he bowed his hoary head,
 To him a crown of glory here,
 No friend for him need drop a tear.

REV. T. F. ROGERS.

A full biographical notice of this worthy minister was written soon after his decease by one who knew him well and appreciated him truly, Rev. A. M. Bridge. From his account we shall make some extracts, and speak of Mr. Rogers more particularly in connection with his labors in Vernon. He was born in Tewksbury, Mass., Mar. 18, 1781. In childhood he was surrounded by circumstances favorable to forming a character of virtue and goodness. He was not a strong child, and perhaps for that reason was more under the care of his mother (who was many years a widow) of whose goodness and counsel he ever spoke in terms of grateful remembrance. He attended the common schools; fitted for college at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., and entered the university at Cambridge in 1798.

A classmate and intimate friend speaks in high terms of the rare purity of his character. He had been brought up in the orthodox faith, in the most rigid forms, but by further inquiry and closer examinations of religious subjects, he was lead to adopt a more liberal faith. At the close of his collegiate course he studied theology, a profession that had always been his aim and choice.

He preached acceptably in Bernardston, Mass., and was ordained pastor of the society there Sept. 20, 1809.

In May, 1810, he married Miss Mary Pierce of Woburn, Mass. For several years his ministry was prosperous, and his home the abode of quiet and happiness. Then he was called to endure severe trials. His wife was afflicted with mental derangement, more or less severe for 30 years, up to the time of her death in 1846.

In 1822, the spirit of division, then so general, entered his society and Mr. Rogers was charged with having changed his sentiments and not preaching the gospel. He met this charge in his customary calm, forbearing manner, being conscious of having preached the same gospel he ever did. But all were not satisfied, eleven families withdrew and formed themselves into a new society.

It was found necessary to remove their meeting-house and build it anew. It was dedicated Jan. 12, 1828. The old society became too enfeebled to give their pastor an adequate support, therefore he cheerfully sought employment for a part of the time elsewhere, and went forth a welcome missionary to many destitute places within twenty miles. He was also employed more than sixteen years by the Massachusetts Evangelical Missionary Society and by the Society for propagating the gospel among the Indians and others in North America.

In 1825, he commenced preaching in Vernon; his services were continued many years. His pastoral connection and labors in Bernardston remained unchanged.

In the autumn of 1843, an attack of paralysis compelled him to relinquish his labors. His life of devotedness cast a radiance of glory on the clouded days of debility and pain. He died Jan. 26, 1847.

AMOS TUTE

was born Apr. 17, 1730, and died aged 60 years. He was a man 6 feet, 7 in. in height, broad shoulders and of well developed form, athletic and of strong mind and good features. He married Mrs. Jemima Howe on her return from captivity, who retained her youthful beauty to so great an extent that she received the appellation of the fair captive. They had two children whom they buried. Mr. Tute belonged to a company of rangers stationed at Hinsdale Fort in 1757. In 1768, he was appointed coroner for Cumberland County by a commission from Cadwallader Colden, Lieut. Gov. of the Province of New York, which office he held until the breaking out of the War of the Revolution. He is said to have shouldered 4½ bushels of salt, standing in a half bushel, to show his strength.

EPITAPH

In Memory of

Mr. Amos Tute

Who died April 17th

1790 in the 60th

year of his Age.

Were I so tall to Reach the Pole
Or grasp the ocean with my span;
I must be measured by my soul,
The mind's the standard of the man.

MRS. JEMIMA TUTE

Successively relict of Messrs.

William Phipps, Caleb Howe & Amos Tute.

The two first were killed by the Indians

Phipps July 5th 1743

Howe July 27th 1755

When Howe was killed she & her children

Then seven in number

Were carried into captivity

The oldest, a daughter, went to France

And was married to a French Gentleman

The youngest was torn from her Breast

And perished with hunger

By the aid of some benevolent Gentlemen

And her own personal Heroism

She recovered the rest

She had two by her last Husband

Outlived both him and them

And died March 7th 1805 aged 82

Having passed through more vicissitudes

And endured more hardships

Than any of her cotemporaries

No more can Savage foes annoy

Nor aught her wide spread fame destroy

EBENEZER SCOTT.

The first white male child born in Bernardston (now Vernon) Sept. 18, 1742, was taken by the Indians when 3 years old, together with his mother and three brothers (one an infant), carried to Montreal and sold to the French, and was taken from there to Quebec jail, where his mother and brothers died, prisoners of the French.

He returned to his father in Bernardston when 8 years old and had lost our language and spoke French. He married Miss Love Fairman, from Conn., Mar. 12, 1772; served in the War of the Revolution, and drew a pension therefor. He settled, lived, and died Mar. 4, 1826, on the place now occupied by his grandson.

AMASA WRIGHT,

one of the early early settlers, lived in the west part of Vernon. He was a tall, athletic man. The Indians had many times chased him, with the hope of getting him alive, to torture, according to their custom. While men were picketing Fort Hinsdale in 1755, they were attacked by the Indians, one man was captured, two killed and scalped, and two reached the fort, and Mr. Wright and his companion saved themselves by flight. At another time, Mr. Wright was surprised by Indians while at work in Pe Chague meadow; both running at full speed, the foremost Indian said, "me got you this time." Mr. Wright, reaching the gate of the fort, placed his hand on the top, and cleared it at one leap, but the Indians could not do it. Abishai, his son, died in 1860, aged 88 years.

JOHN JACOB PEELER

died Mar. 24, 1815, in his 70th year. He enlisted in the British army for 5 years. He and two others left the fort commanded by Gen. Campbell, without receiving their discharge; were pursued by John Hare, captured, brought back, tried by court martial, and sentenced, each, to receive 999 lashes upon the naked back, with a cat-o-nine tails, and after a blow the lashes were straightened before another was given.

One of the three died before he had received the complement and the rest were inflicted afterward; the other died three days after his chastisement.

Mr. Peeler said he should have died, if he had not crawled from his bunk around the floor. His comrade said he could not do it. Mr. Peeler told them he should desert when he recovered, and when he was sent to a swamp with a bog-hoe, he left again and was not again found. He then enlisted in the American army in the Revolutionary War. At the battle of Bunker Hill, he took a powder-horn from a British soldier, which is now in the possession of A. H. Washburn. His daughter said his back was one solid scar.

CAPT. JERIJAH THAYER, born in Bolton, Conn., Apr. 22, 1762, came to Vernon in 1787. During the Revolution, when his elder brother enlisted in the American army, he was but 14 years old, and being short and small of his age could not be accepted. He was much disappointed and impatiently waited two years when they could not refuse him. On his 16th birthday, his weight being but 90 lbs. he left home for camp, joined the army and served his country three years, until it was freed from British rule. When twenty-two, he married Cynthia Case of Coventry, Conn., and moved to Gill, Mass., and three years after to Vernon; stopping at a little clearing in the "Basin," among the hills, where he built him a framed house. He lived here and reared a family of seven children and died June 15, 1857, aged 95 years. He was for some time the only surviving Revolutionary pensioner in Windham county.

DEA. JOHN LEE

was born in Killingly, Conn., during the reign of George 3d, in 1771; died Feb. 13, 1868, aged 96 years 8 months. He came to Vernon with his parents when eight years old. Polly Peeler (daughter of John Jacob Peeler) was born in Walpole, N. H., in 1777; whence she removed to Greenfield in early life; thence to Vernon, Vt.; was married to Mr. Lee, March 9, 1798, by Judge Bridgman; had 12 children,—three died in infancy; one went to Michigan; one to Connecticut; two to Massachusetts and four lived in Vermont; one, Eli, while traveling in Wisconsin was murdered. There were 46 grandchildren and 23 great-grandchildren (1869).

Mr. Lee resided most of his life on the homestead now owned by his son, George W. For 20 years he followed boating on the Connecticut River and voted at every presidential election except the first, until his death. When Mrs. Lee was 83 years old, she went to the residence of her youngest daughter, then 40 years old, and taught her to spin. March 9, 1864, the 66th anniversary of their wedding-day was celebrated by the assembling of 150 persons, mostly relatives, at the homestead. Mr. Lee wished for death, made arrangements for his funeral, and quietly passed away. Mrs. Lee died a few years after.

JUDGE LOVEWELL JOHNSON.

Lovewell Johnson, son of Isaac and Dinah Johnson of Vernon, resided in town until about 1812, when he went to New York. He married Rebecca Stebbins of this town, daughter of Elijah and sister of Capt. Elijah.

Judge Johnson and wife, Rebecca, spent most of their time in Vernon for several years previous to their deaths in 1859. The following was taken from a central New York paper:

"Died at Vernon, August 12, Lovewell Johnson, aged 76 years, 5 months. Thus has suddenly passed from our midst one of the most talented, wealthiest, and most remarkable men in Central New York. His immense estate accumulated by his frugality, energy and sagacity, without the aid of ancestral wealth or lucky speculation, affords the most positive proof that he was no ordinary man. Judge Johnson removed from Hoosic to Palermo at so early a day as to be ranked among the early settlers of that town. He located upon a farm, but studied and engaged in the practice of law. His previous studies, though prosecuted mainly without a teacher, embraced those branches usually pursued in an academic education. His acquaintance with them was distinguished for its thoroughness and qualified him well for the work of teaching, which he for a time pursued. As a lawyer, he manifested clearness of perception, sound common sense, and indefatigable perseverance. For several years he held the office of county judge and discharged its duties with ability. He would unquestionably have attained a wide celebrity as a lawyer had not his increasing property demanded his principal attention. The later years of his life were given to the management of his estate, to the entire abandonment of all legal practice. His business accuracy and integrity we never heard questioned, and he certainly manifested a commendable lenity to his debtors, so long as he was satisfied of their disposition fairly to acknowledge and discharge their obligations. He abhorred laziness and was intolerant of fraud; was himself simple in habits, unobtrusive in manners, energetic in business, prompt and remarkably exact in the performance of his slightest promises as well as his obligations, was scrupulously honest, kind in his feelings and actively sympathetic with those in distress. The day of his death afforded us a striking illustration of the frailty of man and the sudden vicissitudes of life. On Friday morning, we took from the postoffice a letter from Judge Johnson indicating his usual health, and while we were reading it a telegram announcing his dangerous illness was received, and yet later, we learned of his death the same day. Willard, his only surviving son, reached the bedside of his father on the morning of his death. His wife died two days after, August 14th, aged 75 years, 4 months.

RUFUS ELMER,

son of Rufus, grandson of Reuben and great-grandson of Jacob Elmer, one of the early settlers of Vernon, died at San Francisco, Jan. 8, 1870, of heart disease. A letter states that he was conscious to the last; said he was prepared to die. No man has lived in this city for the last generation who was more widely known, or that had the confidence of the community to a greater degree than Rufus Elmer. He was emphatically a radical on all subjects, generally living ahead of his age and always ready to defend his cause. Those who did not agree with him, could but respect his earnestness and integrity to what he believed right. He was born in Vernon, moved in early life to Woodstock, Conn., where he engaged in shoe manufacturing.

GEORGE HOWE,

eldest son of Hon. Ebenezer Howe, jr., and great-grand-son of Capt. Moses Howe, who was taken by the Indians when a lad, and great-grand-son of Caleb Howe, killed by Indians, July 27, 1755, and the husband of the "fair captive," and great great-grand-son of Josiah Sartwell (the builder of Sartwell's Fort, 1737) was born in Vernon, July 4, 1824.

In 1845 he entered the law department of Harvard University and graduated in 1847, with the degree of Bachelor of laws; closed his preparatory studies as a law student in the office of Hon. W. C. Bradley at Westminster; was admitted to the bar of Windham county, 1847; spent several years in California; on his return located at Brattleboro and commenced the practice of law in 1853; was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of the United States in 1856; was States Attorney, 1858-59; was appointed U. S. Attorney for the district of Vermont by President Lincoln in 1861; has also held many other offices and positions of trust; succeeded in obtaining an appointment in the Pension Department of the Government, and removed from Brattleboro about 1880.

EBENEZER MILLER, M. D.,

born in Vernon, Oct. 4, 1822, son of Ebenezer and Ama Miller, and the youngest of eight children. His great-grandfather was Isaac Miller, one of the early settlers of Dummerston, Vt. His father died when he was seven years of age. He obtained a good scientific and classical education, attending the academies at West Brattleboro, Northfield and Shelburne Falls, obtaining means to pursue his education by teaching, which he successfully did in the towns of Guilford, Vernon and Hinsdale, N. H. He commenced the study of medicine in 1838, with Dr. Cyrus Washburn; attended medical lectures at Hanover, N. H., New York City and Castleton, Vt.; graduated from Castleton Medical College in 1843; married Lucia A. Whithed of Vernon, and commenced the practice of medicine in Guilford in 1844; removed to Halifax soon after and remained 11 years; removed to St. Paul, Minn. Oct. 1857. He opened a drug store in Natches, Miss., in 1863; after the close of the war, left his store in care of his eldest son; went to New Orleans, and thence with a large stock of goods to Homer City, on a branch of the Red river, where in a few weeks he was taken with a disease peculiar to that climate and died July 21, 1865, far from home and relatives, yet his last hours were cheered by the presence of friends and his wants ministered to by members of the Masonic order to which he belonged. His widow and four children still reside at St. Paul; his sons, Nelson D. and Charles M. are civil engineers. Clinton C., a physician in the city, and his daughter principal of one of the city schools.

SAMUEL LUKE PARSONS,

born Oct. 30, 1831; his grandfather, Andrew Parsons, the son of a British sea captain, and a nephew of Chief Justice Theophilus Parsons, was an early settler of Vernon; coming from Connecticut at the close of the war of the Revolution, in which he was a soldier, he purchased a portion of the Howe grant and cleared himself a home. He there reared a large family of children, the youngest of four sons, Samuel being the subject of this sketch. His children were Hannah, Samuel, Luke and John. At 15 years of age, Luke went to the academy at Bernardston, Mass. He also attended school at West Brattleboro, teaching school winters; at twenty he was prepared to enter the Sophomore class at Amherst; receiving an offer from his cousin, Andrew Parsons, acting governor of Michigan, to become his successor in legal practice, when admitted, he commenced the study of law and did not go to Amherst. At twenty-three he was admitted to the bar, and the following year elected Circuit Court Commissioner, an office having the powers and duties of Judge at Chambers and Master in Chancery. At this time he was married to Miss Sarah Cook, daughter of Madison Cook of Ypsilanti, Miss. In 1858, Mr. Cook died, leaving a large property in Detroit. Mr. Parsons was made attorney of the estate and resigned his office and went to Detroit where he was attacked with a disease common to that climate. He then returned to Vermont to regain his health, and resided with his father until the outbreak of the war of the Rebellion. He first enlisted in the 16th Vt. Vols. and was immediately promoted to Sergeant, and afterwards to 1st Sergeant for meritorious conduct at the battle of Gettysburg. When this regiment was disbanded, he entered the service in the Gulf Department at Quartermaster Sergeant. He went to New Orleans, touching at Cuba. He met Senor Don Bernards, Master of the Knights of Freedom (or defenders of the Monroe doctrine). He wrote at this time an epic poem, entitled, "Atlantis on the Heiress," in ten cantos, being a story of the island of Cuba and tropical America, which he has read in several cities and been very favorably mentioned by the press. His corps was then transferred to the Shenandoah valley. He was disabled at Cedar Creek and conveyed to Annapolis, where on his recovery, he was given charge of a ward at the Navy Yard Hospital; having care of the sick and wounded soldiers from Libby and Andersonville. He remained here until the expiration of his term of service and the war closed, when he returned to Michigan, purchased a farm near Detroit and resumed his practice at the Detroit bar.

HIRAM E. JOHNSON,

son of Hiram Johnson, born at Vernon, Dec. 17, 1834; fitted for college under the instruction of Prof. L. F. Ward at Saxtons River and Westminster; began the study of medicine with Dr. E. C. Cross at Brattleboro in 1854; attended medical lectures at Berkshire Medical College, Pittsfield, Mass.; graduated at Castleton Medical College, June 17, 1857; began the practice of medicine at Halifax where he remained eight years, (excepting some time which he spent in hospitals in vicinity of Washington, D. C., also at Bellevue Hospital, N. Y. City, where he gained a thorough knowledge of practical surgery); in spring of 1865, removed to Hale, Ill.; two years later went to Weston, Ill.; built the first house in town; opened a drug-store and had a remunerative practice, also held the office of post-master and land agent.

SOLOMON THAYER STREETER, born May 28, 1841, in Vernon, son of Noyes Streeter, who has always lived in Vernon, fitted for college at Bernardston, Mass., and Exeter, N. H.; entered Amherst College in 1863, and graduated, 1867; having paid his way chiefly by his own labors. His health failed and he immediately went to Europe to regain, if possible, in travel, his failing health. He visited Scotland, England, France, Switzerland and Germany, and returned in the autumn, restored to health; began the study of law at the Columbia College Law School and was admitted to the New York bar the following May. He graduated from the Law School, 1869, and began the practice of his profession in New York City, and still continues at the same place.

EDWARD EASTMAN FROST, D. M. D.,

born at Vernon, Nov. 8, 1849. In 1864, he went to New York and attended Thomson's Business College one year, and the 13th St. High School two years. In 1869 he commenced the study of dentistry with Dr. J. B. Walker, at Worcester, Mass.; entered Harvard Dental School 1870; graduated, 1874; returned to Worcester and practiced one year with Dr. Gould; opened an office, Mar. 18, 1875, himself, and is still practicing his profession at Worcester.

He traveled in Europe extensively in 1878, visiting the most noted places of interest in England, Ireland, Switzerland, Germany and France.

HAMILTON LEE WHITED, A. B.,

GEO. F. BARBER, D. D. S.,

born at West Northfield, Mass., Dec. 1, 1854, came to Vernon in 1865; attended school at Power's Institute, Bernardston, Mass., and Goddard Seminary, Barre, Vt. He entered the Philadelphia Dental College, Cor. 10th and Arch Sts., and graduated therefrom 1881; commenced the practice of his profession at Fitchburg, Mass., May, 1881, and remained till Nov. 1883, when his health failing him, he came to Vernon, and now, 1885, is in successful practice of his profession here.

SWIFT WATERMAN.

A large portion of the merchandise and productions of the eastern part of the State were formerly transported in flat bottomed boats upon the Connecticut river from Hartford, Conn., to the northern part of Vermont. Their capacity for many years was from 10 to 20 tons, until they were increased in size to carry from 30 to 40 tons. Three men would take the boat from Hartford to the foot of swift water, at the foot of Clary's Island, then it required 10 extra men to take the boat the next 10 miles over swift water. These swift-water-men were a hardy, energetic, jolly set of men, ready at a moment's warning, and each received for pay $1.50 to Brattleboro, or $2.00 up to Leavitt's Rock, except during a few years just before the cars began to do business, when the pay was increased 50 cents to each place. They used white ash setting-poles with a heavy spike in the end, and when there was a strong south wind they could sail a large part of the way. At "Brattleboro tunnel" they drew the boat with a windlass, and at Leavitt's Rock with oxen. The pay was always the same, and when the wind was favorable, they could make two trips a day to Brattleboro. There was also another set of men on the New Hampshire side of the river. They usually returned in a skiff loaded to its full capacity. Erring brothers were often tried by a court of swift watermen, in the usual form of sheriff, judge and jury, and the charge to the jury was sometimes given in this way:

"Gentlemen of the jury—You have heard the testimony of the witnesses and the pleading of the counsel on both sides. You will retire to your room, and after due consideration if you find the accused guilty, say guilty, and say no more, and on the other hand if you find him not guilty, say guilty and say no more."

So the accused was brought in guilty, and fined one gallon, and his accomplice, as appeared by the testimony having a hand in the offense, would be fined two gallons. As this town is the only one in this state having need of the services of swift watermen, we append a list of those who served during the last years of flat-boating.

Capt. Moses Howe; Ebenezer Howe; Ebenezer Howe, Jr.; Josiah Howe; Samuel Brooks; Samuel Brooks, Jr.; Capt. Rufus Brooks; Simeon Bishop; Capt. Benj. Bishop; Ezra Clark; Hosea Clark; Samuel Clark, Jr.; Zenas Cutler; Rufus Elmer; Sude Fairman; Zerah K. Fairman; Asa Fairman; Elijah Fairman; Jonathan B. STEAMBOATS.

The first steamboat, called the Barnet, (Rufus Robinson, Pilot) was built in 1827; was 75 feet long, 14 1-2 feet wide and was to run from Hartford, Conn., to Bellows Falls. It ran only about 2 years. The John Ledyard was built in 1830, of still greater power, and next the William Holmes, Capt. James Davenport of Hinsdale, N. H. Rufus Robinson pilot the first year and Capt. Sumner Titus the second year—it ran in 1831 and 1832. About the same time Capt. Blanchard built a steamboat to run from Bellows Falls to McIndoes Falls, called the Vermont. It was 80 feet long, and 14 wide and drawing only 12 or 15 inches of water. The stroke of the piston was horizontal and the power of the engine 120 horse. These steamboats were intended to tow the fall boats, where the water was not too swift; and they would take along three at once.

STAGE LINE.

Hon. Ginery Twichell of Massachusetts was proprietor of the stage route through this town and from Worcester, Mass., to Greenfield, Keene, N. H., and to Brattleboro, from 1837 until the Vt. and Mass. R. R. came into operation, and about 12 years after.

RAIL ROAD.

The first ground broke in Vernon for the Vt. and Mass. R. R. was Nov. 12, 1847, on the Col. Patterson farm now owned by Nathaniel Brooks, Jan. 1, 1849. Three engines and cars came to South Vernon on the Conn. R. R. from Greenfield, the first in town, Jan. 16, 1849. An engine crossed Northfield bridge to South Vernon on the Vt. and Mass. R. R., Jan. 30. An engine came to Vernon Center, Feb. 12, then went to Brattleboro, and the 20th was the opening celebration of the road. Two engines and fifteen cars came from Boston, and one engine and three cars from Greenfield. Three or four thousand people came from adjoining towns, making five or six thousand people in all.

A REMARKABLE INCIDENT.

A few years previous to the running of the Vt. and Mass. R. R. through Vernon, Marshall Whithed, merchant of this place, in company with a Hartford, Conn., man and another at White River, Vt., did most of the boating upon the Connecticut river for several years. The proprietor at Hartford furnished one Quin, a skipper of one of the company boats, money sufficient to bear the expenses, lockage, etc., to Vernon. When he was crossing the fishing-ground near Suffield, Conn., he reported to his comrade that he had lost his pocket-book overboard, money and bills of goods. When Mr. Whithed settled with him, he paid him minus the amount paid him at Hartford. Quin then sued Whithed, and the court was in session when a messenger brought into court the identical pocket book tied with a string and a stone tied to the end of the string. It was discovered by fishermen, attached to their seine while fishing for shad, having lain in the river through the winter. The bills were all correct, but no money was found. Quin immediately disappeared and absented himself for many years.

THE WOLF.

In May, 1808, a wolf was discovered in Vernon, by the havoc he made among sheep. One Saturday night he killed and wounded 14 sheep. Sunday morning he was seen by Wm. Newhall in the edge of a forest two or three miles from where he killed the sheep. Newhall gave the alarm, and by two o'clock he was surrounded by the people of Vernon and vicinity. Dr. Washburn and Gen. Hunt rode around the ring and gave the orders to march and each man to keep his right and left comrades in view. The circle grew rapidly smaller and three shots hit him. John Chase and Jonathan Parks of Gill, secured the skin and it was made into two drum heads. After the hunt, the people gathered at Dr. Washburn's and partook of a substantial collation.

A HEMLOCK TREE.

In 1809 or 1810, Eli Lee cut a hemlock tree and in felling it discovered within three or four inches of the heart that the bark had been hewed off and the wound closed over it. Outside of the wound he counted 190 rings.

THE VERNON CANNON

was a twenty four cylinder revolver invented by Cyrus Dodge of Dummerston. The proprietors were Col. J. F. Burrows of Vernon, Col. Geo. B. Kellogg and Col. S. M. Wait of Brattleboro. It was cast by Cyrus Alger of Boston, Mass., and made at the machine shop of Geo. Newman and son of Brattleboro, under the supervision of Jacob Marsh, and put together at Vernon in 1859. It was tested by a committee of investigation, (sent by Congress under the direction of Jefferson Davis, chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate of the U. S. and Gov. Floyd, Secretary of War), consisting of Maj. Thornton, Capt. Manerlin, and Lieutenant Balch. It cost $6,000 and weighed over twenty tons.

FALLS FIGHT TOWNSHIP

ANDLY MEAR INISTERS.

The first settled minister of Fall Town was the

from Windham, Conn., ordained in 1741, and on account of the unsettled state of the times, was dismissed 1745. While afterwards, acting as chaplain at a fort near Hoosic, he was taken captive by the French and Indians and carried into Canada.

The French war began in 1755 and as the inhabitants resided mostly in Burke's Fort, there was no minister until 1761, when was settled. In 1762, the town was incorporated Bernardston. During the Revolutionary war the town furnished its full quota of men and Mr. Wright's salary was much neglected. A tax was raised, and the constable paid off Mr. Wright in continental bills depreciated in value to nearly 0. Mr. Wright asked compensation for this depreciated value of his salary during seven years of hard labor as pastor, and the town refused and by his own request he was dismissed.

In December 1783,

was ordained; when the ministers were assembled in session the evening previous to the ordination, it was ascertained the minister selected to preach the ordination sermon was absent. This duty was placed upon Rev. Bunker Gay; said he: "I have made no preparation for this occasion;" but it was decided not to excuse him, so he officiated and took for his text: "There is death in the pot," II Kings, 40, (presumably on account of an acquaintance with Mr. Cook).

When Mr. Cook had officiated until the people were satisfied of his general habits and character, they convened a council for his dismissal. Mr. Wright, still a resident and present at the council, and in company with some of his former brethren of the clergy who were acquainted with the circumstances of his separation from his people, enquired if, in their opinion, he ought, with other members of this church and congregation, to clothe himself in sackcloth and sprinkle ashes on his head, in mourning, at the prospect of their being left destitute of a minister, or whether he was not rather entitled to a song of exultation over his neighbors, in remembrance of the circumstances of his separation from them.

Rev. Bunker Gay replied, "Sing, Sing."

Mr. Wright observed that he was no singer; but only spoke metaphorically, and had no song prepared for the occasion.

Mr. Gay said, "then sing this and we will assist you:"

Reduced to want with lantern jaws,
My people, I forsook,
And to avenge my righteous cause,
God sent them Parson Cook:

ANCIENT RELICS.

CHEST AND DRAWERS:—This old relic was probably made in England, of English oak, the grain being finer than American. It was split and shaved and the outside elaborately carved and fastened together with wooden pins. It was repaired by Mr. Dwinnell of Brattleboro, who said he thought it to be 200 years old. The letters, J. E. N. are carved upon the center panel (for John and Elizabeth Nims). They being the great-grand-parents of the late John Stebbins, Esq., who owned it and to whom it was given by his mother (daughter of Col. Hawks of Deerfield) and to her by John and Elizabeth Nims. Mr. Stebbins gave it to his son on his 38th birth-day—the late John Stebbins, Jr. John Stebbins, Esq., also had in his possession, two testaments; the oldest has on its title page the following:

“The New Testament of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by Wm. Tyndale, the Martyr.

The original edition 1526, being the first vernacular translation from the Greek with a memoir of his life and early writings, to which are annexed the essential variation of Coverdale; Thomas Mathews; Cranmers the Genevan, and the Bishops' bible as marginal readings. By J. P. Dabney.”

It is divided into chapters, but not in verses.

MRS. LUCY PATTERSON PEELER, daughter of Eleazer Patterson and grand-daughter of Col. Eleazer Patterson, who received the appointment of Colonel in the Southern Regiment in Cumberland county from the council of appointment of the State of New York, Aug. 18, 1778, and also received a commission as assistant justice at the same time by virtue of the constitution of the State of New York; also appointed justice of the quorum and also of the Court of Oyer and Terminer, June 5, 1782.

Col. Patterson's first wife died Apr. 14, 1761, aged 47; her's being the first lettered gravestone in town.

Mrs. Peeler was the wife of Allender Peeler, son of John Jacob, and the mother of 16 children. She died Apr. 21, 1871, aged 91 years.

From an obituary in the “Vermont Phoenix,” Brattleboro, we add:

“Six of her children were twins; thirteen lived to an advanced age. There is now living a daughter, Mrs. Lucretia Brooks, who is over 70, and nine sons yet remain to cherish her memory, six of whom and Mrs. Brooks were present at her funeral, which was attended by Rev. M. H. Harris of Brattleboro. She has 33 living grand-children and 16 deceased; 24 great-grandchildren and 8 deceased; 1 great-great-grandchild and 1 deceased, making 97 lineal descendants, 65 now living. George A., son of George, was killed at the battle of Winchester, and Ohas. A., son of Allender, was killed one month after at Cedar Creek, in the war of the rebellion. From the home experience of Mrs. Peeler in caring for the sick, her presence was always sought and freely given among her neighbors, and many remember her acts of kindness with gratitude. Much tender care was bestowed upon her declining days by her son, Allender and his wife, where she resided, and all her descendants are worthy, industrious, citizens, and respected in the community where they reside.”

MRS. POLLY LEE,

wife of John Lee and daughter of John Jacob Peeler, was the oldest person in town at the time of her death and for some years previous. She lived with her son, George W. Lee, spending her time knitting and by her cheerful conversation enlivening all with whom she associated. She died 1879, aged 92.

SIX GRANDFATHERS.

Lillian E. and Francilia A., children of C. E. Davis, born 1859 and 1861, had six living grandfathers, viz: Amos Davis, I. W. Johnson, Jr. The great-grandfathers were I. W. Johnson, Taylor Briggs, Amos Davis and Anthony Combs.

SIX GRANDMOTHERS.

Isa, daughter of Wm. A. Newton, born 1856, had six grandmothers, viz: Mrs. Lavinia Newton, Mrs. Lydia Tyler, grandmothers, and great-grandmothers, Mrs. Sabra Newton, Mrs. Harriet Tyler, Mrs. Willard and Mrs. Dolly Frost.

NECROLOGY.

Taken from the day-book of the late Dr. Cyrus Washburn during 14 years from and after Jan. 1, 1826: whole number of deaths 140. Just one-half (70) died passing their 20th year; 30 between the ages of 20 and 50, of whom 16 were males and 14 females. The remaining 40, of whom 22 were males and 18 females, lived to an average age of 70 years. Five of them, two males and three females, averaged 90 years, 7 months; the oldest, Mrs. Mary Harris, being 95 years old. The largest number of deaths in one year (1826) was 15; seven being adults and eight infants. The smallest number in one year was five in 1830; one adult and four infants. The last year, 1839, ten died, seven males and three females; eight adults and two minors. The average number of deaths per year being ten. The census of the town in 1840 was 681; therefore the ratio of deaths was one in sixty-eight per annum.

No prevailing epidemic afflicted the town during this period. These facts give the probabilities of life as follows: Of those who are born one-half die in infancy, or before 20 years of age, three-fourths during the next 30 years; the remaining two-sevenths live to be 50 years old and upwards and to an average age of "three score and ten."

EXOSTOSIS.

Reuben Elmer died May 9, 1841, aged 87 years, of exostosis of the ring-finger. It was caused by an injury received on his finger while sculling a boat in his youth, making a bunch the size of a chestnut between the second and third joint, which gave him no trouble until about a year before his death, when it increased rapidly in size and for some days previous to his death was larger than his head. He was the son of Jacob Elmer, who died Nov. 11, 1815, aged 87 years.

SPOTTED FEVER.

This epidemic, in 1813, was very distressing in this town, about one-fifth of the inhabitants were afflicted with it and about one-thirtieth part died. There were 21 deaths, mostly of children, in the course of a few weeks; four died in the course of 24 hours.

BURYING GROUNDS.

There are three public burial-grounds; one at South Vernon, one in the vicinity of the Lilly Pond and one two miles north of Vernon Centre, called the Hunt burial ground. There is a family burying-ground on the Col. Patterson place (so called). Another on the Ensign Samuel Stratton place, a mile and a half below the center of the town, and the Stebbins burial-ground in the bow of the river. There are many quaint epitaphs found upon the more ancient tombstones in these grounds, some of which we give. Rev. Mr. Gay was the author of most of them.

INSCRIPTION (OF MRS. ROBINSON.)

*Tranquil and silent here lies Dill,

ANOTHER EPITAPH.

Upon a tomb-stone in the old yard at Hinsdale, N. H., near the former residence of Rev. Bunker Gay, is the following inscription:

"Underneath Deposited is the body of Col. Ebenezer Hinsdale, who for his supernatural endowments, extensive learning and usefulness, not only in private life but in various important public offices he sustained was far known and admired. After a long illness, he died, Jan. 6, 1763. There also lies buried the body of Mrs. Mary Beal, the mother of Col. Ebenezer Hinsdale, who was home on her return from captivity in Canada, with whom she lived a widow at the time of his death, which is thought to have brought on hers, the morning after she died Anno Ætatis 83. Her husbands were Lieut. Mehuman and George Beal. By the first she had two sons, Samuel and John—after this, whose only child, Mrs. Abigail Hinsdale, died at Hinsdale, Aug. 10, 1739—was interred at Deerfield. His still surviving partner, Mrs. Abigail Hinsdale, daughter of Rev. John Williams of Deerfield and worthy relict of Col. Ebenezer Hinsdale now mourning the absence or her dear deceased relatives has caused their names and destinies to be recorded together on this stone, June 2, 1764.

BELDING GENEALOGY.

The family descends in a direct line from,—1st, Richard Belding, England, and one of the founders of Weth; 2d, Samuel, son of Richard, who was killed by Indians in the attack on Hatfield, Sept. 19, 1677; 3d, Stephen, son of Samuel, born in 1658, died Oct. 6, 1720; 4th, Jonathan, son of Stephen, born in 1694, in Hadley, and a lieutenant in Ruler's war in 1724. He received a grant of 12 acres of land, on condition of building a saw-mill at Northfield, in 1717. He died July 6, 1778. 5th, Jonathan, son of the preceding, born in 1729, in Northfield. This gentleman was an invalid for years. He was careful of his health, methodical in his habits, and was never known to run. No emergency could hasten his regular pace. Of imposing appearance, in the cocked-hat and careful costume of a gentleman of the olden time, with his deliberate movements on the street, he is remembered as a striking figure by the boys of his day. 6th, Elijah, son of Jonathan, born in 1774, married Mar. 18, 1810, to Lois S. Stevens, of Warwick. Their children were Lois S., born May 2, 1811, died Sept. 23, 1814; Elijah E., subject of this sketch; Jonathan, born Aug. 16, 1815, a large owner of real estate in Fitchburg, Mass.; Lois S., born Sept. 15, 1818, died Dec. 13, 1862; Maria A., born Oct. 2, 1820, married June 1, 1843, to Elijah M. Dickinson, a large real estate owner and manufacturer in Fitchburg.

ELIJAH E. BELDING was born in the town of Vernon, Vt., Apr. 18, 1813, the 2d child of Elijah and Lois S. Belding.

He passed his minority at home, working on his father's farms in Vernon and Northfield. His education was received in the district school of the neighborhood, supplemented by an attendance at the academy schools of West Brattleboro', Vt., and Westfield, Mass. He was married, Mar. 22, 1836, to Eliza, daughter of Jacob and Dolly Frost, of Vernon. At the time of his marriage, his father gave him about 50 acres of land, upon which he settled at that time. Mr. Belding still points with pride to the little old house still standing near his fine residence in which he and Mrs. Belding commenced "keeping house." From the first Mr. Belding devoted particular attention to the growth of hops, and has raised altogether 41 successive crops. He has also dealt largely in cattle. To the original 50 acres given him by his father he has added other lands, until at the present time his farm comprises 270 acres. In addition to carrying on the farm, he established in West Northfield a general store, which was the only store for many years in that portion of the town. By careful and prudent management in all his undertakings, seconded by the efforts of his excellent wife, who has been truly a helpmeet, Mr. Belding has been enabled to build one of the most convenient and comfortable farm houses of Northfield, to furnish his children with an education the best the schools of the country afford, to render them all needed assistance in the start in life, and has, moreover, ample means left for the comforts of old age.

He has filled various offices of public trust. Was selectman 11 years, justice of the peace 5 years, and postmaster at West Northfield 23 years. Was elected a representative to the Legislature for the session of 1873, and served on the committee of agriculture. For many years he was a trustee of Power's Institute, of Bernardston, and is at present a trustee of the Greenfield Savings Bank. In politics he is a Republican, and in religious belief a Unitarian.

Mr. and Mrs. Belding have children as follows: Edward E., born Jan. 2, 1837, married, Oct. 15, 1861, to Mary A., daughter of Phineas Steadman, of Chicopee, Mass., agent at Chicopee Junction of the Connecticut River railroad; Eliza E., born May 11, 1842, died Apr. 3, 1849; Elijah, born Apr. 1847, married, June 14, 1870, to Hattie E. Overhiser, of Hudson, N. Y., educated at Powers' Institute, Bernardston, and graduated at Eastman's Business College, New York. He is now one of the proprietors in the firm of McIntosh & Co., boot and shoe jobbers, in Springfield, Mass. He has for the last two years been a member of the common council of Springfield. Has two children, John Eastman and an infant.

Edgar F., born Jan. 17, 1850, graduated at Yale College in 1872, and is now a member of the firm of E. M. Dickinson & Co., boot and shoe manufacturers, at Fitchburg, Mass.; Everett E., born May 25, 1854, died Oct. 9, 1854.

JARVIS F. BURROWS.

Mr. B. was no ordinary man. By nature he was gifted with a keen perception, a great memory and a power of attraction, the equal of which, but few men can boast. He was a stong, whole souled man, contact with him always left a strong impression. Men who knew him in prosperity, who were the recipients of his lavish purse in former years, who date their start in life—their position—to his advice, are not a few. His acquaintance was large, and he made himself known wherever he was. His loss will be greatly felt—none more so in the town. His funeral was largely attended. Peace to his memory.

SURPRISE PARTY.

About a score of the friends of Lafayette Whithed, and Mr. and Mrs. Hale of Bernardston, Mass., the parents of Mrs. Whithed, gave them an agreeable surprise on the occasion of the 33d anniversary of his birthday, last Monday evening. After exchanging greetings, he was presented with a nice carriage blanket, and a copy of Prof. J. S. Lee's new book, then each guest presented him a pipe, being considered by the aborigines an emblem of peace, and one coming in late presented him a pipe in due form, not knowing that he had received any. A sumptuous feast added to the enjoyments of the evening. The great-great-grandfather of Mr. Whithed, Ensign Samuel Stratton, purchased of Westmoreland Field, the farm of Mr. Whithed, 122 years since, and seven years after, in addition, three Strattons of Northfield sold to Ensign Stratton their right to land called Strattonfield, given by will of Hezekiah Stratton, the father of Samuel, and his three brothers, for £600. Said farm has been in the possession of his lineal descendants to the sixth generation. There was read for the entertainment of the guests, an elegy on the death of Ensign Samuel Stratton, written by Rev. Bunker Gay, the first settled minister of Vernon.*

THE VERMONT RECORD AND FARMER.

Jan. 10, 1873.

A WOODEN WEDDING.

On Wednesday evening, Jan. 1st, the house of Mr. and Mrs. George H. Hubbard of this place suddenly became filled with their relatives and many friends, who, wishing to give them a New Year's call, had come to offer congratulations and celebrate the fifth anniversary of their marriage. After the company had been assembled about an hour, and the many gifts from their friends had been displayed, Rev. N. C. Hodgdon, in behalf of those present, made a short presentation speech, and remarks were called for from Roswell Wood, Esq., M. I. Read, Wm. F. Johnson, Chester Lee, Henry Trask and E. F. Belding. Then Miss Hattie Wood read beautifully a very interesting epistle written by Artemus Washburn, Esq.:

An Epistle of Artemus the Scribe from the Book of Chronicles, to George surnamed Hubbard.

And it came to pass in the year 1737, in the county Hampshire, Province of Massachusetts Bay, town of Squakheag, in the valley of the Fresh, or Quon-ek-ticut river was built a fort by Orlando of the tribe of Bridgman. Now this fort was considered a safe protection for the inhabitants thereof against Indian and French invaders. And men who feared the Lord and kept his commandments, came from other Provinces and dwelt in the fort and in its vicinity, and had great possessions. And after many years it became the possession of George of the tribe of Hubbard, which was the son of Erastus the Colonel, which was the son of John, a devout man, and a Ruler of the House of God, who married Anne, a sister of Jonathan the Lient. Governor who was of the tribe of Hunt. Now Erastus the Colonel had a brother, a governor in the Province of New Hampshire, who ruled wisely and well.

And behold the cry of war resounded through the land, and George, a valiant man, able to bear buckler and sword, skillful in war, went out to the war of the Rebellion. And the enemy were beaten and driven back, for the Lord was on our side. And it came to pass when he returned, there were great rejoicings among his brethren and kinsfolk. Now Fanny, the mother of George, (which was the daughter of Dolly and Jacob of the tribe of Frost) spake unto her son; hearken now unto my voice, and choose thee a wife from among the fair damsels. Now this son behaved himself wisely, and departed unto the town of Ethan Allen notoriety, where dwelt the French, and although in the habit of taking prisoners, was himself captivated by Hattie Maria, which was the daughter of Mary Foster and Chester W. of the tribe of French, which was the son of Nathaniel the Captain, which was the son of Nathaniel, which was the brother of "William who was shot by the hands of Ornel Ministerial tools of George ye 3d, at Westminster, March ye 13th, 1775." And I found a register of the genealogy of them which came at first to defend the principles of freedom, and found written therein the name of William of the tribe of French, the first victim who fell a sacrifice for American Liberty.

Now George made peace with the fair maiden and took her to wife, and she abode with him for the space of five years, and he dealt wisely.

Now Hattie was found by him, his kindred and neighbors, to excel in wisdom and knowledge and in understanding.

Now these friends took counsel together and with one consent brought them gifts of household utensils, of the wood of the trees of Lebanon, of locust, of sycamore and a great variety of "not walnuts" carved by cunning artificers. And when they had made an end of examining the presents they gave thanks unto the Lord. And they took a Psalm, and brought the timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery. And on this day of feasting they blew the trumpet, and joy and harmony prevailed, and none were silent. And it came to pass that the day advanced far into the eve, when the people gathered together, and returned thanks.

MEMENTO MORI.

*Here lies cut down like unripe fruit,
A son of Mr. Amos Tute
And Mrs. Jemima Tute his wife
Called Jonathan of whose frail life
The days all sum'd (how short the account)
Scarcely to fourteen years amount Born on the 12th of May was he
In 1763
To Death he fell a helpless Prey
April the five and twentieth Day
In seventeen hundred seventy-seven Quitting this World, we hope for Heaven
But tho' his Spirit's fled on High
His mouldering body here must lie.
Behold the amazing alteration
Effected by inoculation
The means employed his life to save
Hurried him headlong to the grave
Full in the bloom of youth he fell
Alas! what human tongue can tell
The Mother's Grief her Anguish show
Or paint the father's heavier woe
Who now no nat'ral offspring has
His ample fortune to possess
To fill in his place, stand in his stead
Or bear his Name when he is dead
So God ordained. His ways are just Tho' Empires Crumble into dust
Life and this World mere Bubbles are

ONE HUNDRED AND ONE YEARS OLD.

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIRST AN-NIVERSARY OF THE BUILDING OF THE JESSE LEE HOUSE AT VERNON.

Five Generations born in the same House. An Interesting Historical Sketch of the Town and Its

First Settlers, by Rev. J. S. Lee,
D. D., of St. Lawrence University.

The meeting at the celebration of the centennial of the Jesse Lee house at Vernon, Aug. 4, 1883, was a grand success. A large number of the Lee family, not only from Vernon, but from Brattleboro, Northfield, Orange, Bernardston, Greenfield, Leyden, Hampden, Somerville, Conn., and Fitchburg, were present, as well as many of the town's people not of this family. The music was furnished by the choir led by Fred and Lowell Brown, aided by George Fairman, Mrs. Fred Brown, S. Titus, Esq., Mrs. Aurora, T. E. Wood, and Miss Minnie Lee, and added to the interest of the occasion. Chester Lee called the meeting to order and nominated Addison Whithed president of the day. Rev. A. B. Truax of Brattleboro offered prayer. The principal address was delivered by Rev. J. S. Lee, D. D., professor in St. Lawrence University, and was substantially as follows:

After extending hearty welcome to those present he gave a brief history of the old house, whose frame was erected in 1782. Jesse Lee purchased the farm in 1780 and two years later began to clear the land and erect the building which was not finished till the following year. At this time it was a wilderness in that part of the town. As early as 1760, or a little later, settlements had been made along the river road, from Brattleboro to So. Vernon, by Amos Tute, Samuel Stratton, Joseph Stebbins, Eleazer Patterson and others, and in 1780, the Eliakim Stebbins house was erected in the west part of the town. The house built by Jesse Lee was occupied by his family during the winter of 1782-3. The wind whistled through the cracks and wolves howled in the forests. Jesse Lee, son of Jesse and father of Chester Lee, who still lives on the farm, was born here, Apr. 12, 1783, and died in the same room, Nov. 16, 1838. Eli Lee, the father-of the speaker, was born here, Dec. 16, 1785, and died in the town, Nov. 12, 1881. Caleb Lee was born July 17, 1787, the youngest son of the ten children of Jesse Lee, who died here July 11, 1816, aged 74 years. His father, John Lee, who moved from Connecticut in 1780, died here in 1784, aged about 73 years. After his father's death in 1838, Chester Lee occupied the house until he erected a new house on the same farm and now the old house is owned and occupied by Charles H. Newton, whose wife's mother was John Lee's daughter, and whose children are the fifth generation of Lees born in the house. Three children were present at the celebration, who constitute the seventh generation from John Lee who was born in Thompson, Conn., in 1711. The first grant made to proprietors of Vernon was in 1672, as a part of Northfield, the Massachusetts line being supposed to run as far north as the Howe place near Brattleboro. In 1753 the Governor of New Hampshire set apart a township, six miles square on both sides of Connecticut river, embracing the present towns of Vernon and Hinsdale, when the territory west of the river was claimed by New Hampshire. The town was named from Ebenezer Hinsdale, one of the proprietors. In 1764, the king decided that the west shore of the river was the boundary line between New Hampshire and New York. Hence arose the local contest between the people of the different sections which resulted in the declaration of the independence of Vermont at Westminster, Jan. 13, 1777. The state was admitted into the union Mar. 4, 1791. "If New York had not demanded pay of the settlers for their lands the second time, no doubt we should belong to that state at the present time, and there would have been no Vermont."

Among the early settlers of Vernon were Joseph Stebbins, Samuel Stratton, Col. Eleazer Patterson, whose three frame houses were all raised the same day in 1763. The town was settled as early as 1737, when Sartwell's fort on the Howe place was erected, but settlers outside the fort did not occupy their farms until the Indians disappeared about the year 1760. In 1771, there were 19 heads of families in town and 107 inhabitants. The name of the town was changed from Hinsdale to Vernon, Oct. 21, 1802. The latter name was suggested by Washington's Virginia residence.

The speaker gave a graphic sketch of the mode of living, the habits, character and occupations of the inhabitants one hundred years ago, illustrating it by various incidents and anecdotes. It was what Dr. Bushnell calls the age of homespun. The men were engaged in clearing up the land and preparing it for grain and grass, and the women used to cook, spin, knit, sew, patch and mend. Both sexes wore home-made dresses and lived chiefly on the products of the soil. None were ashamed to work. Schools were maintained and religious meetings held in private houses or rude school-houses until 1802, when the first church was erected at the center of the town.

Rapid sketches of some of the prominent early settlers were drawn, including the eccentric clergyman, Bunker Gay, Amos Tute whose curious epitaph in the north burial ground has been so often copied, Dr. Cyrus Washburn, the faithful physician of the town from 1803 to 1860, Lieut. Gov. Jonathan Hunt and his brother Arad, Ensign Stratton, the great hunter, Col. Patterson the military man, Joseph and Eliakim Stebbins, Capt. Jerijah Thayer, a revolutionary soldier. Dr. Washburn was for many years postmaster, town clerk and justice of the peace. He married 853 couples during his life time.

The address closed with an appeal to the people to reverence the memory of their forefathers, imitate their sturdy virtues and hand down the rich legacy which they have bequeathed to us, not only unimpaired, but improved.

After the address a bountiful repast, provided by the ladies, was partaken of and appropriate remarks, embracing incident, fact, anecdote and moral reflection, were made by Cyrus Lee of Hampden, Mass., a native of Vernon and son of Caleb Lee. O. L. Davis of Connecticut, Noyes Streeter, Sumner Titus, Esq., Lorenzo Brown, Esq., Dr. T. Goodwillie, Hon. Nahum F. Bryant, Dr. Lee, J. Alex. Brown, Samuel B. Houghton and Rev. Mr. Truax. The addresses were interspersed by singing "Auld Lang Syne," "Gather Once Again," "Our Country 'tis of Thee," "The Republic Battle Hymn," "Sweet Home," "Building for Eternity" and "Old Hundred."

The day was pleasant and all passed off harmoniously.

ELI LEE—OBITUARY.

Eli Lee was born in Vernon, Dec. 16, 1785, and died Nov. 11, 1881, at the age of 95 years, 10 months and 27 days. Mr. Lee was the youngest but one of 10 children of Jesse and Eunice Lee. His father removed to Vernon from Killingly (now Thompson,) Conn., in June, 1781, and 97 years ago erected the house, now standing, where five generations of the family have since lived. He lived during the administration of all the presidents, from Washington to Arthur, and first voted at the presidential election of 1808, when Madison was elected, and at every election since—last in 1880, when he was the first in town to deposit his vote in the ballot-box. Mr. Lee always enjoyed the confidence of his neighbors and friends. He never sought office, but was often chosen to fill the responsible positions of lister, selectman and justice of the peace, and from 1830 to 1840 was sent some half-a-dozen times to the legislature, until he declined the nomination when urged to accept it, saying others were more worthy to fill it.

He was humble in his disposition and views, honest, industrious, temperate, generous and charitable. He was married to Rebecca Stebbins in February, 1816, and they lived in affectionate and happy communion together for 46 years, until her death in March, 1862. Six children were born to them, five of whom are living—Amanda A. (Mrs. R. S. Wood); Rev. John Stebbins Lee, D. D., professor of clerical history in St Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y.; Marshall Lee, with whom he lived; Editha (Mrs. A. Whithed); and Hattie R. Lee, who now resides in Vernon. His youngest daughter, Diana E., died at the age of 20 years. Mr. Lee's father was a Baptist, but in early life Eli embraced liberal views, for many years enjoyed the ministrations of Rev. T. F. Rogers (Unitarian), and at his death was a member of the Universalist church. He was for many years the oldest person in town. He belonged to a family noted for its longevity; the average age of five of his father's children was 90 years, and of six, 88 years. About a year since, when his son, John S., was taking leave of him, he told his father he hoped that he would live to be a hundred. His father replied that he did not wish it; he did not dread the future and was ready and willing to go whenever his Heavenly Father should call him. His funeral was largely attended at the Universalist church on Tuesday afternoon.

REV. JOHN STEBBINS LEE, son of Eli Lee, born in Vernon, Sept. 23, 1820, fitted for college in the common schools in town and at schools in Brattleboro, Deerfield and Shelburne Falls, Mass. He entered Amherst College, July, 1841; graduated in 1845 with a standing among the first 10 in a class of 30; taught in 1845-6 in Swanzey, N. H., as principal of Mt. Casar Seminary; Ordained June, 1847; Principal of Melrose Seminary, W. Brattleboro 1847-8; preached in Lebanon, N. H.

Y., and was Principal of the collegiate department, St. Lawrence University—a new institution in which ladies as well as gentlemen receive a complete classical and scientific education. July 8, 1868, worn down by excessive labor in the college, the trustees granted him nine months leave of absence, and he started for Europe. He travelled in Ireland, Scotland, England, Holland, Belgium, up the Rhine to Switzerland and among the Alps; crossed the Simplon pass into the northern part of Italy to Milan and Venice where he embarked for Egypt; visited Alexandria, up the Nile to Cairo, the Pyramids, thence to Jaffa in Palestine, to Jerusalem, the Jordan, the Dead Sea, Hebron and Bethlehem; thence up through the central part of Palestine to the sea of Gallilee, Tyre, Sidon and Beyroot, where he took a steamer and visited the isles of the Mediterranean, Smyrna, Constantinople, Athens, Corinth and other places in Greece; crossed the isthmus of Corinth; visited other Greek islands and landed at Brindisi, Italy; crossed the Appenines to Naples; visited Pompai, Vesuvius and Rome, where he attended the Christmas ceremonies at St. Peters, thence to Florence, to Bologna, Turin, over the Mt. Cenis pass to Geneva, through Germany to Berlin, thence to Cologne, Paris, London, Liverpool, and Boston, arriving Mar. 12, 1863; having traveled 20,000 miles and returned with renewed health; he was chosen Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Theological School and entered upon his duties Apr. 1, 1869.

REV. DR. LEE AND FAMILY.

JOHN STEBBINS was the oldest son in his father's family. His mother was Rebecca (Stebbins) Lee.

He evinced, in early childhood, an intense love for books, and read everything he could get hold of. He determined to obtain a college education and enter upon a profession. He attended the common school until he was sixteen, and besides the common English branches, commenced the study of Latin. He was then qualified to teach school, but his parents thought it not best for him to commence until he was eighteen, at which age he taught his first school in Guilford, and afterwards taught two terms in Vernon, in 1839 and 1840. He completed his preparation for college at the age of 24. In July, 1846, he commenced his Theological studies with Rev. Dr. Hosea Ballou, 2d, at Medford, Mass., first President of Tuft's College. He was ordained and settled as pastor of the Universalist church in West Brattleboro, June, 1847, and soon took charge of Melrose Seminary. For two years the Seminary was largely patronized under his management. In February, 1849, he removed to Lebanon, N. H., and became pastor of the Universalist church, teaching a portion of the time during which he remained there. In 1851 he resigned his charge and removed to Montpelier, Vt., where he continued to preach and aided Rev. Eli Ballou in editing the "Christian Repository." He was Principal of the Green Mt. Institute, (see above), taught 21 terms in succession and preached in the towns of Woodstock and Bridgewater, and performed double duty during this period. Worn out by continuous labors, he resigned his charge May, 1857, and became pastor of the Universalist church in Woodstock where he preached, also taking private pupils and performing the duties of Superintendent of Schools. In April, 1859, he accepted an invitation as Professor of Latin and Greek languages in St. Lawrence University, (see above) where he labored as Professor and acting President of the College. The summer of 1868, exhausted by his severe and unremitting labors of nine years, he took a journey to Europe and Palestine. He left Canton July 8, 1868, and returned March 19, 1869. His journey was rapid, but he reaped rich fruits from it by reason of his previous extensive reading in history and the classics. He lectured extensively on his travels in New England and New York, and published articles in many periodicals. At the request of friends, he prepared and published in Jan. 1871, a book entitled, "Nature and Art in the Old World, or Sketches of Travel in Europe and the Orient."

He prepared and published a series of lectures which he delivered to the Theological students and afterwards collected in book form entitled, "Sacred Cities, narrative, descriptive, historical," which treats of 15 Biblical places from Jerusalem to Rome. He has also written elaborate articles for the "Repository" and "Universalist Quarterly," and other periodicals on literary, theological, and scientific themes, during a period of nearly half a century. In April, 1869, Mr. Lee accepted the position of Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Biblical Antiquities in St. Lawrence University, which he has ever since held. His tour in the East was a special preparation for this position. He lectured frequently before his students on subjects connected with his observations there.

In Feb. 1848, Mr. Lee was married to Miss Elmira Bennett, of Westmoreland, N. H., and their silver wedding was celebrated in Canton, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1873. Their children are six, one of whom died in infancy. Of those living, all are graduates of the classical department, St. Lawrence University.

STEBBINS' BIRTHDAY VISIT.

About 40 of the relatives of John Stebbins, Esq., met at his residence, in the bow of the river, to give him a surprise on his birthday, Jan. 15, 1873. Relics of the past were exhibited; the wedding suit of fifty years since, in good condition, and a fac simile of the old English Stebbins coat of arms, painted by the wife of Prof. J. S. Lee, of Canton, N. Y.

Good cheer reigned, the house rung with old-time tunes, and heartfelt speeches were made. The address was by A. H. Washburn, Esq., from which we hereby extract:

Mr. Stebbins is of the 7th generation, from Rowland Stebbing of Stebbing, Essex Co., England. He has made good use of his opportunities and held many offices of honor and trust in Vernon, and several times represented the town in the legislature. The loss of his worthy companion, at the time when they were looking forward to years of freedom from care, and the enjoyment of the fruits of united industry and fidelity is irreparable. His writings in consequence of much travel and observation, are clear and forcible, also instructive and entertaining, and mostly of a historical character; and he is one of those men who never grow old in thought or manner of life.

Mr. Stebbins is a man of the most absolutely strict integrity, and no one can mistake the sentiment he entertains toward men or measures. He shuns general society, but is a genial and delightful companion with the few whom he admits to close friendship. He believes in doing with all his might whatever he undertakes, and is as faithful to that idea in the ordinary amusements of his family as in making pecuniary operations involving thousands. He has living, seven children, all respectable and respected in the communities where they reside; and grandchildren (who are the ninth generation from Roland,) who give promise of future usefulness, and all are blest with a good supply of this world's goods.

Mr. Washburn was followed by L. Brown, Esq., who made some excellent remarks, followed by Sumner Titus, Esq., R. S. Wood, Esq., and by the oldest man in town, Eli Lee, Esq., brother-in-law of our host, with interesting retrospection.

WINDHAM COUNTY REFORMER.

DIED: In Hartford, Conn. Mar. 18, 1884, George Bell Washburn, aged 26 years.

A TERRIBLE FALL.

George B. Washburn, son of A. H. Washburn, of Vernon, for the past two years employed by the Southern New England Telephone Co., at Hartford, Conn., fell Monday morning, receiving fatal injuries. In opening the scuttle the ladder broke, and he fell from the fourth story of the building to the first floor. The building was in process of repair and the hatchways were open from ground to roof. Mr. Washburn struck on a timber, receiving the blow between his shoulders, injuring the spinal column. The lower portion of his body and limbs were paralyzed, but he was conscious and asked to be taken to the hospital.

All that physicians could do, was done. But he died at one o'clock, a. m., Tuesday. Two friends, representatives of the Telephone company, came from Hartford to Vernon to accompany the remains to his home. The funeral was held at the Union church in Vernon, Thursday, Rev. Mr. Whitney officiating.

Mr. Washburn was unmarried.

HON. NAHUM FRANKLIN BRYANT, son of Col. Nahum Bryant, was born in New Salem, Franklin Co. Mass., Mar. 24, A. D. 1810. His educational advantages were good. He was fitted for college at the New Salem Academy, but did not enter college, and soon began the study of law with Aaron Brooks, Esq., of Petersham, Mass.; attended the Dane Law school at Cambridge, Mass., when Judge Story presided and completed his law studies with Elisha H. Allen in Bangor, Me. He began the practice of law in Bangor, but on account of the illness of his parents, he returned to Massachusetts and located at Barre, Worcester Co., where for more than 25 years he had an extensive practice and stood in the front ranks of the lawyers of that time. About the time of his entering professional life, he married, June 2, 1855, Miss Roxana Stratton Washburn, daughter of Dr. Cyrus Washburn of Vernon. She was an accomplished scholar and lady. She outlived him. They had no children. Mr. Bryant's younger brother, Walter A. was associated with him as law partner for a short period at the outset as, subsequently, was also Judge P. Emory Aldrich for about two years, but for the greater part of his professional career, he was alone.

Being a prominent lawyer and of distinguished ability, he was sought as a counsellor by large corporations, especially railroad, in one of which he was retained with a good salary. During the Clay campaign in 1844, he started a newspaper, which exerted a wide influence at that time and subsequently he purchased the "Barre Gazette," merging the two papers into one. By these means his literary ability became known extensively. In 1847-8, he was elected to the Senate of Mass., where he played a prominent part. He was the author of a measure changing the administration of the insolvency laws from the numerous Masters in Chancery to one Judge of Insolvency in each county. He was soon after the candidate of his party, and came within one vote of a nomination for Governor of the State. In 1858-9, he also published a magazine called the "Household Monthly," devoted to general literature for family reading, which reached the beginning of the fourth volume when his health failing, Mr. B. was obliged to relinquish all business for a time.

His duties as editor and lawyer taxed his endurance too much and for two years he was an invalid. After a rest which restored him somewhat, at the solicitation of Hon. Ginery Twitchell, president of the Boston and Worcester R. R., he consented to act as counsel and he removed to Boston and soon after became superintendent of the Grand Junction division of that road. In this capacity, he served about 10 years, when in 1870, his health again failing, he resigned his position and removed in 1872, to Vernon, to seek improved health in agricultural pursuits. He occupied the farm of his wife's father, Dr. Cyrus Washburn, where he resided till his death, Aug. 17, 1884, caused by being thrown from his wagon in the hay-field, and striking on his head, which injured the spine to such a degree as to cause complete paralysis below the neck.

In society Mr. Bryant was known a polished gentleman, well informed and entertaining in his conversation. He had a poetic taste and composed easily. He could repeat much from his favorite authors. He was a pleasing speaker at the bar, using a correct diction, and never using slang in public debate. His argument was forcible and his conclusions well drawn. He had a keen sense of humor and a ready wit. He was an earnest advocate of all that ennobles and fits the youth for a noble and useful career in life. The cause of education, religion and morality were his favorite themes. During the last few years of his life, his great study was the Bible.

is the daughter of C. E. and Fannie S. (Johnson) Davis, and was born in St. Johnsbury, Dec. 20, 1860. The Johnson family, on her maternal side, is one of the oldest in Vernon, and it included some of the earliest settlers, so that her genius may be fairly regarded as indigenous to the meadows and the groves of our historical soil. On her mother's side also, she traces her ancestry from the Wilburs of Rhode Island, who have a complete record in wills of eight generations back to the landing of the ship Ann from England.

Very soon after Addie's birth, her parents moved back to Vernon, where they have lived ever since; and she received her education in the common schools of the town, at Powers' Institute, Bernardston, Mass., the St. Johnsbury Academy, and in the best school of all, the 11 terms' experience as a district school teacher. She commenced teaching at the age of 14, and from the beginning, her schools were successful. At the age of 18, she entered the St. Johnsbury Academy with the purpose of fitting herself for college, but her plans were frustrated by the loss of her health, and for two years afterward, she was a constant invalid.

In 1882, the Brattleboro Reformer, attracted by the high capacity shown in her fugitive poems, in the newspapers, invited her to accept a position in its editorial rooms, and she has since been constantly employed on that newspaper and its extensive branches, steadily advancing until she now occupies the most responsible position in the office. The news department of the state edition is entirely under her charge, as are the literary, scientific, religious, home and society, and general miscellany departments of the four newspapers published by C. H. Davenport & Co., and the comprehensiveness of her treatment of these great currents of human thought and progress, justly rank her as among the most efficient of New England journalists. But the ceaseless and wearying treadmill of newspaper life have not worn away any of the brightness of her poetic genius. Like the bird, she sings because she cannot help it, and she realizes that cultured thought and reading must improve her notes. She has a wide and deep vein of sentiment and religious feeling, from which she brings the choicest nuggets of poetry, and in which she will win her greatest fame, but she has also turned off some brilliant parodies on political and local subjects which have been extensively quoted. Notable among these were Hubbell's plea to "Rock Me to Sleep," in 1882, the "Call of the Politicians" in 1884. Among her best productions of a more permanent value are "The Sermon from Flowers," "A Link with the Past," and several Christmas poems which have appeared richly illustrated in the Reformer for the past three years.

[From the poems of Miss Davis we make the following selections :

A SERMON IN FLOWERS.

Just beyond this field of clover is a pasture rough and rocky,

Where the golden rod and thistle and the trailing woodbine grow ;

There one day, I heard this sermon, most pathetically simple,

Yet so fraught with truth and wisdom that it set my heart a-glow.

"I am just a little flower,—just the plainest, wildest flower

Growing here upon a rock with very little soil or shade ;

I am stunted, pale and crooked, quite unlike my brothers yonder

With their tall, green stalks and yellow plumes that never droop or fade.

"But I care not ;—He who planted knew just how much soil and sunshine,

How much rain and wind were needful to unfold the flower He planned :

So He gave them ; and I grew, to tell my story with its lesson ;

What am I that I should murmur at His wise and just command ?

"Quite enough for me to know that I am just as He designed me ;

So I never loose my joy in sighs for what I might have been ;

God looks down in love and mercy—I look up in perfect trusting.

And I love the earth and air, the pain as well as joy therein."

BECAUSE HE CAME.

Because He came, one day from out the year
Is filled with feasting and with joyful song,
The church bells chime; the Christmas greens are hung

And merry laugh the children, all day long.
There is no room, this day, for strife or blame
Because He came.

Because He came the poor are not forgot.
The weary, aching shoulders are relieved
Of burdens, hard ; and tender words of cheer
Are whispered to the sorrowing bereaved,
And lips forget one cruel word to frame
Because He came.

Because He came the prosperous and gay
Pause from their pleasures for a little space ;
Remembering God's bounty unto them,
They share it with the poorer of their race.
Love reaches to the depths of sin and shame
Because He came.

Because He came, we who are sad at heart
 Look on our griefs to-day, and find them sweet;
 Sorrow was His and we who find it, step
 But in the Heavenward paths of His dear feet.
 Sorrow or joy, we know 'tis all the same
 Because He came.

STEBBINS FAMILY CHRONICLE.

And it came to pass one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four years after the birth of Christ, in the seventh year of the reign of James, surnamed Monroe, who was ruler of the great Republic, and dealt wisely, and in the second year of the rule of Cornelius P., surnamed Van Ness, who was Governor of the Province of Vermont, in the first month and thirtieth day of the month, behold tee children of Jerijah, of Zadok, of Jonathan, of Zephaniah, of Paul and Apollos, of John, Jacob, of Reuben, of Jonah, of Benoni, of Abner the Judge, of Amasa, the swift of foot, of Garshom, of Jude and Ziba, and Noah, and Othniel, were assembling themselves together at the inn of Marshall of the tribe of Whithed, to feast, dance and make merry. Then spake Marshall with a voice of great joy: "Ruth, the wife, God has given me, bare unto me a son. And his name shall be called Addison. Go thy way in peace." And they departed joyful, with a glad heart and said, "he shall be unto us a law-maker, a scribe, a distributor of good tidings, a keeper of the treasury, a director of the money changers." And it was so. Now Ruth, who was the daughter of Job and Thankful, surnamed Wright, who was the mother of Addison, said unto him, go up into the mountain, for there is a fair maiden, the daughter of Eli, the major, surnamed Lee, and Rebekah his wife. And Addison loved Editha above all women, and she obtained grace and favor in his sight more than all the maidens, and he took her to wife, and dwelt in the land of Vernon. And a fair daughter and two sons were born unto them; and one of them is not, for the Lord called him hence. Now when the years of Addison numbered two score and ten, which was the thirtieth day of the first month, he said unto his near neighbors to the number of seven, "Come up I pray thee unto my dwelling to-night, for the number of my days are many." Now his friends did privily council together and they said to Julius O. of the tribe of Frost, take a journey, I pray thee, unto one J. H. Eldridge of Springfield, Mass., and say unto him, make, I pray thee, a suitable chair for our friend Whithed, for a message has gone out for the friends of Addison to the number of two hundred, who wish to pay their respects at that time. And as the evening drew near, there came rulers of the house of God, law-givers, doctors, merchant-men, inn-keepers, musicians with instruments, mechanics, and tillers of the ground, and brought with them their fair wives, daughters and sweet-hearts, to pay their respects to this worthy family. Also came their son, Hamilton L., and a fellow student from Tufts College, Somersfield, Mass. And there came friends to the number of two hundred and more, from St. Louis, Mo., Lowell, Boston, Springfield, Holyoke, Fitchburg, Greenfield, Bernardston and Northfield, Mass., Canton, N. Y., Hartford, Conn., Guilford, Brattleboro, Dummerston, Chester and Vernon, Vermont. Then Marshall L., the tax-gatherer, surnamed Reed, came before the assembled multitude and said: Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning this man. Therefore be it known unto you, as a neighbor, ever kind; as a friend, a better, seldom found; as post-master, kind and obliging; as a host, most entertaining; as town-clerk, clear and correct; as treasurer, honest and faithful; as a representative, an honor to his town and constituents; and I rejoice, therefore, that I have confidence in him in all things. Hear, O people, the words of Lorenzo, the Deacon, surnamed Brown: Respected friends, ladies and gentlemen. The citizens of South Vernon and vicinity, learning that the friends of our worthy host were about to observe this, his fiftieth birthday, and that they had made ample provision for the wants of the body, thought they could in no way better express their appreciation of his worth and the esteem in which he is held by them, than in presenting to him a copy of "Cassell's Illustrated Bible." And I, in their behalf, present you this book. It holds out its glorious promises and invitations; and if you prove as faithful in the service of the Divine Master as you have in the discharge of the trusts committed to your care, though you may be called to walk through the valley of the shadow of death you may fear no evil. Then was presented a gold headed cane from seven gentlemen of North Vernon; a dressing gown from seven ladies of North Vernon; a silver fruit-dish from three gentlemen of Brattleboro. Response by Dr. Goodwillie: Generous donors and friends of Mr. and Mrs. Whithed, and to all who contributed toward this entertainment, I feel authorized to say in behalf of both Mr. and Mrs. Whithed, they return their heartfelt gratitude, and desire to receive these gifts in the same hearty manner in which they were given, and this day will always be recalled with the greatest pleasure, as one of the happiest periods of their lives.

OBITUARY.

Died in Fitchburg, Mass., Dec. 13, 1862. Miss Lois S., daughter of Elijah and Lois Belding, age 44 years. Carried to Vernon for burial.

Thus passed from our number one who has walked among us in health and usefulness for so many years, that the knowledge of her death seemed impossible, as the sudden removal of some support we had hitherto deemed unailing.

As a woman, she was true and irreproachable; as a teacher, earnest and beloved.

FRANKLIN BRYANT WASHBURN, son of Edwin Darwin and Elizabeth Bascom Washburn, grandson of Dr. Cyrus Washburn, was born at Vernon, June 22, 1846. After a preparatory education, he studied dentistry, 2 years with O. R. Post, D. D. L. of Brattleboro, finishing with Dr. Daniel Harwood of Boston, Mass., and in 1867, moved to Racine, Wis., where he now, (1885) resides. He married Lizzie C. Moody, a lady of education, and an excellent teacher, a daughter of the late Mr. Edwin Moody, and a sister of D. L. Moody, the Evangelist, of Northfield, Mass. They have four children.

PERCY FITCH WASHBURN, son of Edwin D. and E. B. Washburn, grandson of Dr. Cyrus Washburn, was born at Vernon, Nov. 22, 1866. He is in mercantile business in Racine, Wis.

ANOTHER MODEL WOMAN.

Miss S. C. Washburn, youngest daughter of Dr. Cyrus Washburn, died of heart disease in Vernon, Oct. 2, 1870, aged 63 yrs. She was sacrificing, quite and gentle in manner, for some years a successful teacher. After the death of her mother, and later of a step-mother, she devoted herself to the care of her aged father. The last years of her life were spent with her oldest brother in caring for his motherless children.

GAZETTE AND COURIER, GREENFIELD,
DEC. 25, 1882.

VERNON, VT.

We announce in another column the marriage of Dwight H. Washburn, son of A. H. Washburn, Esq., of this town. The bride was the only daughter of Capt. E. Allsworth, U. S. A., who is so well known in army circles. Mr. Washburn's journeyings during the past three years may be of interest to many of our readers. Leaving New York in 1880, he spent a few days in England, Scotland and Ireland as a representative of the Edison Telephone Co.; from London to Vienna, Austria, and then to Budapest, Hungary, where he spent some six months, returning to London via Italy, Switzerland, France, Germany and Belgium; from thence to Belgium to put in practical use an underground cable for telephone lines. He clearly showed the successful working of his cable, but was unable to bring it into general use by reason of some English capitalists who owned patents covering the process of manufacturing the cable. After spending a month in Holland he took a pleasure trip in an 18 foot row boat with three others (an Englishman, Hungarian and Servian,) down the Danube, called here "blue" but in Hungary and Servia, "the blonde Danube," owing to the peculiar color after the heavy rains, which wash the yellow dirt into it. Passing through Hungary, Servia, Roumania, into Turkey, they put the boat on board a steamer and returned to London via Vienna. From London he was sent to Warsaw, formerly in Old Poland but now Russia. During his stay there he went as far north as St. Petersburg, visiting Moscow and other large cities. Resigning his position in the Telephone Co., he returned to New York and accepted a position in the Edison Electric Light Co. He was the first to put an electric light in an elevator while working at Hotel Vendome, Boston. While in London he assisted to put in use in the house of Sir William Thompson, the eminent electrician, the Faure accumulator or storage battery. This we believe was the first practical use of it made in England. Mr. Washburn is now located in Philadelphia, Pa.

NATURE AND ART IN THE OLD WORLD; OR SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.
BY THE REV. PRES. J. S. LEE, D. D.
1871, 12 MO. PP. 441. [EXTRACTS.]

FLORENTINE LANDSCAPES.

The Florentines are intelligent and refined. They are an art-loving people. Nature has done much for them. You can not look out upon any of the hills that rise up gently all around Florence without beholding a beautiful and picturesque landscape. And the river Arno, flowing so smoothly and gently between smiling fields and green sloping banks, and on through the city, adds greatly to the beauty of the view. These natural features educate the taste of the Italians, which is further gratified by the fine specimens of architecture, the stately bridges across the Arno, the squares, avenues, and gardens adorned with statues of gods, goddesses, and heroes, in different parts of the city; and the fresco paintings and bas-reliefs on the outside walls and doors of the churches and public and private buildings. The churches are filled with statues and paintings of scriptural characters and scenes, and of the public men and nobles who have contributed to make the history of Florence, for the last five hundred years, so illustrious. The bronze doors of the Baptistery, the tombs of Galileo, Michael Angelo, Dante, and Giotto, in the San Croce church, the tombs of the Medici family, and the statues of "Day and Night," "Dawn and Twilight," in San Lorenzo church, are studied and admired by tourists and artists.

But the galleries of sculpture and painting are among the finest in Europe. You pass through the Vecchio Square and the Uffizio Place, lined on each side with statues of nymphs, goddesses, historical characters of Florence, including Amerigo Vespucci, from whom our country was named, and enter a spacious building; ascend two flights of stairs, and a scene of beauty and splendor bursts upon your sight. Some twenty large rooms and corridors are filled with the productions of ancient and modern sculptors and painters, Correggio, Guido, Rubens, Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others. In one room, called the Tribune, are five pieces dug up from the ruins of Rome and other ancient cities, including the celebrated "Venus de Medici," the Wrestlers, the Dancing Fawn, or Satyr, and the Scythian Knife-grinder; while on the walls of the room are hung master-pieces of painting by Correggio, whose exquisite coloring seems the very perfection of beauty. He and Titian are probably the finest colorists in the world. The gems, the libraries, the manuscripts, and the tapestry are worth seeing.

From the Uffizio gallery you can walk over a covered bridge, lined with objects of art on both sides, across the river to the Pitti Palace, half a mile distant, now the residence of Victor Emmanuel. Here, in a splendid suite of rooms, are multitudes of other works by the master artists. You can walk through these two galleries, and find objects to interest you for weeks and months. Few places in Europe afford so many interesting objects for the study of a connoisseur in the arts.

The Boboli Gardens, situated back of the Palace, with their numerous walks and drives, fountains, groves and statues, furnish a pleasant place for recreation and amusement to thousands of the overworked people of Florence on Sundays and festival days. Nobles and peasants alike mingle together here on a common platform.

But the studios of the sculptors are the chief objects of interest to an American. As an ideal sculptor, Hiram Powers stands at the head of the profession. He is a native of Woodstock, Vt., whence he emigrated, in early life, to Ohio. He went to Italy thirty-one years ago. Having a letter of introduction from a relative of his, I called at his studio, within the walls of the city, a few rods from the Porta Romana. His son, who is an eminent photographer in Florence, at first met me, and showed me through the rooms. The father soon came in, and received me cordially, and invited me into his house, adjoining his studio. He still retains a love for his native town. Unlike some Americans, residence in a foreign land does not un-Americanize him, but tends only to increase his interest in his native country. . . . He expressed his belief that he should live and die in the land of his adoption. He employs twenty or thirty men to aid in chiseling out his figures from the rough marble. One moulds the hand; another the face; and each one perfects himself in his particular part; while Mr. Powers models the statue in plaster, and puts on the finishing touches, and superintends the whole operation. His Greek Slave, his Eve (before and after eating the apple), his Proserpine, his ideal heads of Christ, Faith, Hope, and Charity; busts and statues of many Americans, living and dead, his Psyche, Il Penserosa, California, and America—all partaking of his peculiar genius—are justly admired. His last work is one of his best. It is "The Last Indian,"—the figure of a woman with one foot raised, as in the act of running; her face—dark despair depicted on her features—turned over her right shoulder, looking to discover some one of her race. It is the very personification of despair. Judging from the rate at which the native Indians disappear in the far west, Powers' prophecy will speedily become history.

He is modest, yet dignified; and the many Americans who call at his studio find in him a cordial and sympathizing friend. He has erected an elegant villa outside the city walls, whither he is soon to remove. Here we hope he may be permitted to enjoy in peace the last days of a life made illustrious by his creations of art and his zealous and patriotic efforts to honor his native land and perpetuate her glory abroad.

Florence is one of the most interesting cities I have visited. It is full of sunshine, music and art. Her past is glorious; her future full of promise.

BRIEFS.

The Howes (Caleb and family) lived at Sartwell's Fort, but at the time they were captured they were at Bridgman's Fort visiting, or for some other purpose. Bridgman's Fort was picketed, hence there was a gate to pass through before they came to the door of the fort. Sartwell's Fort stood where the Howes now reside (1884). Bridgman's Fort stood about ten rods easterly of where Judge Bridgman's house stood at the time it was burnt with the town records in 1797.

Mrs. Fanny F. Stevens and Geo. Hubbard now reside on the site of the Bridgman house. The distance from Sartwell's Fort to Bridgman's Fort was about one-fourth of a mile.

COMMUNICATION FROM JOHN HOWE OF PROVIDENCE, R. I.

John Howe, born Dec. 21, 1825, in the old fort, built by Josiah Sartwell, finished his academic education at Mt. Caesar Seminary, Swansey, N. H., in 1846. He left home for Boston in November, 1847, to study music and joined the Boston Museum Dramatic Co., Aug. 13, 1849, with which he continued for a year, during which time Junius Brutus Booth, the father of Edwin Booth, played two very successful engagements at the Museum. In 1850-51, Mr. Howe played at the Lowell Museum. He finished in Worcester, Mass., and left the stage in Jan. 24, 1852, and commenced the study and practice of civil engineering in Lowell, with Beard & Butterfield, February, 1852, and immediately commenced the building of the Medway branch railroad; and Nov. 27th, 1852, was engaged on the Hampshire and Hampden railroad, running from Connecticut State line to Northampton, Mass. He remained on the road during its construction, and Oct. 24, 1853, was married to Louise J. Russell, youngest daughter of Benjamin and Hannah Russell, a Quaker family of New Bedford, Mass. He went from Westfield, Mass. (railroad headquarters), March 15, 1854, to Providence R. I., and opened an office for surveying and civil engineering, where he has carried on a successful business to the present time, April, 1885. He was commissioned brigade engineer on Brig. Gen. Rhodes' staff of the R. I. Militia, by Gov. Chas. C. Van Yandt, July 9, 1879, with the rank of captain, and reappointed for five years from March 5, 1885. He was appointed instructor and acting inspector of rifle practice of the R. I. Militia, Oct. 2, 1884, by Gov. Augustus O. Brown.

ENSIGN SAMUEL STRATTON.

STRATTON--WRIGHT--WHITHED.

1592—1891.

BY THE WHITHED FAMILY.

STRATTON.

In preparing this biographical sketch it is not our purpose to over-estimate the merits of our worthy ancestors, but to present a brief record of those who have been identified with the early settlement, growth and prosperity of the town.

An account of our early ancestry is gleaned from the History of Northfield, Massachusetts, commencing in 1592, and extending to the time when the Strattons became the earliest permanent settlers of that place in 1715.

With the record intervening between these dates, our genealogy to the present time, 1891, covers a period of 299 years.

SAMUEL STRATTON.

Samuel Stratton was born in England in 1592. He came to America about 1648. He settled at Watertown, Mass., in 1652, where he died, Dec. 20, 1672.

We have no record of his first wife.

His second marriage dates Aug. 28, 1657, to Mrs. Margaret Parker, at Boston, Mass., who died Dec. 7, 1676, aged 81.

SAMUEL STRATTON, [II].

Samuel 2d, son of Samuel 1st, of Watertown, Mass., was born in England. He married Mary Frye, May 25, 1651, and later settled in Concord, Mass.

Shattuck, the historian, thinks that his second marriage was in 1675, to Hannah, daughter of Moses Wheat.

SAMUEL STRATTON, [III.]

Samuel Stratton 3d, son of Samuel 2d, was born March 5, 1661, in Concord, Mass., and died in 1717.

He married Elizabeth ———, who died in Concord, Mass., April 17, 1762, aged 100 years.

HEZEKIAH STRATTON.

Hezekiah, son of Samuel 3d, was born in 1689; removed to Deerfield, Mass., in 1713, and to Northfield, Mass., in 1715, where he remained one of the earliest permanent settlers.

He married Elizabeth Hawks, daughter of Eleazer Hawks of Deerfield, Mass., July 12, 1717. He was wounded in the attack of the Indians upon Northfield, Oct. 11, 1723.

He died Dec. 28, 1756, aged 67.

His wife died April 19, 1788, aged 90 years.

ENSIGN SAMUEL STRATTON.

Samuel, familiarly known as Ensign Samuel Stratton, second son of Hezekiah Stratton of Northfield, Mass., was born Feb. 8, 1720. He served in the French and Indian war, and settled in that section now known as Vernon, Vermont, where he purchased large tracts of land which were occupied by himself and descendants for six generations.

At an early period, he and one or two others having built log-houses, were the first white men to take up their residence there, and it is not improbable that our ancestor was the first white man to lead the settlement of the town, as the earliest deed of land to him in that section was given in 1746, in his Majesty's reign, King George II.

This deed antedates others that are claimed as being the oldest.

The next deed, which was given June 29, 1749, records the transfer to Samuel Stratton, by Nathaniel Mattoon and Gains Field for £250, old tenor.

As an intrepid and courageous man Ensign Stratton was well calculated to cope with the hardships and dangers incident to a pioneer's life.

As to his merits, the elegy written by Rev. Bunker Gay eulogizes him as a man worthy of imitation.

This biographical elegy, a quaint tribute to his memory, was published for the first time in the Vermont Phoenix at Brattleboro.

The oil portrait, taken in his advanced years, is an heirloom treasured by the family, and though bearing the impress of time is well preserved.

His will, bearing date of 1797, together with a collection of thirty-five "Deeds for Land" to him, are in the possession of the family.

Of these deeds, five were given in the reign of King George II; fifteen in the reign of King George III, and the remainder after the Declaration of Independence.

Asahel Burt, the subscriber to the first deed was killed by the Indians at Pauchaug hill, April 15, 1747.

According to the town regulations of Northfield, Mass., the meadows were pastured only in the fall; but as the Indians were known to be in ambush in the adjacent woods during the fall of 1746, the owners did not venture to graze in Pauchaug meadows until spring. On the 15th of April, Asahel Burt with another settler, started upon horseback to drive the stock from the meadow. When ascending Pauchaug hill they were fired upon by the Indians. Burt's horse was killed; his companion shot and scalped.

Burt, in attempting to escape by returning to the meadow, was overtaken by the Indians and also scalped.

The river meadows were all named, and the names are landmarks in history, found in early grants and deeds, and in many instances perpetuated to the present day.

The number of acres specified in the deeds to Ensign Samuel Stratton amount to 1,442, exclusive of the above deed and five others, in which the number of acres is not stated.

The Vernon town records were burned in 1797, and probably some dates lost, relating to the genealogy of the Stratton family.

Ensign Samuel Stratton, married Ruth, daughter of Benoni Wright.

She died Dec. 16, 1800, aged 61.

Ensign Stratton lived to the age of 83, dying September, 1803.

In the Whithed burial ground, which marks the resting place of six generations, lie the remains of this worthy Pioneer and his beloved wife.

The following epitaphs, copied from the Stratton tombstones, were written by Reverend Bunker Gay, ordained in 1764. Their quaintness has often attracted much attention.

of

ENSIGN SAMUEL STRATTON.

*Reader, deny it if you can,
Here lies interred an honest man,
By Pope denominated rightly
The noblest work of the Almighty.*

*To men of all denominations,
Acquaintances, neighbors and relations,
The rich and those who stood in need,
He proved himself a friend indeed.*

*He kept the faith, he kept his heart,
And well performed the Christian's part;
Had much to do, and did his best,
Fulfilled his charge and's gone to rest.*

*The path he trod with care pursue,
And you'll be crowned with glory too.*

of

RUTH STRATTON,

Wife of Ensign Samuel Stratton.

*To rise again the sun goes down,
And in the furrows grain is sown,
Beauties that sleep through winter's reign
When spring returns, revive again.*

*Shall then the friend we mourn,
Never again to life return?
Great Source of life, light, love and joy,
Let no such thoughts our hope destroy.*

*Our lively hope that sometime since,
Through the Redeemer's influence,
In whom she placed her hope and trust,
She'll burst this tomb, shake off her dust,
Ascend to where God holds his throne,
And Immortality put on.*

JOHN STRATTON.

John, the only child of Ensign and Ruth Stratton, was born Jan. 28, 1756, and was drowned, June 1, 1785, in the Connecticut river at Bellow's Falls, where he had gone with a party to spear salmon.

He married Roxana P., daughter of Paul Field of Northfield, Mass.

She died, Aug. 14, 1786, aged 30.

Children: Thankful, Electa, Roxana.

Electa married Cyrus Washburn. Roxana died in 1803, aged 21.

STRATTON—WRIGHT.

Thankful, daughter of John and Roxana Stratton, and grand-daughter of Ensign Samuel Stratton, was born, May 9, 1776. She married Lieut. Job Wright, son of Rev. Job Wright of Bernardston, Mass., Aug. 20, 1795, and remained with her grandparents, under whose protection she had been since the death of her parents.

Her aged grandparents died a few years after her marriage, and this bereavement was soon followed by the death of her husband, April 26, 1806, aged 34.

By these afflictions, the care and responsibility of a young family rested alone upon her. She was known as a woman of worth and ability. She inherited the homestead of her Grandfather Stratton, and remained beneath the roof-tree, until impelled by the infirmities of age to remove to the home of her son-in-law, Marshall Whithed, where she passed away, May 24, 1849, aged 73.

In her were embodied the highest and noblest traits of character.

She married Marshall Whithed, May 20, 1823, and lived near the home of her childhood until her death, Oct. 14, 1840.

WHITHED.

Marshall Whithed, son of Gad and Thankful Whithed, and grandson of John and Abigail Whithed, was born at Lincoln, Mass., July 31, 1797.

His father removed to Phillipston, Mass., where his boyhood was spent, and later his father removed to Northfield, Mass.

His grandfather, John Whithed, was one of the famous Boston Tea Party of 1773, who evinced the spirit of resistance to British taxation by throwing the historic tea overboard. Our tradition of this fact is well authenticated.

He was in the battle of Lexington, and served four years in the Revolutionary war. He died soon after leaving the army.

The name Whithed was formerly spelled Whitehead, but the e and a were dropped by our ancestors.

Marshall Whithed was the oldest of nine children.

He located in Vernon in 1820, where he engaged in the mercantile business.

He married Ruth, only daughter of Job and Thankful Wright, and great-grand-daughter of Ensign Samuel Stratton, May 20, 1823.

The store and hotel of Mr. Whithed were the only ones in town for several years.

The commodious hall in his house was occupied from time to time by the different societies for public worship. It was also used for lectures and other entertainments, and all the town business was transacted there.

The many civil offices that were held by Marshall Whithed, attest the trust reposed in him by his townsmen.

Mr. Whithed was postmaster nearly 32 years, town clerk 12 years, and town treasurer a number of years, and filled other town offices. He was public spirited and enterprising, and his sterling qualities and good judgment caused his counsel to be sought in matters of importance. He was chairman of the committee when the new church was erected. The large mill built at the centre of the town in 1856 by himself and Mr. Ball of Winchester, N. H., was under his supervision. He engaged in the lumber business, which with his extensive farms gave employment to many persons. In his earliest business life when merchandise was conveyed up the Connecticut river in flat boats, he and one or two others had control of most of the transportation from Hartford, Ct., to Bellows Falls, Vt. He was a liberal contributor to the church of which he was a regular attendant, and the hospitality of his house was generously extended to the clergy.

Rev. H. B. Butler rightly said of him: "He was a man whose word was as good as his bond." He died February 3, 1860.

Children of Marshall and Ruth Maria [Wright] Whithed: Addison, Isabella, Josephine, Lafayette, Lucia Ann, Adaline, Sylvia, Clinton Stratton.

ADDISON WHITHED.

Addison Whithed, born Jan. 30, 1824, inherited the homestead and succeeded his father in the mercantile business, also as postmaster, town clerk, and town treasurer. He has held the office of town treasurer 36 years; town clerk, 32 years; postmaster, nearly 30 years. These offices he holds at the present time.

The post office has been held by Addison Whithed and his father over 61 years, and the combined services of father and son as town clerks exceed 44 years; as town treasurers over 40 years. He represented his town in the State Legislature in 1872, '73 and '74. He married Editha Lee, daughter of Major Eli Lee of

of

JOHN,

Son of Samuel & Ruth Stratton.

*Here lies interred where silence reigns,
Mr. John Stratton's sad remains.
In January, ere the sun
Had eight and twenty courses run,
Samuel and Ruth once happy were
In him, their only son and heir.
In Seventeen Hundred Fifty-six,
With mortals here on earth to mix
He first began; but lost his life
In Seventeen Hundred Eighty-five.
The first of June while on his tour
Where Walpole Rapids foam and roar,
He to a rock went down too nigh
To pierce the salmon passing by.
The rock's smooth, glossy, sloping side
His feet betrayed, and let him slide,
Plunged down into a watery tomb,
No more to see his native home,
His tender parents, lovely spouse,
Or those bright beauties of his house,
Three little hapless female heirs,

of

ROXANA PHILENA,

WIFE OF JOHN STRATTON.

*When from her side her partner failed,
Huge grief and cares her mind assailed.
Her children's youth, her parents age,
Her fond attention did engage.
None who beheld but understood,
Her trials great for one so good,
So meek, so lovely, and resigned,
So pious, merciful and kind,
God saw her sorrowful though chaste,
And sent an angel down in haste:
To earth he flew on wings of love,
And bore her to the realms above.*

[The historic epitaph of MARSHALL WHITHED amid the Stratton and Whithed tombs may be]

The iron fence inclosing the Whithed burial ground was erected by him a few weeks previous to his death; soon after completing this work, he was borne to his final resting place within this hallowed inclosure.

In this yard, on the tombstone of Roxana, daughter of John and Roxana P. Stratton, is the following tribute from Rev. Bunker Gay :

What though on earth her days were few,
She now begins her life anew,
Disjoined and sheltered here,
In the deep grave her mortal part
Secure from guilt, and grief, and smart,

Will rest from year to year,
Until that all important day,
When death shall yield up all its prey,
And from this putrid tomb,
Divinely polished she will rise
A spotless nymph to grace the skies,
Clothed in immortal bloom.

On the stone of Lieut. Job Wright, author unknown :

Honor and honesty, good sense,
True kindness and benevolence,
His frail and feeble life adorned;
Alas ! how soon to dust returned;
Great is the loss his friends sustain,
Great and eternal too his gain.

On the stone of Thankful [Stratton], wife of Lieut. Job Wright :

True virtue did her time engage,
In doing good from youth to age;
Her soul has gone to realms above,
In ceaseless joy and boundless love.

DOVER.

By *K. HASKINS, ESQ.,

of Brattleboro.

DOVER.

The town of Dover is situated in the western part of Windham county, is 20 miles northwesterly from Brattleboro and 12 miles westerly from Newfane, the present county seat. It was originally chartered as a part of the township of Wardsborough [Wardsboro], and was granted to William Ward and 51 others by the General Assembly of the State of Vermont on the 7th day of November, 1780. The charter was signed by Thomas Chittenden, Governor, and Jonas Fay, Secretary. By the terms of the grant, as imposed by the General Assembly, the proprietors were to pay the sum of eight pounds and ten shillings each, and to settle the township within three years after the war, or when safety to the inhabitants would admit.

The town [Wardsborough] was organized March 14, 1786, and Aaron Hudson was the first town clerk. Extending across the town from east to west, and in about the central part thereof, is a high range of hills, which rendered it exceedingly inconvenient, and at some seasons of the year almost impossible for the inhabitants on either side communicating and doing business with each other. On the 18th day of October, 1788, at a session of the General Assembly held at Manchester, the town was divided into two separate and distinct districts by a line commencing at a point on the eastern boundary of said town and equi-distant from the northeast and southeast corners thereof, thence running westerly to a point on the western boundary of said town, and equi-distant from the northwest and southwest corners thereof; that portion lying north of said line to be called the North District of Wardsborough, and all lying south to be called the South District of Wardsborough. By this act of division each district was entitled to have, and thereafter did have, a separate and distinct set of town officers and records; but the two together were entitled to but one representative in the General Assembly.

Abner Perry, a resident of the South District, was elected town representative in 1803, and this was the only occasion that a representative was given to that part of the town while the district system remained. The inhabitants of the South District frequently petitioned the Legislature to constitute them into a separate town, but without success, until Oct. 30, 1810, when they procured the passage of an act, entitled "An act incorporating the North and South Districts of Wardsborough, in the County of Windham, into two separate and distinct towns," which said act provided that the North District should thereafter be called and known by the name of

of Wardsboro, and the South District by the name of Dover.

On the 16th day of Nov., 1869, by an act of the Legislature, that portion of the town of Wilmington lying directly west of the town of Dover, being a strip of land two miles in width and which previous to November 2, 1858, was a part of the town of Somerset, was annexed to Dover. The town as now constituted is about four miles wide from north to south, and eight miles on the north line, comprising in round numbers about 22,000 acres of land.

The town has no natural ponds, nor any considerable streams of water; but several branches of the West river and a branch of the Deerfield river have their rise here, which afford several small mill privileges. The surface of the town is exceedingly uneven, and a view from some of its highest hills present to the eye scenes both picturesque and grand. Looking to the west may be seen the Haystack, and from it extending north and south the range of the Green Mountains for a long distance can easily be traced. To the northeast the Ascutney looms up in the distance, and still beyond may be seen some of the White Mountains of New Hampshire; looking eastwardly, one has a fine view of Mt. Monadnock, with the valleys of the West river and the Connecticut lying between; turning to the southeast and the south, the eye takes in a vast amphitheatre of hills and valleys, with Wauchusett, Mt. Holyoke and Mt. Tom forming a magnificent background. The soil is hard of cultivation, yet some good crops are produced thereon, and the hillsides afford excellent grazing.

EARLY SETTLERS.

The first settler was Abner Perry, who came in alone from Holliston, Mass., in 1779, and made a clearing on the farm ever after occupied by him, and now owned and occupied by Asaph Adams. He returned to Holliston in the fall, but came back again in the spring of 1780, bringing with him Joshua Kendall of the same town, who settled on the farm recently owned and occupied by Preston Adams.

The same season William Hall of Upton, Mass., came in and settled on the farm where he lived and died, since occupied by his son Lewis, and now occupied by Adelbert Jeffs. In 1781, Ebenezer Sparks and Robert Love of Killingly, Conn., settled in town, the former on the farm now occupied by Charles Wentworth and the latter on the farm now occupied by Isaac L. Gould. In 1782, these early pioneers brought their wives into this new settlement, that was to be their future home. They were followed during this and the few succeeding years by Jonathan K. Wells, who settled on the farm now occupied by George Bolster; Timothy Wood and Aaron Wood of Warwick, Mass., the former settling on the farm recently occupied Warren Brown, and the latter on the farm now occupied by Charles Bemis; Joseph Briggs of Old Marlboro, Mass., who settled in the west part of the town, where he resided a few years, then bought out Jonathan K. Wells, moved on to the place and occupied it until his death Feb. 16, 1850, at the age of 92 years; James Slade, Silas Wright, Reuben Chittenden and a Mr. Richardson were among the early settlers, but it is now impossible to ascertain from whence they came or where they settled, with the exception of Mr. Slade, who settled on what is now known as the "Estabrooks Hill;" so were also Gamaliel Ellis, John and Oliver Kemp, who settled on the hill southwesterly of the present village of West Dover, on lands now owned by Hosea Mann. Among others of the early settlers who came to town previous to 1790, may be mentioned Gardner Howe of Shrewsbury, Mass., Ebenezer and William Sears, Roger Birchard (maternal grandfather of President Hayes), of Mansfield, Conn., Elijah Baldwin, of the same town, who settled on the farm now occupied by Hosea Mann 2d; William Haskins of Hardwick, Mass., who settled on what has since been known as the "Whipple Place," and where he built the first frame house ever erected in town; Lemuel Osgood, who settled on the farm now owned and occupied by Lorenzo L. Howe, sold it in 1794 to Abraham Jones of Milford, Mass., since which time it has been owned and occupied by Whitney Jones, Laban Jones, Laban Jones, jr. and Carlos K. Jones, respectively. Mr. Osgood then moved to the farm now owned and occupied by George B. Boyd, where he lived and died. David Johnson, who settled on the farm now occupied by John Sylvester; Silas Johnson, who settled on the "Estabrooks Hill," on lands now owned by Joshua F. Parker, where he erected and kept the first tavern in town. Also Isaac Lasdell [Lazell], Josiah H. Wheeler, Aaron Thompson, Luther Johnson, Daniel Warner, Uzziel Putnam, Abner Slade, Eliphaz Stearns and Jesse Marsh.

MARRIAGES.

The first marriage celebrated in town was between Ebenezer Sparks and Margaret Love, in the year of 1782. The ceremony was performed in a log house, by the Rev. Hezekiah Taylor of Newfane, to which the settlers were generally invited. It is related of Parson Taylor, that, he had a habit when at prayer, of rising upon his tip-toes and then settling down upon his heels, obviously, to give emphasis to his words. On this occasion, while the Parson was engaged in prayer, and growing unusually fervent, he came down upon his heels with such sudden force that the floor gave way and the whole party were precipitated into the cellar.

BIRTHS.

The first child born in town was Anna, daughter to Abner and Anna Perry, July 18, 1782; she afterwards married Ebenezer Jones, and was the mother of Hon. Wm. H. Jones. The second was Sarah, daughter to Ebenezer and Margaret Sparks, born Sept. 29, 1782. In 1800, she married Aaron Wood, who died in about four months thereafter. She then married William Bugbee, December 15, 1801, with whom she lived until his death Sept. 11, 1862; she died May 23, 1867, aged 84 years. The third was Samuel, son to William and Lois Hall, born Dec. 19, 1782. The fourth was Alpha, son to Silas and Mary Wright, born July 27, 1783.

The early settlers of this township experienced many severe hardships and privations in their newly selected home. They lived in log houses and erected temporary shelters for their stock, which were but poor apologies for barns during the long cold winters which followed. But they were men and women of strong constitutions, possessed of a determined and iron will, for whom toil and privation only served to call forth greater efforts on their part, to make their homes comfortable and leave to their posterity an example of prudent thrift, sterling integrity and manly intelligence. Abner Perry, the earliest settler in town, died very suddenly Sept. 2, 1834, on Dover Common, while attending freeman's meeting. His widow deceased Aug. 19, 1862, aged 99 years, 8 months and 10 days, being the oldest person that ever died in the town, although many of the early settlers lived to be upwards of 85 and 90 years of age.

TOWN MEETINGS AND OFFICERS.

The first meeting for the election of officers in the Wardsborough South District, was held at the dwelling house of James Slade, March 10, 1789, when the following were chosen: David Johnson, moderator and town clerk; David Johnson, Aaron Thompson and Luther Johnson, selectmen; Daniel Warner, treasurer; Ebenezer Sears, constable; Wm. Standcliff, collector; Elijah Baldwin, Isaac Lasdell and William Haskins, listers; Barnard Converse, sealer of leather; Roger Birchard and William Hall, grand jurors; Nathan Ganson, pound keeper; Nathan Baxter, hayward; Silas Wright and Uzziel Putnam, tithingmen; Abner Slade, fence-viewer; Jacob Staples, Daniel Warner, Nathan Ganson, William Haskins, Silas Wright, William Sears, Barnard Converse and William Hall, highway surveyors; William Hall, Abner Slade, Luther Johnson, Roger Birchard, Abner Perry and Elijah Stearns, petit jurors; William Hall, sealer of weights and measures.

On the 18th of June, 1789, William Hall, Roger Birchard, Abner Perry, William Haskins and Abner Slade were chosen a committee to find the center of the town. This committee made their report at a meeting held October 8, 1792, when it was "voted to establish the centre where it was picked." There is no record of the report of this committee, nor can their report (if made in writing) be now found, but the writer is informed, and it has been understood that the centre was established to be on the hill near the present dwelling house of George B. Boyd, and a short distance easterly of what was found to be the geographical centre of the town.

March 7, 1791, the town "voted to give Daniel Warner forty shillings to clear and fence one-half acre of land given by Mr. John Lee, for a burial place." John Lee settled on the farm formerly owned and occupied by David Dexter, and the "burial place" so given and established, is the one still in use just north of the village that for many years has been known as "Dover" or "Dover common."

In that old familiar and hallowed spot,
"Where heaves the turf in many a mould'ring heap,
Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

"Off did the harvest to their sickle yield,
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has
broke:

How jocund did they drive their team
afield!

How bow'd the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!"

"The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallows twitt'ring from the straw
built shed,

The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,

No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed."

August 1, 1791, the town "voted, that all warnings for meetings shall be put up at Mr. Southard's mill, Capt. Johnson's and John Kemp's houses, for the future."

Sept. 23, 1793, the town "voted, to build a house in which to do town business at the centre of the town, or the highest convenient place." This vote was subsequently rescinded, and no building was ever erected for that purpose at the then recognized centre of the town.

At a town meeting holden Sept. 15, 1794, to take into consideration the matter of paying the soldiers who had served in the revolutionary war, and were then residents of the town, "voted, to make up the soldiers three pounds per month while in service."

From 1789 up to 1810, inclusive, when the South District was incorporated into a separate and distinct town under its present name, the town meetings were held at the houses of James Slade, Silas Johnson, David Johnson, Lemuel Osgood, John Lee and others.

The first town meeting held for the election of officers under their new act of incorporation was March 4, 1811, at the meeting house which had previously been erected on "Dover Common," and which has ever since been known or distinguished from the other villages in the town, as "Dover" or "Dover Common." At this meeting Reuben Dean was chosen town clerk; Elijah Stearns, Samuel Miller and Ebenezer Sears, selectmen; Ebenezer Copeland, William Haskins and Phineas Wood, listers; and Asa Phillips, constable and collector.

From this time forward the town meetings were holden in the same place, as also were the freemen's meetings from 1828 up to and including the March meeting of 1861, when by vote of the town it was decided that they thereafter be held alternately at the east and west villages. In 1811, and for a few years thereafter, the freemen's meetings were held at the dwelling house of Lemuel Osgood; subsequently, up to and including the year 1828, they were holden in the Baptist meeting house, erected on lands given for that purpose by the said Osgood, situated on the hill northwest of the "Common," and on the farm now owned and occupied by George B. Boyd. Within the last few years, however, the meetings have been holden on "Dover Common."

As a general thing the elections in this town have passed off very quietly, the Democrats being in the majority a greater portion of the time until 1844, when the Liberty party obtained the ascendancy. Since which time the Free Soil party of 1848, and the Republican party of 1856, have constantly been in the majority. From 1811 to 1815, however, considerable party feeling existed, and many a heated discussion was indulged in by the Democrats and the Federalists of that time, the participants not unfrequently coming to blows. An incident of this kind was related to the writer by an eye-witness that on the occasion of a town meeting being held to encourage the young men to volunteer and fill the quota of the town, in response to the call of the governor, and to protect the State from threatened invasion by the British troops, the excitement reached a fever heat and insulting and threatening language was freely indulged in. Whereupon one Secretary Rawson, an ardent Democrat and strong supporter of the administration or "war party," encountered Roswell Warner, a Federalist, and one of the local leaders of the "anti-war party," and gave him a most unmerciful thrashing. A draft, however, was made, but none drafted ever entered the service, their places being filled by volunteers who received as a bounty one silver dollar each.

In 1849 a scheme was projected to annex to Dover that portion of the town of Somerset which was subsequently annexed to Wilmington in 1858, and from that town to Dover in 1869. This matter was presented to the Legislature at nearly every session, the party favoring the annexation only succeeding to the extent of procuring the passage of an act to take effect whenever a majority of the town should vote to receive them. This project having for its object, as the anti-annexation party believed, the removal of the place of holding the town and freemens' meetings from the "Common" to the west village for the whole or a portion of the time, provoked a great amount of angry discussion and created feelings of bitter enmity and hatred between those who had theretofore been warm friends. The anti-annexationists were in the majority, but the struggle was continued year after year until that territory was annexed to Wilmington in 1858. In 1868 the contest was renewed by an attempt to annex that portion of Wilmington to Dover, but was defeated. In 1869, the opposition becoming tired of the fight, or becoming convinced that the acquisition would prove beneficial instead of detrimental to the best interests of the town, abandoned the struggle, and the act of annexation was passed with little or no opposition, and thus ended what had been a long, tedious and most perplexing controversy.

SCHOOLS.

The first school in town was one of five weeks, taught in an old vacant log house in the east part of the town, about the year 1790. At this time no organized school system prevailed, and the fathers and mothers feeling the necessity of having their children educated, it was decided to have a school to be taught one week each by such of the mothers who felt themselves competent to teach. This system of private schools with the mothers for teachers, was continued until the town in its organized capacity took hold of the matter, and at a town meeting holden May 22, 1793, chose David Johnson, William Haskins, Luther Johnson, Gamaliel Ellis and John Lee a committee to divide the town into school districts. This committee reported their action to the town on the same day, dividing the town into four school districts, which report was adopted. After the town was constituted and duly organized under the name of Dover, it was again divided into seven districts. It now has nine school districts. The people of this town, as a general thing, have always taken a great interest in the matter of their common schools, and none of the smaller towns of the State have had a more excellent system, or taken greater pains to employ good and competent teachers to educate their youth, in which, in a great measure they have been successful, and have sent out from among them several of their sons and daughters who have become eminent in their profession as teachers.

In 1814 there were 345 scholars returned as attending school for that year. Of this number district No. 5 (Dover Centre) returned 73, and No. 6 (West Dover) returned 65. At the present time the town has 203 children returned as of school age, with but 182 attending school. This remarkable falling off is of course owing to two causes, the one, the decrease in the population, the other and most prominent one, is the great and disproportionate decrease in the number of children composing the several households at the present time, as compared with those of an earlier period.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

Nearly all of the early settlers had emigrated from places where they had enjoyed the privileges of the Gospel, and therefore were anxious that provision should be made for religious worship among them. The first step taken in this direction, of which there is any record, was at a town meeting holden April 23, 1795, when they "voted to hire the Rev. Mr. (James) Tufts one-third of the time the ensuing year; that the meetings be held one-half of the time at Abraham Jones' and the other half at Elijah Baldwin's, and that a tax of two and one-half pence on the pound of the grand list be raised to pay for the same."

On the 10th of June, 1795, the town further "voted to join with the north district of Wardsborough in settling the Rev. Mr. Tufts for the term of five years upon the following term: To have the Rev. Mr. Tufts one-half of the time for the aforesaid term of five years to preach with us; to give him thirty-six pounds the first year, and then to add twenty shillings per year until the term of five years is up, for our part of his annual support, we keeping our public land to ourselves."

Mr. Tufts commenced preaching under the above vote and continued with them during the next five years, at the end of which time he was again employed for an unlimited period. The Rev. Mr. Tufts was a Congregationalist of the strictest order, and many in town who had been brought up in a different faith and religious belief were opposed to being taxed for his support. They therefore procured certificates under the law of 1797, that they were of a different religious belief and opinion, had them recorded in the office of the town clerk, and were thereafter omitted in the assessment made for the support of preaching. This practice became so general that the friends of Mr. Tufts were unable to raise the money necessary to pay him, without its becoming exceedingly burdensome to a few, so preaching was for a time suspended.

In February, 1802, a petition signed by Eliphaz Stearns, Lemuel Fitch, Samuel Clark, Abraham

Jones, Patten Fitch, Nehemiah Fay, Silas Johnson and John Lee, was presented to the town clerk requesting him to call a town meeting, "To see if the town will form into a religious society, under such denomination as they shall choose when met." Pursuant to said call, a town meeting was holden March 22, 1802, when they "voted to join in a religious society, to be called the United Religious Society." A committee consisting of Ebenezer Sears, Nathaniel Stearns, Abraham Jones, John Lee, Luther Johnson, Lemuel Johnson and Ebenezer Cheney, were chosen to draft the "Society Covenant."

A covenant was subsequently reported and adopted, and the following persons became members thereof: Silas Johnson, Elijah Stearns, Abner Perry, David Johnson, Oliver Russell, Samuel Clark, John Hayward, William Hall, Isaac Lasdell, Patten Fitch, Ebenezer Sears, Eliphaz Stearns, jr., Nathaniel Jones, J. Thompson, Nathan Sherman, Simpson Eames, Nathaniel Ward, Joshua Kendall, William Sears, Elijah Hawks, Abraham Jones, 2d, Samuel Miller, Josiah H. Wheeler, W. Alexander, Jeremiah Wheeler, Abel Simonds, Gardner Howe, Abner Adams, E. Phillips, Lemuel Fitch, John Lee, Ebenezer Cheney, Elijah Baldwin, Solomon Jones, William Haskins, Abraham Jones, Reuben Dean, David Rice, William Bugbee, W. A. Phillips, John Taft, Nathan Baxter, Joseph Chamberlin, Nathaniel Stearns, D. Alexander and Whitney Jones.

The "Covenant" adopted was broad and liberal, and upon it united men of different religious beliefs and opinions. The society organized the same day by choosing Patten Fitch, clerk; Ebenezer Sears, treasurer; William Sears, collector; John Lee, Abraham Jones, 2d, and Whitney Jones, assessors; Ebenezer Sears, Abner Perry, and Ebenezer Cheney, committee. It is not known, nor is there any evidence in existence that this society ever sustained any preaching. It is certain that they never had any settled minister, but from the unanimity of feeling then prevailing, it is reasonably probable that they were occasionally supplied with preachers of an itinerant character. One thing however this society did accomplish worthy of lasting remembrance, the erection on Dover common of the first meeting house in town. For out of this society was subsequently organized a "Meeting House Society," to whom Elijah Stearns deeded a tract of land for a public common, upon which was erected in 1805, a large, two story meeting house, which was thoroughly built and handsomely finished. This house was located upon the highest point of the public common where it stood for 64 years, plainly visible for many miles distant, like a tower upon Zion. In this building religious services were held almost continuously from the date of its completion up to 1855, since which time it was occupied but occasionally for religious worship. In 1861, it was entirely abandoned for any purpose, and it becoming sadly dilapidated and in need of extensive repairs it was in 1869, dismantled and razed to the ground, and thus passed away one of the old landmarks of the town. As an abstract proposition, this building should have been zealously guarded and carefully preserved,—built as it was in the most substantial manner and elegantly finished for the times—as a monument of the religious zeal and piety of the early fathers, of their self sacrificing devotion, and earnest efforts, thus early put forth by them in providing a place of religious worship for their posterity. In a strictly business point of view however, its destruction was undoubtedly justifiable, for its future preservation would have entailed an unequal tax upon the few, without any apparent necessity then existing for its present or future use.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Soon after the first meeting house was erected, a Congregational society was organized in town, but owing to the loss of the records the exact date cannot be ascertained, nor who were the persons of whom the society was composed. The Rev. Urban Hitchcock was the first settled minister, but when he was settled or how long he remained, there is no data now in existence to tell. The next settled minister over this society was the Rev. Isaac Cummings, as he was also the last. Mr. Cummings continued with them, respected and beloved by all, until his death, which occurred September 3, 1831. The pulpit was then temporarily supplied by Rev. Linus Owen and others, to 1843, when the society ceased to exist as a branch of that denomination.

Early in the year 1843, the Rev. Darwin H. Ranney, a native of Townshend, Vt., came to town, calling himself a Unionist and preached in this meeting house. He was a man of much ability, a fine scholarly speaker, liberal in his views and of courtly address. He at once set about organizing a church, and on the 22d of April, 1843, articles of faith were subscribed to by Laban Jones and seventy-eight others. On the 18th day of May following, a society was organized under the name of "The First Church of Christ in Dover," and Mr. Ranney was constituted its pastor. Presson F. Perry was chosen clerk, Laban Jones and Ebenezer Sears, jr., deacons. Mr. Ranney continued with them as their pastor and preacher, until the spring of 1851, when he removed to Wilmington, Vt. The pulpit was then supplied for a few years at irregular intervals by the Rev. Simeon Spencer and others when preaching was abandoned altogether and the society became extinct.

On the 3d day of January, 1872, another society was organized, called the "Congregational Church of Dover Centre." It commenced with 18 members, male and female; they were supplied with preaching for a short time by Rev. A. Chandler and Rev. O. C. Dickenson, but being few in numbers they were unable to sustain preaching all the time, and for a few years past they have had none at all.

April 7, 1857, a "Meeting house Society" was organized in West Dover, and a meeting house was erected the next season. A Congregational Society was duly organized in 1867, which still maintains its organization; and although having a preacher but a portion of the time, they occupy this meeting house when occasion requires, as also do those holding to a different faith. The following have been employed as preachers since the completion of this house in 1858: Rev. Simeon Spencer, Meth.; Rev. A. H. Sweet, Cong.; Rev. O. S. Morris, Meth.; Rev. L. W. Brigham, Unt.; Rev. J. H. Ricketts, Cong.; Rev. S. H. Amsden, Cong.; Rev. H. H. Olds, Cong.; Rev. Frank E. Pierce, Bapt.; A. C. Field, Cong.; H. R. Titus, Cong.; R. D. Metcalf, Cong.; Addison Martin, Cong.; F. B. Hyde, Cong., the present incumbent.

BAPTIST.

A very respectable number of the "United Religious Society" who had given material aid towards the erection of the first meeting house, after the organization of the Congregational Society, the settlement of the Rev. Mr. Hitchcock and his installation as their pastor, feeling aggrieved at the action of the majority withdrew entirely, and in 1812, erected a meeting house on the hill about one-half mile northwest of the Common, on lands given them by Lemuel Osgood, and near where the centre of the town was originally "picked" to be. The pulpit was supplied during the greater portion of the time for the ensuing two years by the Rev. Mansfield Bruce, Baptist. On the 5th of October, 1814, a Baptist church was duly constituted, and at its first church meeting held October 19, 1814, Abida Dean was chosen scribe and Ebenezer Sears, deacon. The Rev. Geo. Robinson became pastor of this church at its organization and continued as such for the four succeeding years, and again in 1820, one-half of the time, and in 1825, all the time. They occupied this house as a place of worship until 1828, when they united with the Methodists and Universalists in building a second meeting house on Dover Common, which is still standing. This new house they continued to occupy for the most part, one-third of the time until 1852, when they built a house of their own in the village of East Dover, where they still have regular preaching. Since the organization and first election of officers in this church the following have served as clerks, deacons and ministers: Clerks, Lemuel Osgood from 1816 to 1823; John Carpenter from 1823 to 1829; Jonathan Woods from 1829 to 1838; Alvin Gould from 1838 to 1843; Edwin F. Sherman from 1843 to 1872; Sidney H. Sherman from 1872 to 1875; Wells C. Halliday from 1875 to present time. Deacons, Isaac Lazell, chosen in 1825; Ebenezer Sears, Jr. in 1832; Levi Pollard in 1844; Freeman Haskins in 1846; Edwin F. Sherman in 1843; John P. Gould in 1860; Henry I. Turner in 1872; Wells C. Halliday in 1875. Ministers, Revs. Calvin Orcutt, Calvin Pratt, Sem Pierce, James Mann, Daniel H. Grant, Mansfield Bruce, Phineas Howe, P. B. Fisk, Samuel Kingsbury, A. W. Goodnow, Origen Smith, J. H. Parmelee, E. H. Watrous, H. V. Baker, L. Kenney and Walter Chase who is the present pastor. The Rev. Origen Smith was pastor from 1852 to 1873, and during his pastorate 92 were added to the church. It is said that for seven consecutive years he was absent but one Sabbath, although residing nine miles from their place of worship. This church is at present the most flourishing one in town.

About 1791, there was formed in the west part of the town and that portion of Somerset that is now a part of Dover, a Baptist Church, known as the "Dover and Somerset Church;" they had no meeting-house in which to worship, nor is it known that they had any stated or regular preacher until about 1812, when the Rev. James Mann became their pastor and continued as such until 1832. In 1829, this church organization became a branch of the Dover Church, and in 1830 and 1831, Mr. Mann was pastor of both bodies. In 1832; the conduct of Elder Mann, for some reason was by the action of the church disapproved, and he together with the organization in West Dover and Somerset were dropped from the rolls as being a branch of the Baptist Church. In 1832, the Rev. Daniel Leonard, a Free-will Baptist, commenced his labors with the West Dover and Somerset people, and a meeting-house was erected by them the same or the following year. Mr. Leonard continued with them for the most part until 1843. During the winter of 1842 and 1843, he was instrumental in awakening a good deal of religious enthusiasm among the people of that section, and a great revival was the result of his labors, bringing into the fold men and women of all classes, and of all religious predilections. About this time there came among them the Rev. Linus Owen, who was known as a "Unionist;" the result was that, Mr. Leonard was displaced from the position he had so long successfully filled, and Mr. Owen was installed as pastor of this people, continuing as such for about fourteen years, when the old meeting-house was abandoned and the remnants of this society remaining, became merged in that subsequently organized at West Dover village in 1857.

METHODISTS.

A Methodist Society was organized here in 1827, and united with the Baptists and Universalists in building the meeting-house on Dover Common in 1828. This house they continued to occupy one-third of the time until about 1854, since which time they have had preaching but occasionally. During this period they have had as preachers the Revs. Elias Crawford, John B. Husted, F. W. Seizer, J. C. Montague, Richard Newhall, John Lawton, Zera Colburn, Amos Kidder, Gray Beckley, A. Adams, Zeb. Twitchell, A. K. Howard, H. Johnson, H. Campbell, David Jones, jr., Wm. S. Locke, C. W. Levings, Caleb Dustin, J. H. Stevens, Moses Adams, John L. Smith, O. S. Morris, Simeon Spencer. Secretary Rawson was the first class-leader chosen; Ebenezer Sparks jr., was chosen class-leader in 1830, in which capacity he faithfully served until his death in 1865. Also may be mentioned the names of William Bugbee, Caleb Howard, Asahel Moore, Suel Briggs, Elijah S. Howe and Alonzo Bugbee as among the devoted and consistent members of this church. Perhaps the most remarkable man ever connected with the Methodist Church in town was the Rev. Wm. H. Hodges. He was son to Abiather Tabitha Hodges who resided on the farm now owned by Augustus Fitch, and was born May 6, 1794. He studied for the ministry and commenced preaching when he was but twenty years old. He preached to those of the Methodist persuasion in his own town, was instrumental in the organization of the church, and gave liberally of his own means to the fund contributed by the Methodists, towards the erection of the new meeting-house on the common in 1828. He continued with this Society until his removal to Newfane in the fall of 1832, where he resided until his death, which occurred February 14, 1849. He taught twenty-six terms of school, and during his ministry of thirty-five years he preached over seven thousand sermons, married over three hundred couples and attended over four hundred funerals. He died deeply lamented by a large circle of most ardent and admiring friends. During the past few years the Methodists have had preaching occasionally in the meeting-house on Dover Common, also in a hall in the East village, where they erected a small chapel; but they are few in numbers and much scattered, and are unable to support a preacher all the time. They have had as preachers at different times E. S. Morse, A. S. Maxham and G. F. Arms.

UNIVERSALISTS.

It is not known that the Universalists ever had any regularly organized society or church in town. In 1828, those of that persuasion, and among whom may be mentioned Abner Perry, Elijah Stearns, William Haskins, Ebenezer Jones, John Dexter, Aaron P. Perry, Asaph Haskins, John Simonds, Samuel Yeaw and James Miner, united with the Methodists and Baptists in building a meeting house which they continued to occupy for the most part one-third of the time up to about 1853, since which time they have had preaching but occasionally, although there are many still left in town holding to that faith. Among the more prominent of the Universalist clergymen who have ministered to this people may be mentioned the Revs. Warren Skinner, Wm. S. Balch, Hosea F. Ballou, Otis Warren, Wm. S. Ballou, Orrin Perkins and Wm. N. Barber.

MANUFACTURES.

The first saw-mill was built by David Southard in 1791, in what is now known as the village of East Dover. In 1794 he sold to Ebenezer Cheney, who soon thereafter erected in connection with said saw-mill a grist-mill. Mr. Cheney sold to Silas Merrifield in 1812, and Merrifield to John Dryden in 1814, who also erected a carding machine. These mills then passed through the hands of several grantees to Sidney H. Sherman, who in 1864, made extensive repairs, and among other things he took out the old "up and down" saw, and in its stead substituted a circular board saw, it being the first of the kind introduced into town. The same season he erected a building for the manufacture of tubs and chair stock, in which he did an extensive business. These mills were afterwards owned and operated by Messrs. Prouty & Connell, and at the present time by George D. Hale.

In 1872, Resolved S. Staples erected in the same village a steam saw-mill and tub manufactory which was operated most of the time until it was destroyed by fire in the summer of 1877. It has since been rebuilt and is now owned and operated by Dana S. Prouty. In 1866, Wells C. Halliday erected in this village a small building for the manufacture of butter tubs. He continued in this business for several years when he sold out to Holland P. Freeman. Several years ago it was destroyed by fire and has never been rebuilt.

In 1796, William Gragg erected a saw-mill in what is now the present village of West Dover. Mr. Gragg sold to Samuel Miller in 1800, who, soon after erected a grist-mill, fulling-mill, clothiers works and a potash manufactory. In 1813, Miller sold to James Mann who carried on the business for several years thereafter. The property then passed into the hands of Joshua Robbins, who sold to Wm. M. Woods, April 24, 1824. Mr. Woods operated these mills a little over ten years and Oct. 29, 1834, he sold to Jephtha & Jephtha Lyman Jr. The Messrs. Lyman continued the business for several years, but all except the saw-mill was eventually abandoned, which mill is now owned and operated by J. B. Davis & Son, having in the meantime undergone extensive repairs, and in all respects modernized. In addition to the last mentioned mill, there is in this part of the town one othersaw-mill, owned by H. L. Hescok & Son, a woodenware and carriage manufactory owned and operated by Silas H.

Moore, and an extensive cider-jelly manufactory by D. G. Leonard and Sons.

In 1846 Martin and Elliot Leonard erected in West Dover village a building for the manufacture of potatoes into starch. They prosecuted this business about ten years when the enterprise was finally abandoned.

About the year 1820, Phineas Wood erected in that part of the town known as "Goose city," a carding machine, and soon after Daniel Hodgkins erected a clothiers shop and fulling mill. These works were kept in operation for some 20 years, when they were abandoned and the buildings afterwards taken down.

In 1814, Samuel Clark then in trade on Dover Common, erected there a potash manufactory. He was succeeded in the business by Justus Gale, Aaron P. Perry and Jotham Howe. The business of manufacturing potash here was abandoned sometime previous to 1840, but the building remained standing for several years thereafter, it having been located over the brook and just north of the dwelling house of John Knight.

On the eastern slope of the mountains in that portion of the town that was formerly a part of Somerset, iron ore may be found in considerable quantities. In 1820, a Mr. Trainor of New York came here and erected a forge and other apparatus for the smelting of iron ore and working it into bars of iron. He sunk a shaft on the mountain side and took out quantities of ore and manufactured it into iron. The business was continued for several years under the superintendence of Luther Park, but it failing to pay, further operations were discontinued.

About the year 1832, Messrs. Wilder & Richards of New York having obtained an interest in this property, sent to town one Nicholas Turkington to take charge of the mines and see if iron could not be found in paying quantities. He employed workmen and commenced operations by tunneling into the mountain and took out considerable ore, but not in quantities to pay for working it into iron; so after a few years of unprofitable experimenting the works were entirely abandoned, and nothing now remains to be seen but the shaft, the two long dark tunnels cut out of solid rock, and heaps of ore lying around nearly hidden from view by the bushes and small trees that have grown up since work there was discontinued.

On the site of the "old forge," a large tannery was erected in 1844, by S. F. Harris; it was operated by him, Scott & Harris, Phillips & Conkey, Samuel D. & Edward L. Reed, Gideon N. Parsons, Parsons & Cudworth, and Parsons & Parsons, at different periods down to 1861, when the latter failed in business. A large and extensive business was carried on here during all the while the tannery was in operation, and at the failure of Parsons & Parsons a large amount of stock was on hand, which was worked out under the direction of William H. Jones, Thomas F. Bogle, and others.

In 1867 William F. Estabrooks purchased the property, tore down the building and erected on the site a saw-mill which is in operation at this time.

There are at present several blacksmiths in town, and has been the greater part of the time for the past eighty years. Those best and longest known are Gersham Eames, William Sherman, Suel Briggs, Enos R. Knapp, Elliot Ward and John Knights. The first blacksmith was Gersham Eames; he came to town from Holliston, Mass., about the year 1798, and erected a temporary shop on the farm of General Abner Perry, which he occupied about two years. He then returned to Holliston and married a wife, who came back with him the same or following year. He soon after settled on what is known as the "Rice hill" in the northerly part of the town, where he remained a few years, and then removed to Dover common, where he erected a blacksmith shop situated at the northeasterly side thereof. Subsequently however he erected a shop east of the common, as also he did a dwelling house, in which he lived until his death, which occurred January, 1864, at the age of 94 years. Mr. Eames was always a hard working man, and yet he seemed to retain the sprightliness of youth almost to the day of his death. When he was 75 or 80 years of age he would leap a rail fence, or over a pair of bars in a manner only equalled by a few of his juniors.

HOTELS.

The first "Tavern" was erected about the year 1895, by Silas Johnson on what is now known as the "Estabrooks hill," and on lands now owned by Joshua F. Parker. He removed to Pelham, Mass., in 1809, and it is not known that the house was occupied as a hotel after that.

Cyrus Knapp came to town from Douglas, Mass., in 1793, and settled on the farm now owned and occupied by his grandson, Augustus W. Knapp. In 1813 he erected near the forks of the road leading from Dover to Marlboro and Wilmington, respectively, a large two story house which he at once opened as a tavern. He was a popular and obliging landlord, as was also his wife a popular landlady, and his house became quite famous as being the favorite place of public resort with the people for many miles around. He kept this as a public house for about 20 years, when it was closed as a hotel, but he continued to reside there until his death, which occurred March 23, 1852, aged 82 years. His wife, the excellent landlady of years ago, deceased April 1, 1852, aged 82 years. The building which had sheltered beneath its hospitable roof so many weary travellers, and whose walls had echoed to the gayety and mirth of the young men and women of those times, who always found a welcome there, having become badly dilapidated, was taken down in the spring of 1877, by its then owners.

About the year 1818, Aaron P. Perry erected a large two story house on Dover common, which he kept as a hotel for several years thereafter. Since his house was closed to the public there has been no hotel or house of public entertainment in this part of the town. This house is still standing in a good state of preservation, has been owned and occupied by Martin Perry, afterwards by Mrs. Burr, and now by one Fred Smith.

About the year 1846, William H. Snow erected a hotel in the village of West Dover, which he kept for a few years. Since which time it has had for proprietors, Parley Whipple, Moses J. & Thomas F. Bogle, A. B. Collins, and D. P. Leonard. This house was always a favorite hostelry with the travelling public, but never more so than when "Uncle Parley" stood behind the office bar and gave his guests a warm and kindly welcome. Daniel H. May has his store there at the present time.

MERCHANTS.

Samuel Clark of Lebanon, Conn., opened the first store in 1798, on the "Estabrooks hill," and near Silas Johnson's tavern, where he remained until 1804, when he removed to Guilford, Vt. The business was continued by Rufus Graves until 1813, when Mr. Clark returned, the store in the meantime having been removed to the common. Mr. Clark remained until 1815, when he made a permanent removal to Brattleboro, Vt., since which time the following gentlemen have been engaged in the mercantile business on Dover common either by themselves or as co partners: Justus Gale, Aaron P. Perry, Gooding Lincoln, Jotham Howe, John and Henry Rice, Reuben D. Jones, Nathan Lazell, Presson F. Perry, Willard Gorham, Fayette Dexter, Martin Perry, D. Gilbert Dexter, William F. Howe, Frank C. Burr, Frank Hescocck, Levi Moore, Duane C. Starkey, E. P. Knowlton and J. L. Clark, 2d.

Sometime previous to 1818 a Mr. Garfield opened a store in "Jockey Hollow," so called, and near the present dwelling house of Marshall A. Moore. This store was continued in operation but a few years. The building is still standing and in use as a wagon house by its present owner.

About the year 1810 Amos Rice commenced trade in what is now the village of East Dover. The store was located on the southerly side of the highway and near where now stand the lumber sheds connected with the steam mill of Mr. Prouty. Mr. Rice continued in business here about 14 years, when he removed to Worcester, Vt. The building formerly used as a store was subsequently moved a little to the west and on the north side of the highway, and converted into a dwelling house. A few years ago it was taken down, and on its site a new one erected, now owned by Dana S. Prouty.

Late in the fall of 1853 Asa H. Marsh opened a store in the dwelling house formerly owned by Lambert Howe, subsequently by S. H. Sherman, and by Albert D. Fessenden, and at present by George D. Hale. Mr. Marsh continued in trade about two years, when he was succeeded by a company of gentlemen who continued the business about two years longer, on the "Union" or co-operative plan, with William Rawson and Edmund P. Howe as agents, at different times respectively.

In 1860 Sidney H. Sherman erected in this village a large building in which he opened a store. The business was continued by him with Lucius H. Gould and Wells C. Halliday as his several partners. For a number of years past Mr. Halliday has prosecuted the business alone.

In the village of West Dover a store was opened by Messrs. Loomis & Gillett, about the year 1826. In 1829 William H. Jones bought out the interest of Mr. Loomis and from that time until 1871 he continued in the business for the greater portion of the time, with Waters Gillett, John Simonds, Jephtha Lyman, jr., Joseph E. Franklin, Norris L. Stetson, Jedediah C. Estabrooks, and William F. Jones, as his several partners at different periods. He and his son, William F. Jones, sold out to William H. Converse. Converse sold out to Taylor S. Estabrooks, and he to Daniel N. May, who now occupies another building for a store, while Francis Davis has a store at the old stand.

J. Arnold Newell has also in this village a boot and shoe store which he opened a few years since, and continues in connection with his other business, that of a boot and shoe manufacturer. Also Leonard & Bogle have been and now are quite extensive dealers in furs.

PHYSICIANS.

The following named persons have resided and practiced their profession as physicians and surgeons in this town: Lemuel Fitch, Paul Wheeler, Marcus Robbins, Samuel Allen, Jedediah Estabrooks, Edward A. Kittredge, Daniel Leonard, William H. Clark, J. Otis Howe, and Chesselden Fisher. Dr. Fitch came to town at a very early day and was its first settled physician. Dr. Wheeler remained here but a few years, removing from the south to the north district of Wardsboro in 1794. Dr. Robbins died August 14, 1816. Dr. Allen removed from town in the fall of 1831, and soon after the death of the Rev. Isaac Cummings, whom he attended in his last sickness. Dr. Kittredge, a most excellent physician and surgeon, after a few years residence in town, removed to Wilmington in 1835, and from thence to Lynn, Mass., in 1838. He afterwards went to Boston, Mass., where for several years he was the proprietor and physician of a water cure establishment which was quite extensively patronized. During this period he contributed many spicy and interesting articles to the Water

Cure Journal, writing over the signature of "Noggs."

Dr. Clark resided in town only about four years. He was a very promising and talented young man, a close student, quick and accurate in his judgment. He died in 1847, at the age of 28 years.

Dr. Howe, a native of the town and a man of much promise, settled in the west village, where he died in 1852, at the age of 29 years.

Dr. Fisher came into town soon after the decease of Dr. Clark, but remained only about one year, when he removed to Pennsylvania, and from there to Illinois. During the war of the rebellion he served nearly four years as surgeon of an Illinois regiment, and came out with his health seriously impaired. He removed to Iowa, and from thence to Texas, where he lived about 12 years. He is now a resident of Oklahoma territory.

Dr. Estabrooks moved into town from Dummerston, Vt., in 1807, and located on the hill about one-half mile southwesterly of Dover common, where he resided until 1850, when he removed to West Dover. He was the longest resident physician, and died in 1853, aged 69 years. Dr. Estabrooks was a good physician having a large practice, and was withal a very remarkable man. He was overflowing with wit and humor, fond of cracking his jokes, and would shake with jolly laughter from the crown of his head to the end of his toes. He was a most excellent story teller, and always had a story to illustrate almost every incident happening in life. His funny stories in the sickroom, and his manner in relating them, would be sure to force a smile to the countenance of the sufferer. He used to say that, a good story well told, was in a majority of cases better than all the medicine he could administer. He believed if he could keep his patients feeling well, nature, aided by his favorite "bread pills," would force a cure.

An incident illustrating the healing efficacy of the old doctor's stories, in a case of sickness, was related to the writer by a person who claimed to have been a witness of the scene, and vouches for its truthfulness. There lived in town a middle aged spinster by the name of Ann H——, who was something of a termagant, and when she was well everything and everybody about her had to move lively. She was also subject to occasional attacks of hypochondria, when she would take to her bed, indulge in the most gloomy forebodings, and with fear and trembling wait for death which she knew would soon overtake her unless she should receive immediate relief. The doctor had treated her on several former occasions, but this time he had been sent for with great haste, the bearer bringing the intelligence that Ann thought she was surely dying. He hastened to the house and found the patient in bed groaning bitterly, believing herself to be upon the very verge of the grave. The doctor soon discovered that there was nothing the matter with her, except that she was suffering from one of her old attacks of the "low-po," as he used to call it. He felt of her pulse, looked at her tongue, and then said to her: "Ann, you are not sick, get up, dance and sing and scold a little and you'll be all right."

She replied with a terrible groan, protested that she was dangerously ill and would surely die without he could afford her immediate relief. The Doctor rose from his chair and with a twinkle in his eye looked her squarely in the face and said, "Ann, you are no doubt a pretty sick woman, and you are beyond the power of medicine to help you; I don't see as I can do you any good, but before I leave I want to relate to you my dream last night. I dreamed that I died and passed immediately to the spirit land; I was anxious to get into heaven and so while wandering around I discovered a large iron door to which was attached an enormous brass knocker which I lifted and when it fell it sounded like the roll of thunder; soon the heavy massive iron door grated harshly upon its hinges and was partially opened, when I beheld the Old Devil, who, placing his finger to his lips said, "s—h, come in if you want to, but be very careful and make no noise as the Young Devils are all asleep, endeavoring to get a little rest, for they expect Ann H—— here to-morrow, and when she comes there won't be any sleep or rest after that." Ann leaped out of bed, seized the broom and followed the Doctor who hastily retreated from the house, jumped into his sulky and drove away roaring with laughter. It is said that the cure was so effectual that it was several years before she had another attack of the hypochondria.

Dr. Leonard was a man of great native ability but did not give his exclusive attention to the practice of medicine, being engaged at different periods in several avocations. He died in 1868, since which time there has been no resident physician in the town.

ATTORNEYS.

The people of this town have always been averse to litigation and have indulged but little in suits of law. They have never had a resident lawyer, and have furnished but three from among their sons to swell the ranks of that profession, viz: Josiah Hall, who emigrated to Warren, Penn., about 1820, where he lived and died; Kittredge Haskins who was admitted to the bar in April 1, 1858, and is now engaged in the practice of his profession at Brattleboro, Vt.; Gilbert H. Mann, who was admitted to the bar in September, 1864, practiced for a while in Brattleboro, but soon left to engage in other pursuits near the eastern entrance of Hoosick Tunnel, in the town of Zoar, Mass., where he now resides.
